elapsed between the declaration of war in 1939 and the invasion of Norway, Denmark, Belgium, Holland, and France in 1940 was called the "Phony War" by American journalists disappointed of sensational events.

Phrygians (frij' yanz). An early Christian sect, so called from Phrygia, where they abounded. They regarded Montanus as their prophet, and laid claim to the spirit of prophecy.

Phrygian cap. The cap of liberty (q.v.).

Phrygian mode. In music, the second of the "authentic" ecclesiastical modes. It had its "final" on E and its "dominant" on C, and was derived from the ancient Greek mode of this name, which was warlike. It was used for hymns and anthems.

Phryne (fri' nè). A famous Athenian courtesan of the 4th century B.C., who acquired so much wealth by her beauty that she offered to rebuild the walls of Thebes if she might put on them this inscription: "Alexander destroyed them, but Phryne the hetæra rebuilt them." It is recorded of her that when she was being tried on a capital charge her defender, who had failed to move the judges by his eloquence, asked her to uncover her bosom. She did so, and the judges, struck by such astounding beauty, acquitted her on the spot.

She is said to have been the model for Praxiteles' Cnidian Venus, and also for Apelles' picture of Venus Rising from the Sea.

Phylactery (fi lāk' ter i) (Gr. phylacterion, from phylax, to watch). A charm or amulet worn by the ancient Jews on the wrist or forehead. It consisted of four slips of parchment, each bearing a text of Scripture, enclosed in two black leather cases. One case contained Exod. xiii, 1-10, 11-16; and the other case Deut. vi, 4-9, xi, 13-21. The idea arose from the command of Moses, "Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart . . . and bind them for a sign upon your hand . . . as frontlets between your eyes" (Deut. xi, 18).

Physician (Gr. physis, nature).

Every man a fool or a physician. See FOOL.

The Physician finger. The third, See MEDICINAL FINGER.

The Beloved Physician. St. Luke (q.v.), so called by St. Paul in Col. iv, 14.

The Prince of Physicians. Avicenna, the Arabian (980-1037).

Piazza (pi āt' zā). An Italian word meaning an open place or square in a town. In America the word has come to mean the verandah of a dwelling-house.

Picador (pik' ā dôr) (Span.). An agile horseman, who, in bull fights, is armed with a gilt spear (pica dorada), with which he pricks the bull to madden him for the combat. Hence, a skillful debater or one who excels at rapid repartee is sometimes called a picador.

Picards. A sect of fanatics prevalent in Bohemia and the Vaudois in the early 15th century, said to be so called from Picard of Flanders, their founder, who called himself the New Adam, and tried to introduce the custom of living nude, like Adam in Paradise. They were suppressed by Ziska in 1421.

Picaresque (pik ā resk'). The term applied to the class of literature that deals sympathetically with the adventures of clever and amusing rogues (Span. picaresco, roguish, knavish). The earliest example of the picaresque novel is Mendoza's Lazarillo de Tormes (1554). Le Sage's Gil Blas (1715) is perhaps the best known. Nash's Jack Wilton (1594) is the earliest English example, and others are Defoe's Moll Flanders and Colonel Jack.

Picayune. In the days of the French occupation of Florida and Louisiana the Spanish half-real (2½d.) was known as a picayune, from Fr. picaille, an old Piedmontese coin. The word is now used in America for anything of trifling value or of a contemptible character.

Piccadilly. This well-known London thoroughfare is named from a house that stood near the corner of Sackville Street and, in the early 17th century, was nicknamed Piccadilly Hall. One early account (1656) says the house was so called because it was the "outmost or skit house of the Suburbs that way"; another—of the same date—because it was built by one Higgins, a tailor, who made his fortune by selling "piccadilles."

The "piccadille" was originally "the round hem or the several divisions set together about the skirt of a Garment," and was so called because it was pierced (Sp. picado) or slashed; thence it came to be applied to the stiff collar that supported the ruff of 17th-century galleons.

Piccadilly Weepers. See WEEPERS.

Piccaninny, or Piccanin (West Indian Negro, from Sp. pequeño, small). A little Negro child of the West Indies and southern U.S.A.; also, in South Africa, applied to small Kafir children, and sometimes to native children in Australia.

Pick-a-back. On the back or shoulders, as a pack is carried. The term dates at least from the early 16th century, but its precise origin, and the force of the pick-, are unknown. Other forms of it are a-pigga-back, piggy-back, pick-back, etc.

Pickle. A rod in pickle. One ready to chastise with at any moment; one "preserved" for use.

I'm in a pretty pickle. In a sorry plight, or state of disorder.

How cam'st thou in this pickle?

Tempest v, 1.

Pickle-herring. The German term for a clown or buffoon, from a humorous character of that name in an early 17th-century play. It was adopted in England through Addison's mention in the Spectator (No. 47, 1711), where he wrongly attributes it to the Dutch.

Pickwickian. In a Pickwickian sense. Said of words or epithets, usually of a derogatory or insulting kind, that, in the circumstances in which they are employed, are not to be taken as having quite the same force or implication as they naturally would have. The allusion is to the scene in ch. i of Pickwick Papers when Mr. Pickwick accused Mr. Blotton of acting in "a vile and calumnious manner," whereupon Mr. Blotton retorted by calling Mr. Pickwick "a humbug." It finally was made to appear that both had used the offensive words only in a Pickwickian sense, and that each had, in fact, the highest regard and esteem for the other.

Picnic. The word came into use in England about 1800 to denote a fashionable party, often but not always in the open air, at which each guest contributed towards the provisions. It is a translation of Fr. pique-nique (which had much the same meaning), the origin of which is uncertain.

Picts. The ancient inhabitants of Scotland, of unknown race. They were gradually dispossessed after the coming of the Scots (Goidels) from northern Ireland, about A.D. 500, and after the union of the Pictish kingdom with that of the Scots under Kenneth Mac-Alpin (844) the remnant was driven to the far north-east. The name is probably not native, but was given them by the Romans because they tattooed their bodies (Lat. picti, painted).

Picts' houses. Underground prehistoric dwellings found in the Orkneys and on the east coast of Scotland, and attributed to the Picts.

Picture (Lat. pictura, from pictus, past part. of pingere, to paint). A model, or beau-ideal, as, He is the picture of health; A perfect picture of a house.

Picture Bible. A name given to the Biblia pauperum (q.v.).

The pictures. A colloquial and convenient way of referring to a cinematograph entertainment.

Picture hat. A woman's hat, with wide drooping brim, such as was worn by many of the sitters to Reynolds and Gainsborough.

Pidgin-English. The semi-English lingua franca used in China and the Far East, consisting principally of mispronounced English words with certain native grammatical constructions. For instance, the Chinese cannot pronounce r, so replace it with l—te-le for "three," solly for "sorry," etc.—and, in Chinese, between a numeral and its noun there is always inserted a word (called the "classifier") and this, in Pidgin-English, is replaced by piece—e.g. one piece knife, two piece hingkich (handkerchiefs). Pidgin is a corruption of business.

Hence, this is not my pidgin, this is not my business, it is not strictly my affair.

Pie or Pi (pi). A printing term used to describe the mix-up of types (for instance, when dropped) or a jumble of letters when a word or sentence is badly printed. The origin of the word is obscure; possibly it comes from the analogy of the mixed ingredients in a pie, or it may come from the assortment of types used in the old pie or pre-Reformation books of rules for finding the prayers, etc., proper for the day.

Piebald. Parti-coloured (especially black and white like a magpie), usually of horses. The word is from pie, the magpie (q.v.), and bald, of which one of the meanings was "streaked with white," as in the "bald-faced stag."

Piece goods are fabrics woven in the proper lengths for certain purposes rather than lengths cut off from a long bolt.

Pieces of Eight. The old Spanish silver peso (piastre) or dollar of 8 reals, equivalent to about 1s. 8d. It was marked with an 8, and was in use in the 17th and 18th centuries.

Pied (pē ā) Fr., foot. Pied-a-terre (pē ā da tār) (Fr., foot on the ground). A temporary lodging, or a country residence; a footing.

Mr. Harding, however, did not allow himself to be talked over into giving up his own and only pied-à-terre in the High Street.—ANTHONY TROLLOPE: Barchester Towers.

Pied de la lettre, Au (Fr., to the foot of the letter). Quite literally—close to the letter.

A wild enthusiastic young fellow, whose opinions one must not take au pied de la lettre.—THACKERAY: Pendennis, I, xi.

Pied Piper of Hamelin. The legend is that the town of Hamelin (Westphalia) was infested with rats in 1284, that a mysterious Piper, clad in a parti-coloured suit, appeared in the town and offered to rid it of the vermin for a certain sum, that the townspeople accepted the offer, the Pied Piper fulfilled his contract, and that then the payment was withheld. On the following St. John's Day he reappeared, and again played his pipe. This time all the children of the town, in place of the rats, followed him; he led them to a mountain cave where all disappeared save two—one blind, the other dumb, or lame; and one legend adds that the children did not perish in the mountain, but were led over it to Transylvania, where they formed a German colony. The story is familiar from Robert Browning's poem.

To blow the pipe his lips he wrinkled,
And green and blue his sharp eyes twinkled . . .
And ere three notes his pipe had uttered . . .
Out of the houses rats came tumbling—
Great rats, small rats, lean rats, brawny rats,
Brown rats, black rats, grey rats, tawny rats . . .
And step by step they followed him dancing,
Till they came to the river Weser.

Piepowder Court. A court of justice formerly held at fairs, which had summary powers in cases of dispute between those buyers and sellers who were there temporarily. Literally, a "wayfarer's court," piepowder being from Fr. pied-poudreux, dusty-footed (also, a vagabond). The duties of these old Courts of Piepowder are now performed at the Petty Sessions.

Is this well, goody Joan, to interrupt my market in the midst, and call away my customers? Can you answer this at the pie-poudres?—BEN JONSON: Bartholomew Fair, iii, 1.

Pierrot (pēr' ô) (i.e. "Little Peter"). A character originally in French mime, representing a man in growth and a child in mind and manners. He is generally the tallest and thinnest man that can be got, has his face and hair covered with white powder or flour, and wears a white gown with very long sleeves and a row of big buttons down the front.

Piers Plowman. See VISION OF PIERS PLOWMAN.

Pietà (pē ā ta'). A representation of the Virgin embracing the dead body of her Son. Filial or parental love was called pietas by the Romans.

Pietists (pi'e tists). A 17th-century sect of Lutherans who sought to introduce a more moral life and a more "evangelical" spirit of doctrine into the reformed church. In Germany the word is about equal to our common use of Methodist.

Pig (see also Hog). The pig was held sacred by the ancient Cretans because Jupiter was suckled by a sow; it was immolated in the mysteries of Eleusis; was sacrificed to Hercules, to Venus, and to the Lares by all those who sought relief from bodily ailments. The sow was sacrificed to Ceres "because it taught men to turn up the earth"; and in Egypt it was slain at grand weddings on account of its fecundity.

In the forefeet of pigs are very small holes which may be seen when the hair has been carefully removed. The tradition is that the legion of devils entered by these apertures. There are also round it some six rings, the whole together not larger than a small spangle; they look as if burnt or branded into the skin, and the tradition is that they are the marks of the devil's claws when he entered the swine (Mark v, 11-15).

A pig in a poke. A blind bargain. The reference is to a common trick in days gone by of trying to palm off on a greenhorn a cat for a sucking-pig. If he opened the poke or sack he "let the cat out of the bag," and the trick was disclosed. The French chat en poche (from which the saying may have come) refers to the fact, while our proverb regards the trick. Pocket is diminutive of poke.

A pig's whisper. A very short space of time; properly a grunt—which doesn't take long.

You'll find yourself in bed in something less than a pig's whisper.—DICKENS: Pickwick, ch. xxxi.

Bartholomew pigs. See BARTHOLOMEW.

He has brought his pigs to a pretty market. He has made a very bad bargain; he has managed his business in a very bad way. Pigs were for long a principal article of sale with rustics, and till recently the cottager looked to pay his rent by the sale of his pigs.

Pig-a-back. See PICK-A-BACK.

Pig-headed. Obstinate, contrary.

Pig iron. Iron cast in oblong ingots now called pigs but formerly sows. Sow is now applied to the main channel in which the molten liquid runs, the smaller branches which diverge from it being called pigs, and it is the iron from these which is called pig iron.

Pigs and whistles. Trifles. To go to pigs and whistles is to be ruined, to go to the deuce.

I would be nane surprised to hear the morn that the Nebuchadnezzar was a' gane to pigs and whistles, and driven out with the divors bill to the barren pastures of bankruptcy.—GALT: The Entail, I, ix.

Pigs in clover. People who have money but don't know how to behave themselves decently. Also, a game consisting of a box divided into recesses into which one has to roll marbles by tilting the box.

Please the pigs. "I'll come on Tuesday—please the pigs"; i.e. if circumstances permit. Deo volente. The suggestions that this phrase was originally "please the pyx" or "please the pixies," are ingenious, but there is no evidence to back them.

St. Anthony's pig. See ANTHONY.

The Pig and Tinderbox. An old colloquial name for the Elephant and Castle public-house; in allusion to its sign of a pig-like elephant surmounted by an erection intended to represent a castle but which might pass as a tinderbox.

To drive one's pigs to market. See Hog.

To drive pigs. To snore.

To pig together. To huddle together like pigs in a sty. To share and share alike, especially in lodgings in a small way; formerly it meant to sleep two (or more) in the same bed.

To stare like a stuck pig. With open mouth and staring eyes, as a pig that is being killed; in the utmost astonishment, mingled sometimes with fear.

When pigs fly. Never. See also Sow.

Pigskin. A saddle, the best being made of pigskin. "To throw a leg across a pigskin" is to mount a horse.

Pigtail. In England the word first appeared (17th century) as the name of a tobacco that was twisted into a thin rope; and it was used of the plait of twisted hair worn by sailors till the early 19th century, as it still is used of that worn by schoolgirls.

When the Mongols invaded and conquered China (c. 1660) they imposed on the Chinese as a sign of servitude the obligation of wearing their hair in a pigtail. This custom was observed by Chinese of whatever grade or class until the fall of the Empire in 1912, when their freedom from this vassalage was symbolized by the abolition of the pigtail.

Pig-wife. A woman who sells crockery. A piggin was a small pail, especially a milk-pail; and a pig a small bowl, cup, or mug.

Pigeon. Slang for a dupe, an easily gullible person, a gull (q.v.). To pigeon is to cheat or gull one out of his money by almost self-evident hoaxes. Pigeons are very easily caught by snares, and in the sporting world rogues and their dupes are called "rooks and pigeons." Thackeray has a story entitled "Captain Rook and Mr. Pigeon."

To pluck a pigeon. To cheat a gullible person of his money; to fleece a greenhorn.

Flying the pigeons. Stealing coals from a cart or sack between the coal-dealer's yard and the house of the customer.

Pigeon English. An incorrect form of "Pidgin-English" (q.v.).

Pigeon-hole. A small compartment for filing papers; hence, a matter that has been put on one side and forgotten is often said to have been pigeonholed. In pigeon-lockers a small hole is left for the pigeons to walk in and out.

Pigeon-livered. Timid, easily frightened, like a pigeon.

It cannot be
But I am pigeon-liver'd, and lack gall
To make oppression bitter, or ere this
I should have fatted all the region kites
With this slave's offal.

Hamlet, ii, 2.

Pigeon pair. Boy and girl twins. It was once supposed that pigeons always sit on two eggs which produce a male and a female, and these twin birds live together in love the rest of their lives.

The black pigeons of Dodona. Two black pigeons, we are told, took their flight from Thebes, in Egypt; one flew, to Libya, and the other to Dodona (q.v.). On the spot where the former alighted, the temple of Jupiter Ammon was erected; in the place where the other settled, the oracle of Jupiter was established, and there the responses were made by the black pigeons that inhabited the surrounding groves. This fable is probably based on a pun upon the word peleiai, which usually meant "old women," but in the dialect of the Epirots signified pigeons or doves.

Piggin. See PIG-WIFE above.

Pigmies. See PYGMIES.

Pigwiggen. An elf in Drayton's Nymphidia (1627), in love with Queen Mab. He combats the jealous Oberon with great fury.

Pigwiggen was this Fairy Knight,
One wond'rous gracious in the sight
Of fair Queen Mab, which day and night
He amorously observed.

Pike. The Germans have a tradition that when Christ was crucified all fishes dived under the waters in terror, except the pike, which, out of curiosity, lifted up its head and beheld the whole scene; hence the fancy that in a pike's head all the parts of the Crucifixion are represented, the cross, three nails, and a sword being distinctly recognizable. Cp. PASSION-FLOWER.

Pikestaff. Plain as a pikestaff. Quite obvious and unmistakable. The earlier form of the phrase (mid-16th century) was plain as a pack-staff, i.e. the staff on which a pedlar carried his pack, which was worn plain and smooth.

O Lord! what absurdities! as plain as any packstaff.
—DRYDEN: Amphitryon, III, 1.

Pilate. Tradition has it that Pontius Pilate's later life was so full of misfortune that, in Caligula's time, he committed suicide in Rome. His body was cast into the Tiber, but evil spirits disturbed the water so much that it was retrieved and taken to Vienne, where it was thrown into the Rhone, eventually coming to rest in the recesses of a lake on Mount Pilatus (q.v.) opposite Lucerne. Another legend states that the suicide occurred so that he might escape the sentence of death passed on him by Tiberius because of his having ordered the crucifixion of Christ; and yet another that both he and his wife became penitent, embraced Christianity, and died peaceably in the faith.

Tradition gives the name Claudia Procula, or Procla, to Pilate's wife, and by some she has been identified with the Claudia of 2 Tim. iv, 21.

Pilate voice. A loud, ranting voice. In the old mysteries all tyrants were made to speak in a rough, ranting manner. Thus Bottom the Weaver (q.v.), after a rant "to show his quality," exclaims, "That's 'Ercles' vein, a tyrant's vein"; and Hamlet describes a ranting actor as "out-heroding Herod."

The Miller, that for-drunken was al pale . . .

. . . in Pilates vois he gan to crye,
And swoor by armes and by blood and bones,
"I can a noble tale for the nones
With which I wol now quyte the Knightes tale."

CHAUCER: Miller's Prologue, 12-19.

Pilatus, Mount. In Switzerland, between the canton of Lucerne and Unterwalden. So called because during westerly winds it is covered with a white "cap" of cloud (Lat. pileatus, covered with the pileus, or felt cap). The similarity of the name with that of Pilate (q.v.) gave rise to one of the legends mentioned above; another tradition has it that Pilate was banished to Gaul by Tiberius, wandered to this mount and threw himself into a black lake on its summit, and it is further stated that once a year Pilate appears on the mountain and that whoever sees the ghost will die before the year is out. In the 16th century a law was passed forbidding anyone to throw stones into the lake, for fear of bringing a tempest on the country.

Pilgarlic or Pill'd Garlic (pil' gar lik). A 16th-century term for a bald-headed man, especially one whose hair had fallen off through disease, and had left a head that was suggestive of a bit of peeled garlic. Stow says of one getting bald: "He will soon be a peeled garlic like myself"; and the term was later used of any poor wretch avoided and forsaken by his fellows, and, in a humorous or self-pitying way, of oneself.

After this [feast] we jogged off to bed for the night; but never a bit could poor pilgarlic sleep one wink, for the everlasting jingle of bells.—RABELAIS: Pantagruel, v, 7.

Pilgrim Fathers. The term applied to the English founders of Plymouth Colony, Massachusetts, in 1620. They belonged to the church founded at Leyden by John Robinson. Having obtained a grant of land in New Jersey they came over from Holland and sailed from Plymouth in the Mayflower on September 6th, 1620. The party consisted of 78 men and 24 women. By stress of weather they were compelled to land on the coast of Massachusetts on December 21st, far north of the territory granted to them, and here they founded Plymouth Colony.

The Pilgrims is a club founded in their honour in 1902, with two branches, one in London and the other in New York.

Pilgrimage. A journey to a sacred place undertaken as an act of religious devotion, either simply to venerate it or to ask for the fulfilment of some prayer, or as an act of penance. It is not penitential necessarily, nor need it be performed under conditions of physical discomfort or with great solemnity, hence it can be performed by train or motor with as great reverence as if done barefoot. The chief places in the West were Walsingham and Canterbury (England); Fourvière, Puy, and St. Denis (France); Rome, Loretto, and Assisi (Italy); Compostella, Guadalupe, and Montserrat (Spain); Oetting, Zell, Cologne, Trier, and Einsiedeln (Germany).

The Pilgrimage of Grace. The rising on behalf of the Catholics that broke out in Lincolnshire in the autumn of 1536. It quickly assumed large proportions, but was finally extinguished in March, 1537, by the Council of the North, over 70 of the rebels being executed. Robert Aske, the Archbishop of York, Lord Darcy, and the Percys were the principal leaders.

Pill. To gild the pill. To soften the blow; to make a disagreeable task less offensive, as pills were to be gilded (and as now sugar-coated) to make them more pleasant to the taste and sight.

Pillar. From pillar to post. Hither and thither; from one thing to another without any definite purpose; harassed and worried. The phrase was originally from post to pillar, and comes from the old tennis-courts in allusion to the banging about of the balls.

Pillar Saints. See STYLITES.

The Pillars of Hercules. The opposite rocks at the entrance of the Mediterranean, one in Spain and the other in Africa. The tale is that they were bound together till Hercules tore them asunder in order to get to Gades (Cadiz). The ancients called them Calpe and Abyla; we call them Gibraltar and Mount Aghio, on which stands the fortress of Ceuta. Macrobius ascribes the feat of making the division to Sesostri (the Egyptian Hercules), Lucan follows the same tradition; and the Phœnicians are said to have set on the opposing rocks two large pyramidal columns to serve as seamarks, one dedicated to Hercules and the other to Astarte.

I will follow you even to the pillars of Hercules. To the end of the world. The ancients supposed that these rocks marked the utmost limits of the habitable globe.

Pillory (pil' ôr i). Punishment by the pillory was not finally abolished in England till 1837, but since 1815 it had been in force only for perjury. In Delaware, U.S.A., it was a legal punishment down to 1905. In France it was abolished in 1848.

The following eminent men have been put in the pillory for literary offences:—Leighton, for tracts against Charles I; Lilburn, for circulating the tracts of Dr. Bastwick; Bastwick, for attacking the Church of England; Wharton the publisher; Prynne, for a satire on the wife of Charles I; Daniel Defoe, for a pamphlet entitled The Shortest Way with Dissenters, etc.

Pilot. Through Fr. from Ital. pilota, formerly pedota, which is probably connected with Gr. pêdon, a rudder.

Pilot balloon. A small balloon sent up to try the wind; hence, figuratively, a feeler; a hint thrown out to ascertain public opinion on some point.

Pilot engine. The leading engine when two are needed to draw a railway train; also an engine sent ahead of a train carrying important personages, etc., to ensure that the line is clear.

Pilot fish. The small sea-fish, Naucrates ductor, so called because it is supposed to pilot the shark to its prey.

The pilot that weathered the storm. William Pitt, son of the first Earl of Chatham. George Canning, in 1802, wrote a song so called in compliment to him, for his having steered his country safely through the European storm stirred up by Napoleon.

Pilpay or Bidpay (pil pā'). The name given as that of the author of Kalilah and Dimnah (otherwise known as The Fables of Pilpay), which is the 8th-century Arabic version of the Sanskrit Panchatantra. The word is not a true name, but means "wise man" (Arab. bidbah), and was applied to the chief scholar at the court of an Indian prince.

Pimlico (pim' li kō) (London). At one time a district of public gardens much frequented on holidays. It received its name from Ben Pimlico, famous in the late 16th and early 17th centuries for his nut-brown ale, who had a tavern at Hoxton and, later, one in the neighbourhood of Chelsea.

Have at thee, then, my merrie boyes, and beg for old Ben Pimlico's nut-brown ale —Newses from Hogsdon (1598)

Pin. The original pin (A.S. pinn, connected with pinnacle) was a small tapered peg of wood, horn, metal, etc. In various forms pins were used by all peoples of antiquity, and it is a mistake to suppose that pins were invented in the reign of François I, and introduced into England by Catherine Howard, fifth wife of Henry VIII. In 1347, 200 years before the death of François, 12,000 pins were delivered from the royal wardrobe for the use of the Princess Joan.

At a pin's fee. At an extremely low estimate; valueless.

I do not set my life at a pin's fee.

Hamlet, i, 4.

I don't care a pin, or a pin's point. In the least.

SPENSER: Fæerie Queene, i, v, 4.

I do not pin my faith upon your sleeve. I am not going to take your ipse dixit for gospel. In feudal times badges were worn, and the partisans of a leader used to wear his badge, which was pinned on the sleeve. Sometimes these badges were changed for some reason, hence, people learned to be chary of judging by appearances, and would say—"You wear the badge, but I do not intend to pin my faith on your sleeve."

In merry pin. In merry mood, in good spirits.

His friend in merry pin,

Return'd him not a single word,

But to the house went in.

COWPER: John Gilpin, st. 45.

The origin of the term is not certain; it may be in reference to the pin or key of a stringed instrument by which it is kept to the right pitch, or it may be an allusion to the pins or pegs of peg-tankards (see PEG—I am a peg too low). By the rules of "good fellowship" a drinker was supposed to stop drinking only at a pin, and if he went beyond it, was to drink to the next one. As it was hard to stop exactly at the pin, the effort gave rise to much mirth, and the drinker had generally to drain the tankard.

No song, no laugh, no jovial din

Of drinking wassail to the pin.

LONGFELLOW: Golden Legend.

Not worth a pin. Wholly worthless.

Pin money. A woman's allowance of money for her own personal expenditure. At one time pins were a great expense, and in 14th- and 15th-century wills there are often special bequests for the express purpose of buying pins; when they became cheap and common the women spent their allowance on other fancies, but the term pin money remained in vogue.

Miss Hoyden: Now, nurse, if he gives me two hundred a year to buy pins, what do you think he'll give me to buy fine petticoats?

Nurse: Ah, my dearest, he deceives thee foully, and he's no better than a rogue for his pains! These Londoners have got a gibberage with 'em would confound a gipsy. That which they call pin-money is to buy their wives everything in the varsal world, down to their very shoe-ties.—VANBRUGH: The Relapse, v, 5 (1697).

Pins and needles. The tingling sensation that comes over a limb when it has been numbed, or "asleep."

On pins and needles. "On thorns," "on edge"; in a state of fearful expectation or great uneasiness.

Policy of pin pricks. A policy of petty annoyances. The term came into prominence during the strained relations between England and France in 1898, and is an Anglicization of the very much older French phrase, un coup d'épingle.

There's not a pin to choose between them. They're as like as two peas, practically no difference.

To tirl at the pin. See TIRL.

Weak on his pins. Weak in his legs, the legs being a man's "pegs" or supporters.

You could have heard a pin drop. Said of a state—especially a sudden state in the midst of din—of complete silence. Leigh Hunt speaks of "a pin-drop silence" (Rimini, I, 144).

Pin-table. A popular game depending partly on skill but mostly on chance in which balls are shot up an inclined table and touch various pins when rolling back, scoring points according to the pins they strike. It is usually combined with a penny-in-the-slot machine which deals the players an allotted number of balls.

Pin-up Girl. In World War II the forces used to pin up in their billets, etc., pictures of film stars, actresses, or their own particular girls. The phrase seems to have come into use in the U.S.A. in 1941.

Pinch. A pinch for stale news. A punishment for telling as news what is well known.

At a pinch. In an urgent case; if hard pressed. There are things that one cannot do in the ordinary way, but that one may manage "at a pinch."

To be pinched for money. To be in financial straits, hard up. Hence, to pinch and scrape, or to pinch it, to economize.

To pinch. Slang for to steal.

Where the shoe pinches. See SHOE.

Pinch-hitter. A person who substitutes for another in a crisis. The term is from the game of Baseball where the pinch-hitter—a man who always hits the ball hard—is put in to bat when his team is in desperate straits.

Pinchbeck. An alloy of copper (5 parts) and zinc (1 part), closely resembling gold. So called from Christopher Pinchbeck (1670-1732), a manufacturer of trinkets, watches and jewellery in Fleet Street, London. The term is used figuratively of anything spurious, of deceptive appearance, or low quality.

Pindar (Pinder or Pinner) of Wakefield. See GEORGE-A-GREEN. A pinder was one who impounded straying cattle and looked after the pound.

Pindaric Verse (pin dar' ik). Irregular verse; a poem of various metres, and of lofty style, in imitation of the odes of Pindar. Alexander's Feast, by Dryden, and The Bard, by Gray, are examples.

Pine-tree State. Maine, which has forests of these trees, and bears a pine-tree on its coat of arms.

Pink. The flower is so called because the edges of the petals are pinked or notched. The verb to pink means to pierce or perforate, also to ornament dress material by punching holes in it so that the lining can be seen, scalloping the edges, etc. In the 17th century it was commonly used of stabbing an adversary, especially in a duel.

In pink. In the scarlet coat of a fox-hunter. The colour is not pink, but no hunting man would call it anything else. Cp. REDCOATS.

In the pink. In a first-rate state of health; flourishing (cp. next).

The pink of perfection. The flower or very acme of perfection. In the same way Shakespeare (Romeo and Juliet, ii, 4) has "the pink of courtesy."

Pinkerton. Pinkerton's National Detective Agency was founded in Chicago, in 1852, by Allan Pinkerton, a deputy sheriff of Kane County, Ill., who had proved himself a detective of some resource. The Agency became well known through investigating industrial disputes, but it was in the Civil War that it came to the forefront of such activities. In 1861 a plot to assassinate President-Elect Lincoln at Baltimore was laid bare by Pinkerton's men. During this war Pinkerton devised a method of obtaining military and political information from the Southern States, and eventually organized the Federal Secret Service. Pinkerton's most sensational coups were the discovery of the thieves of $700,000 stolen from the Adams Express in 1866, and the breaking-up of the Molly Maguires (1877), an Irish-American secret society with many subversive and lawless deeds to their discredit.

Pious. The Romans called a man who revered his father pius; hence Antoninus was called Pius, because he requested that his adoptive father (Hadrian) might be ranked among the gods. Aeneas was called Pius because he rescued his father from the burning city of Troy. The Italian word pietà (q.v.) has a similar meaning.

Robert, son of Hugues Capet. (971, 996-1031.)

Louis I of France. See DFBONAIR.

Eric IX of Sweden. (d. 1161)

Frederick III, Elector Palatine. (1575-76.)

Pip. The pips on cards and dice were named from the seeds of fruit (earlier peep, origin obscure). This is merely an abbreviated form of pippin, which denoted the seed long before it denoted apples raised from seed. To be piped is to be blackballed or defeated, the black ball being the "pip."

Pip emma. Soldier slang in World War I for P.M. Originally telephonese, as on the phone "twelve pip emma" cannot be misunderstood, whereas "twelve p.m." might be. In the same way ack emma stands for A.M.

To have or get the pip. To be thoroughly "fed up," downhearted, and miserable. Probably connected with the poultry disease which causes fowls to pine away.

To get one's second pip. To be promoted from second to first lieutenant. These army ranks are marked by "pips" on the shoulderstraps.

Pipe. As you pipe, I must dance. I must accommodate myself to your wishes. "He who pays the piper calls the tune."

Piping hot. Hot as water which pipes or sings; hence, new, only just out.

Piping times of peace (Shakespeare, Richard III, i, 1). Times when there was no thought of war, and the pastoral pipe instead of the martial trumpet was heard on the village greens.

Put that in your pipe and smoke it. Digest that, if you can. An expression used by one who has given an adversary a severe rebuke.

The pipe of peace. See CALUMET.

To pipe one's eye. To snivel, weep.

To put one's pipe out. To spoil his piping; to make him change his key or sing a different tune; to "take his shine out."

Pipeclay. Routine; fossilized military dogmas of no real worth, such as excessive attention to correctness in dress, drill, etc. (Cp. RED TAPE.) Pipeclay was at one time largely used by soldiers for whitening their gloves, belts and other accoutrements.

Pipe-laying. (U.S.A.) Swaying the issue in an election by slipping in voters who are not on the electoral roll.

Pipe Rolls or Great Rolls of the Pipe. The series of Great Rolls of the Exchequer, beginning 2 Henry II, and continued to 1834, and probably so called either because of the cylindrical shape of the Rolls, or because they were kept in pipe-like cases. The Pipe Rolls form a magnificent series of documents, and contain complete accounts of the Crown revenues as rendered by the Sheriffs of the different counties. They are now in the Public Record Office, Chancery Lane.

Office of the Clerk of the Pipe. A very ancient office in the Court of Exchequer, where leases of Crown lands, sheriffs' accounts, etc., were made out. It existed in the reign of Henry II, and was abolished in the reign of William IV.

Piper, Piper's news. Stale news; "fiddler's news" (q.v.).

The Pied Piper. See PIED.

Tom Piper. So the piper is called in the morris dance.

The Piper referred to by Drayton seems to have been a sort of jongleur or raconteur of short tales.

Tom Piper is gone out, and mirth bewailes,
He never will come in to tell us tales.

Who's to pay the piper? See PAY.

Pippin. See PIP.

Piqué (pē' kâ). The art of inlaying gold or silver in another material, such as tortoiseshell or ivory.

Pirie's Chair. "The lowest seat o' hell."

In Pirie's chair you'll sit, I say,

The lowest seat o' hell;

If ye do not amend your ways,

It's there that ye must dwell.

Child's English and Scottish Ballads:

The Courteous Knight.

Pis-aller (pēs āl' ā) (Fr., worst course). A make-shift; something for want of a better; a dernier ressort.

Piso's Justice (pī' zō). Verbally right, but morally wrong. Seneca tells us that Piso condemned a man on circumstantial evidence for murder; but when the suspect was at the place of execution, the man supposed to have been murdered appeared. The centurion sent the prisoner to Piso, and explained the case to him; whereupon Piso condemned all three to death, saying, Fiat justitia (Lat., let justice be done). The condemned man was executed because sentence of death had been passed upon him, the centurion because he had disobeyed orders, and the man supposed to have been murdered because he had been the cause of death to two innocent men, and fiat justitia ruat cælum (let justice be done though the heavens should fall).

Pistol. Formerly pistolet; so called from the old pistolese, a dagger or hanger for the manufacture of which Pistoia, in Tuscany, was famous.

Pocket pistol. See POCKET.

To fire one's pistol in the air. Purposely to refrain from injuring an adversary. The phrase is often used of argument, and refers to the old practice of duellers doing this when they wished to discharge a "debt of honour" without incurring risks.

Pit-a-pat. My heart goes pit-a-pat. Throbs, palpitates. An echo or a mere ricochet word, of which there are a great many in English—as "fiddle-faddle," "harum-scarum," "ding-dong," etc.

Anything like the sound of a rat

Makes my heart go pit-a-pat.

BROWNING. Pied Piper of Hamelin.

Pitcairn Island, in the South Pacific, was the first home of the mutineers of the Bounty (q.v.).

Pitch. The black resinous substance gets its name from Lat. pix; the verb (to fling, settle, etc.) is the M.E. pichen, pykken.

A pitched battle. One for which both sides have made deliberate preparations.

Pitch and pay. Pay up at once. There is a suppressed pun in the phrase: "to pay a ship" is to pitch it.

The word is pitch and pay—trust none.

Henry V, ii, 3.

Pitch and toss. A game in which coins are pitched at a mark, the player getting nearest having the right to toss all the others' coins into the air and take those that come down with heads up. Hence, to play pitch and toss with one's money, prospects, etc., is to gamble recklessly, to play ducks and drakes.

The bounding pinnace played a game

Of dreary pitch and toss;

A game that, on the good dry land,

Is apt to bring a loss

THOS. HOOD. The Sea Spell.

To pitch into one. To assail him vigorously; to give it him hot.

Touch pitch, and you will be defiled. "The finger that touches rouge will be red." "Evil communications corrupt good manners." "A rotten apple injures its companions." Shakespeare introduces the proverb in Much Ado (iii, 3).

Pitcher. From Lat. picarium or bicarium; the word is a doublet of BEAKER (q.v.).

Little pitchers have long ears. Little folk or children hear what is said when you little think it. The ear of a pitcher is the handle, made somewhat in the shape of a man's ear.

The pitcher went once too often to the well. The dodge was tried once too often, and utterly failed. The sentiment is proverbial in most European languages.

Pithecanthrope (pith e kăn' thrōp). The name given by Haeckel in 1868 to the hypothetical "missing link" (q.v.); from Gr. pithekos, ape, and anthropos, man. Later, Pithecanthropus was the generic name given to the remains of the extinct man-like ape discovered in the Pliocene of Java in 1891.

Pitt Diamond. A diamond of just under 137 carats found at the Parateal mines, India, and bought by Thomas Pitt (see DIAMOND PITT) in 1702 from a thief for a sum (said to have been £20,400) far below its real value. Hence Pope's reference—

Asleep and naked as an Indian lay,

An honest factor stole a gem away.

Moral Essays, Ep. iii, 361.

Pitt sold the diamond in 1717 to the Regent Orleans (hence it is also called the "Regent Diamond") for £135,000; it later adorned the sword-hilt of Napoleon, and is still in the possession of France. Its original weight before cutting was 410 carats.

Pitt's Pictures. "Blind" windows used to be so called, because many windows were blocked up when William Pitt augmented the window tax in 1784, and again in 1797.

Pixie or Pixy (pik' si). A sprite or fairy of folklore, especially in Cornwall and Devon, where some hold pixies to be the spirits of infants who have died before baptism. The Pixy monarch has his court like Oberon, and sends his subjects on their several tasks. The word is probably Celtic, but its history is unknown.

Place. Place-maker's Bible. See BIBLE.

Placer. An area where surface mining (for gold or silver) is carried out. The word is of Spanish origin, the plural being placeras.

Place aux dames (Fr.). Make way for the ladies; ladies first.

Placebo (pläs ē' bō) (Lat., I shall please, or be acceptable). Vespers for the dead; because the first antiphon at Vespers of the Office of the Dead began with the words Placebo Domino in regione vivorum, I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living (Ps. cxvi, 9).

As sycophants and those who wanted to get something out of the relatives of the departed used to make a point of attending this service and singing the Placebo the phrase to sing Placebo came to mean "to play the flatterer or sycophant"; and Chaucer (who in the Merchant's Tale gives this as a name to a parasite) has—

Flatereres been the develes chapelleyns that singen evere Placebo.—Parson's Tale, § 40.

Plagiarist (plā' jă rist), one who appropriates another's ideas, etc., in literature, music, and so on, means strictly one who kidnaps a slave (Lat. plagiarius). Martial applies the word to the kidnappers of other men's brains.

Plain, The. The Girondists were so called in the French Revolutionary National Convention, because they sat on the level floor or plain of the hall. After their overthrow this part of the House was called the marais or swamp, and included such members as were under the control of the Mountain (q.v.).

It's all plain sailing. It's perfectly straightforward; there need be no hesitation about the course of action. A nautical phrase which should be written plane, not plain. Plane sailing is the art of determining a ship's position on the assumption that the earth is flat and she is sailing, therefore, on a plane, instead of a spherical surface, which is a simple and easy method of computing distances.

Plains Indians is the name given by ethnographers to the Indian tribes of the central prairie areas of North America from Alberta to Texas—the land, indeed, once ranged over by the American bison or buffalo on which the Plains Indians largely subsisted. The Plains Indians are the Redskins of romance, with their feather bonnets, tepees, and pipes of peace—the Dakotas, Blackfeet, Cheyennes, Comanches, Pawnees, Apaches, and many others.

Planets. The heavenly bodies that revolve round the sun in approximately circular orbits; so called from Gr. (through Lat. and O.Fr.) planasthai, to wander, because, to the ancients, they appeared to wander about among the stars instead of having fixed places.

The primary planets are Mercury, Venus, the Earth, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, Neptune, Uranus, and Pluto (disc. in 1930); these are known as the major planets, the asteroids between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter being the minor planets.

The secondary planets are the satellites, or moons, revolving round a primary.

Mercury and Venus are called Inferior Planets because their orbits are nearer to the sun than the Earth's; the remaining planets are Superior Planets.

Only five of the planets were known to the ancients (the Earth, of course, not being reckoned), viz. Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn; but to these were added the Sun and the Moon, making seven in all. Among the astrologers and alchemists

THE SUN (APOLLO)	represented	Gold.
THE MOON (DIANA)	"	Silver.
MERCURY	"	Quicksilver.
VENUS	"	Copper.
MARS	"	Iron.
JUPITER	"	Tin.
SATURN	"	Lead.

In heraldry the arms of royal personages used to be blazoned by the names of planets (see HERALDRY).

Planet-struck. A blighted tree is said to be planet-struck. Epilepsy, paralysis, lunacy, etc., are attributed to the malignant aspects of the planets. Horses are said to be planet-struck when they seem stupefied, whether from want of food, colic, or stoppage.

They with speed

Their course through thickest constellations held,
Spreading their bane; the blasted stars looked wan,
And planets, planet-strook, real eclipse
Then suffered. MILTON: Paradise Lost, x, 410.

To be born under a lucky (or unlucky) planet. According to astrology, some planet, at the birth of every individual, presides over his destiny. Some of the planets, like Jupiter, are lucky; and others, like Saturn, are unlucky. See HOUSES, ASTROLOGICAL.

Plank, A. Any one portion or principle of a political platform (q.v.).

To walk the plank. To be put to the supreme test; also, to be about to die. Walking the plank was a mode of disposing of prisoners at sea, much in vogue among pirates in the 17th century.

Plantagenet (plān tāj' e net), from planta genista (broom-plant), the family cognizance first assumed by Geoffrey, Count of Anjou (d. 1151), during a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, as a symbol of humility. By his wife Matilda, daughter of Henry I of England, he was father of Henry II, the founder of the House of Plantagenet.

The House of Plantagenet. Henry II and the English kings descended in the direct male line from him, viz. —

Henry II	Edward I
Richard I	Edward II
John	Edward III
Henry III	Richard II

They reigned from 1154 to 1399. Cp. ANGEVIN.

Plate. In horse-racing, the gold or silver cup forming the prize; hence the race for such a prize.

Selling plate. A race in which owners of starters have to agree beforehand that the winner shall be sold at a previously fixed price.

Plates of meat. Rhyming slang for "feet"; often abbreviated to plates.

Platform. The policy or declaration of the policy of a political party, that on which the party stands, each separate principle being called a plank of the platform.

In this sense the word is an Americanism dating from rather before the middle of last century; but in earlier Elizabethan times and later it was used of a plan or scheme of Church government and of political action.

Queen Elizabeth, in answer to the Supplication of the Puritans (offered to the Parliament in 1586), said she "had examined the platform and accounted it most prejudicial to the religion established, to her crown, her government, and her subjects."

Platonic (plā ton' ik). Pertaining to or ascribed to Plato, the great Greek philosopher (d. about 347 B.C.) who taught a form of Idealism that attributed real Being to general concepts or Ideas and denied the existence of individual things, the world of sense being an illusion, the world of thought all.

Platonic bodies. An old name for the five regular geometric solids described by Plato—viz. the tetrahedron, hexahedron, octahedron, dodecahedron, and icosahedron, all of which are bounded by like, equal, and regular planes.

Platonic love. Spiritual love between persons of opposite sexes; the friendship of man and woman, without anything sexual about it. The phrase is founded on a passage towards the end of the Symposium in which Plato was extolling not the non-sexual love of a man for a woman, but the loving interest that Socrates took in young men—which was pure, and therefore noteworthy in the Greece of the period.

I am convinced, and always was, that Platonic Love is Platonic nonsense.—RICHARDSON: Pamela, I, lxxviii.

The Platonic Year. The same as the Platonic Cycle. See under CYCLE.

Platonism is characterized by the doctrine of pre-existing eternal ideas, and teaches the immortality and pre-existence of the soul, the dependence of virtue upon discipline, and the trustworthiness of cognition.

Platt Deutsch (plāt doich). The colloquial German common to most points of North-west Germany, bearing some relationship to Dutch.

Plaudite (plaw' dit i) (Lat., "applaud, ye!"—hence our word plaudit). The appeal for applause at the conclusion of Roman plays, especially the comedies of Terence; hence the end of a play.

Here we may strike the Plaudite to our play; my lord Fool's gone; all our audience will forsake us.—CHAPMAN: Monsieur D'Olive, IV, ii.

Play. "This may be play to you, 'tis death to us." The allusion is to Æsop's fable of the boys throwing stones at some frogs.

As good as a play. Intensely amusing. It is said to have been the remark of Charles I when he attended the debate on Lord Ross's "Divorce Bill."

Played out. Exhausted; out of date; no longer in vogue.

Playing to the gallery, or to the gods. Appealing to the less cultured taste attributed to the common people; appealing to sensational rather than artistic taste.

The "gods" in theatrical phrase are the spectators in the uppermost gallery. The ceiling of Drury Lane Theatre—only just above the gallery—was at one time painted in imitation of the sky, with cupids and deities. In French this gallery is nicknamed paradis.

Playing possum. See POSSUM.

Pleader, Pleading. See SPECIAL PLEADING.

Plebeian (ple bē' ān). One of, or appertaining to, the common people; properly a free citizen of Rome, neither patrician nor client. Plebeians were, however, free landowners, and had their own "gentes."

Plebiscite (pleb' i sit). In Roman history, a law enacted by the "comitia" or assembly of tribes; nowadays it means the direct vote of the whole body of citizens of a State on some definite question.

In France, the resolutions adopted in the Revolution by the voice of the people, and the general votes given during the Second Empire—such as the general vote to elect Napoleon III emperor of the French were by plebiscite.

Pledge. To guarantee; to assign as security; hence, in drinking a toast, to give assurance of friendship by the act of drinking.

Drink to me only with thine eyes,
And I will pledge with mine.

BEN JONSON.

To take the pledge. To bind oneself by a solemn undertaking to abstain from intoxicating liquors; the pledge being the guarantee or security—one's pledged word.

Pleiades (plī' a dēz). The cluster of stars in the constellation Taurus, especially the seven larger ones out of the great number that compose the cluster; so called by the Greeks, possibly from plein, to sail, because they considered navigation safe at the return of the Pleiades, and never attempted it after those stars disappeared.

The Pleiades were the seven daughters of Atlas and Pleione. They were transformed into stars, one of which, Electra (q.v.), is invisible, some said out of shame, because she alone married a human being, while others held that she hides herself from grief for the destruction of the city and royal race of Troy. She is known as "the lost Pleiad":—

One of those forms which flit by us, when we
Are young, and fix our eyes on every face; . . .
Whose course and home we know not, nor shall know
Like the lost Pleiad seen no more below.

BYRON. Beppo, xiv.

The name The Pleiad has frequently been given to groups of seven specially illustrious persons, e.g.:—

The Seven Wise Men of Greece (q.v.), sometimes called the Philosophical Pleiad.

The Pleiad of Alexandria. A group of seven contemporary poets in the 3rd century B.C., viz. Callimachus, Apollonius of Rhodes, Aratus, Philiscus (called Homer the Younger), Lycophron, Nicander, and Theocritus.

Charlemagne's Pleiad, the group of scholars with which the Emperor surrounded himself, viz. Charlemagne (who, in this circle, was known as "David"), Alcuin ("Albinus"), Adelard ("Augustine"), Angilbert ("Homer"), Riculfe ("Dametas"), Varnefrid, and Eginhard.

The French Pleiad of the 16th century, who wrote poetry in the metres, style, etc., of the ancient Greeks and Romans. Of these, Ronsard was the leader, the others being Dorat, Du Bellay, Remi Belleau, Jodelle, Baif, and Pontus de Thyard.

The second French Pleiad. Seven contemporary poets in the reign of Louis XIII, very inferior to the "first Pleiad." They are Rapin, Commire, Larue, Santeuil, Ménage, Dupérier, and Petit.

Plimsoll Line or Mark. A circle with a horizontal line drawn through it, carried on both sides of all British merchant vessels. It indicates the maximum depth to which a vessel may be loaded and is named after Samuel Plimsoll (1824-98), M.P. for Derby, who brought about its compulsory adoption in view of the great loss of life at sea owing to overloaded vessels.

Plon-plon. The sobriquet of Prince Napoleon Joseph Charles Bonaparte (1822-91), son of Jerome Bonaparte, an adaptation of Crain-plon (Fear-bullet), the nickname he earned in the Crimean War.

Plough. Another name for the "Great Bear" (q.v.).

Fond, Fool, or White Plough. The plough dragged about a village on Plough Monday. Called white, because the mummers who drag it about are dressed in white, gaudily trimmed with flowers and ribbons. Called fond or fool, because the procession is fond or foolish—not serious, or of a business character.

Plough Monday. The first Monday after Twelfth Day is so called because it is the end of the Christmas holidays, and the day when men return to their plough or daily work. It was customary on this day for farm labourers to draw a plough from door to door of the parish, and solicit "plough-money" to spend in a frolic. The queen of the banquet was called Bessy. Cp. DISTAFF.

Speed the plough, or God speed the plough. A wish for success and prosperity in some undertaking. It is a very old phrase, and occurs as early as the 15th century in the song sung by the ploughmen on Plough Monday.

To be ploughed. To be "plucked" at an examination; to fail to pass.

To plough the sands. To engage in some altogether fruitless labour.

To plough with another's heifer. To use information obtained by unfair means, e.g. through a treacherous friend. A biblical phrase. When the men of Timnath gave Samson the answer to his riddle, he replied:—

If ye had not plowed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle.—Judges xiv, 18.

To put one's hand to the plough. To undertake a task; to commence operations in earnest. The man who starts ploughing and looks back is unable to plough a straight furrow; only by keeping one's eyes on an object ahead is it possible to plough straight.

And Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God.—Luke ix, 62.

Plover. Another old synonym for a dupe or "gull" (q.v.); also for a courtesan.

To live like a plover. To live on nothing, to live on air. Plovers, however, live on small insects and worms, which they hunt for in newly ploughed fields.

Plowden. "The case is altered," quoth Plowden. There is more than one story given by way of accounting for the origin of this old phrase—used by Jonson as the title of one of his comedies (1598). One of them says that Plowden was an unpopular priest, and, to get him into trouble, he was inveigled into attending mass performed by a layman. When impeached for so doing, the cunning priest asked the layman if it was he who officiated. "Yes," said the man. "And are you a priest?" said Plowden. "No," said the man. "Then," said Plowden, turning to the tribunal, "the case is altered, for it is an axiom with the Church, 'No priest, no mass.'"

Another story fathers the phrase on Edmund Plowden (1518-85), the great lawyer. He was asked what legal remedy there was against some hogs that had trespassed on complainant's ground. "There is very good remedy," began Plowden, but when told that they were his own hogs, said, "Nay, then, the case is altered."

Pluck, meaning courage, determination, was originally pugilistic slang of the late 18th century, and meant much the same as heart. A "pug" who was lacking in pluck was a coward, he hadn't the heart for his job; the pluck of an animal is the heart, liver, and lungs, that can be removed by one pull or pluck. Cp. the expressions bold heart, lily-livered, a man of another kidney, bowels of mercy, a vein of fun, it raised his bile, etc.

A rejected candidate at an examination is said to be plucked, because formerly at the Universities, when degrees were conferred and the names were read out before presentation to the Vice-Chancellor, the proctor walked once up and down the room, and anyone who objected might signify his dissent by plucking the proctor's gown. This was occasionally done by tradesmen to whom the candidate was in debt.

A plucked pigeon. One fleeced out of his money; one plucked by a rook or sharper.

There were no smart fellows whom fortune had troubled . . . no plucked pigeons or winged rooks, no disappointed speculators, no ruined miners.—SCOTT: Feveril of the Peak, ch. xi.

He's a plucked 'un. He's a plucky chap; there's no frightening him.

I'll pluck his goose for him. I'll cut his crest, lower his pride, make him eat humble pie. Comparing the person to a goose, the threat is to pluck off his feathers in which he prides himself.

Plug. Plug song. A song given publicity, e.g. on the wireless. To plug, in this connexion, is to publicize—sometimes to an extreme degree.

Plug ugly. A rowdy, unpleasant character, a term said to have originated in Baltimore.

Plum. Old slang for a very large sum of money (properly £100,000), or for its possession. Nowadays the figurative use of the word means the very best part of anything, the "pick of the basket," a windfall, or one of the prizes of life, as "The plums (i.e. the chief and highly paid positions) of the Civil Service should go by merit, not influence."

Plumes. In borrowed plumes. Assumed merit; airs and graces not merited. The allusion is to the fable of the jackdaw who dressed up in peacock's feathers.

To plume oneself on something. To be proud of it, conceited about it; to boast of it. A plume is a feather, and to plume oneself is to feather one's own conceit.

Mrs. Bute Crawley . . . plumed herself upon her resolute manner of performing [what she thought right] —THACKERAY: Vanity Fair.

Plump. To give all one's votes to a single candidate, or to vote for only one when one has the right to vote for more. The earlier phrase was to give a plumper, or to vote plump.

Plunger. One who plunges, i.e. gambles recklessly, and goes on when he can't afford it in the hope that his luck will turn. The 4th and last Marquis of Hastings was the first person so called by the turf. He was the original of Champagne Charlie and the most notorious spendthrift and wastrel of the mid-19th century, whose folly of squandering has become almost legendary. One night he played three games of draughts for £1,000 a game, and lost all three. He then cut a pack of cards for £500 a cut, and lost £5,000 in an hour and a half. He paid both debts before he left the room.

Plus ultra (plūs ūl' trā). The motto in the royal arms of Spain. It was once Ne plus ultra ("thus far and no farther"), in allusion to the pillars of Hercules, the ne plus ultra of the world; but after the discovery of America, and when Charles V inherited the crown of Aragon and Castile, with all the vast American possessions, he struck out ne, and assumed the words plus ultra for the national motto, the suggestion being that Spain can go farther.

Pluto (ploō' tō). The ruler of the infernal regions in Roman mythology, son of Saturn, brother of Jupiter and Neptune, and husband of Proserpine (q.v.); hence, the grave, the place where the dead go to before they are admitted into Elysium or sent to Tartarus.

Brothers, be of good cheer, this night we shall sup with Pluto.—Leonidas to the three hundred Spartans before the battle of Thermopylae.

Th' infernal powers

Covering your foe with cloud of deadly night,
Have borne him hence to Pluto's baleful bowers.

SPENSER: Faerie Queene, I, v, 14.

A Pluto of the 20th century is the large, amiable, and stupid dog who is the companion of Mickey Mouse in Walt Disney's animated cartoons.

In World War II Pluto was the code name (from the initials of Pipe Line Under The Ocean) given to the pipelines to carry petrol which were laid across the bed of the English Channel from England to France—from Sandown to Cherbourg and from Dungeness to Boulogne. In all, these Pluto lines covered a distance of 770 miles, and consisted of 23,000 tons of lead piping and 5,500 tons of steel piping. Much of this was recovered in 1949.

Plutonian or Plutonist. See VULCANIST.

Plutonic Rocks. Granites, certain porphyries and other igneous unstratified crystalline rocks, supposed to have been formed at a great depth and pressure, as distinguished from the volcanic rocks, which were formed near the surface. So called by Lyell from Pluto, as the lord of elemental fire.

Plutus (ploó' tus). In Greek mythology, the god of riches. Hence, Rich as Plutus, and plutocrat, one who exercises influence or possesses power through his wealth. The legend is that he was blinded by Zeus so that his gifts should be equally distributed and not go only to those who merited them.

Plymouth Brethren. A sect of Evangelical Christians that arose at Plymouth about 1830. They have no regular ministry, holding that national churches are too lax and dissenters too sectarian. Sometimes called "Darbyites" (q.v.) from John Nelson Darby (1800-82), their founder.

Pocahontas (pok á hon' tás). Daughter of Powhatan, an Indian chief of Virginia, born about 1595. She is said to have rescued Captain John Smith when her father was on the point of killing him. She subsequently married John Rolfe, one of the settlers at Jamestown, was baptized under the name of Rebecca, and in 1616 was brought to England, where she became an object of curiosity and frequent allusion in contemporary literature. She died at Gravesend in 1617.

The blessed
Pocahontas, as the historian calls her,
And great king's daughter of Virginia. . . .
BEN JONSON: Staple of News, II, 1 (1625).

Pocket. The word is used by airmen to denote a place where a sudden drop or acceleration is experienced, owing to a local variation in air-pressure.

Pocket battleship. A small, heavily armoured warship built in accordance with the limiting terms of a treaty. By the Treaty of Versailles Germany was forbidden to build battleships of over 10,000 tons. In consequence she constructed several formidable battleships which purported to be within this limit, though it was discovered later that they were not.

Pocket borough. A parliamentary borough where the influence of the magnate was so powerful as to be able to control the election of any candidate.

Pocket judgment. A bond under the hand of a debtor, countersigned by the sovereign. It could be enforced without legal process, but for long has fallen into disuse.

Pocket pistol. Colloquial for a flask carried in "self-defence," because we may be unable to get a dram on the road.

Pocket veto. When the President of the U.S.A. refuses to ratify a Bill which has passed both Houses, he is said to pocket it.

Queen Elizabeth's pocket pistol. A formidable piece of ordnance given to Queen Elizabeth I by the Low Countries in recognition of her efforts to protect them in their reformed religion. It used to overlook the Channel from Dover cliffs, but in 1834 was removed to make room for a modern battery. It bore the following inscription (in Flemish):—

Load me well and keep me clean,
And I'll carry a ball to Calais Green.

Put your pride in your pocket. Lay it aside for the nonce.

To be in, or out of pocket. To be a gainer or a loser by some transaction.

To pocket an insult. To submit to an insult without showing annoyance.

To put one's hand in one's pocket. To give money (generally to some charity).

Pococurante (pō kō kū rān' ti) (Ital., poco curante, caring little). Insouciant, devil-may-care, easy-go-lucky. Hence, pococurantism, indifference to matters of importance but concern about trifles. Also used for one who in argument leaves the main gist and rides off on some minor and indifferent point.

Podsnap. A pompous, self-satisfied man in Dickens's Our Mutual Friend, the type of one who is overburdened with stiff-starched etiquette and self-importance. Hence, Podsnappery.

He always knew exactly what Providence meant. Inferior and less respectable men might fall short of that mark, but Mr. Podsnap was always up to it. And it was very remarkable (and must have been very comfortable) that what Providence meant was invariably what Mr. Podsnap meant.—Our Mutual Friend, Bk. I, ch. ii.

Poet. Poet Laureate. A court official, appointed by the Prime Minister, whose duty it is (or was) to compose odes in honour of the sovereign's birthday and in celebration of State occasions of importance.

The first Poet Laureate officially recognized as such was Ben Jonson, but in earlier times there had been an occasional Versificator Regis, and Chaucer, Skelton, Spenser, and Daniel were called "Laureates" though not appointed to that office. The following is the complete list of Poets Laureate:—

Ben Jonson, 1619-1637.
Sir William Davenant, 1660-1668.
John Dryden, 1670-1688.
Thomas Shadwell, 1688-1692.
Nahum Tate, 1692-1715.
Nicholas Rowe, 1715-1718.
Laurence Eusden, 1718-1730.
Colley Cibber, 1730-1757.
William Whitehead, 1757-1785.
Thomas Warton, 1785-1790.
Henry James Pye, 1790-1813.
Robert Southey, 1813-1843.
William Wordsworth, 1843-1850.
Alfred Tennyson, 1850-1892.
Alfred Austin, 1896-1913.
Robert Bridges, 1913-1930.
John Masefield, 1930-

The term arose from the ancient custom in the universities of presenting a laurel wreath to graduates in rhetoric and poetry. There were at one time "doctors laureate," "bachelors laureate," etc.; and in France authors of distinction are still at times "crowned" by the Academy.

Poeta nascitur non fit. Poets are born, not made. See BORN.

Poets' Corner. The southern end of the south transept of Westminster Abbey, first so called by Oliver Goldsmith because it contained the tomb of Chaucer. Addison had previously (Spectator, No. 26, 1711) alluded to it as the "poetical Quarter," in which, he says—I found there were Poets who had no Monuments, and Monuments which had no Poets.

Besides Chaucer's tomb it contains that of Spenser, and either the tombs of or monuments to Drayton, Ben Jonson, Shakespeare (a statue), Milton (bust), Samuel Butler, Davenant, Cowley, Prior, Gay, Addison, Thomson, Goldsmith, Dryden, Dr. Johnson, Sheridan, Burns, Southey, Coleridge, Campbell, Macaulay, Longfellow, Dickens, Thackeray, Tennyson, Browning, and Hardy.

The term Poet's Corner is also facetiously applied to the part of a newspaper in which poetical contributions are printed.

Pogrom. an organized massacre, especially one of those directed against the Jews in Russia in 1905 and later. The word is Russian, and means devastation (gromit, to thunder, to destroy unmercifully).

Poifu (pwa' lū). The popular name for the French private soldier, equivalent to our "Tommy Atkins." It means literally "hairy," but it had been used by Balzac as meaning "brave."

Point. Defined by Euclid as "that which hath no parts." Playfair defines it as "that which has position but not magnitude," and Legendre says it "is a limit terminating a line," which suggests that a point could not exist, even in imagination, without a line, and presupposes that we know what a line is.

A point of honour. See HONOUR.

A point-to-point race. A race, especially a steeplechase, direct from one point to another; a cross-country race.

Armed at all points. Armed to the teeth; having no parts undefended.

A figure like your Father,
Arm'd at all points exactly, Cap a Pe,
Appears before them.

Hamlet, i, 2.

Come to the point! Speak out plainly what you want; don't beat about the bush, but avoid circumlocution and get to the gist of the matter.

In a point of fact. A stronger way of saying "As a fact," or "As a matter of fact."

Not to put too fine a point upon it. Not to be over delicate in stating it; the prelude to a blunt though truthful remark.

To carry one's point. To attain the desired end; to get one's way.

To dine on potatoes and point. To have potatoes without any relish or extras, a very meagre dinner indeed. When salt was dear and the cellar was empty parents used to tell their children to point their potato to the salt cellar, and eat it. This was potato and point, and the "joke" lies in the allusion to a point-streak, which is the best portion.

To give one points. To be able to accord him an advantage and yet beat him; to be considerably better than he.

To make a point of doing something. To treat it as a matter of duty, or to make it a special object. The phrase is a translation of the older French faire un point de.

To stand on points. On punctilios; delicacy of behaviour. In the following quotation Theseus puns on the phrase, the side allusion being that Quince in the delivery of his Prologue had taken no notice of the stops, or points:—

This fellow doth not stand upon points.—Midsummer Night's Dream, v, 1.

To stretch a point. To exceed what is strictly right. There may be an allusion here to the tagged laces called points, formerly used in costume; to "truss a point" was to tie the laces which held the breeches; to "stretch a point" to stretch these laces, so as to adjust the dress to extra growth, or the temporary fullness of good feeding.

To truss his points. To tie the points of hose. The points were the cords pointed with metal, like shoe-laces, attached to doublets and hose; being very numerous, some second person was required to "truss" them or fasten them properly.

Point-blank. Direct. A term in gunnery; when a cannon is so placed that the line of sight is parallel to the axis and horizontal, the discharge is point-blank, and was supposed to go direct, without curve, to an object within a certain distance. In French point blanc is the white mark or bull's-eye of a target, to hit which the ball or arrow must not deviate in the least from the exact path.

Now art thou within point-blank of our jurisdiction regal —2 Henry VI, iv, 7.

Point d'appui (Fr.). A standpoint; a fulcrum; a position from which you can operate; a pretext to conceal the real intention. Literally the point of support.

The material which gives name to the dish is but the point d'appui for the literary cayenne and curry-powder, by which it is recommended to the palate of the reader.—The Athenæum.

Point-devisé (Fr, the point devised, the desired object). Punctilious; minutely exact. Holofernes says, "I abhor such insociable and point de vise companions, such rackers of orthography."

You are rather point de vise in your accoutrements.
—As You Like It, iii, 2.

Point of No Return. In an aeroplane flight, that point at which it is just as safe, or close, to go forward as to turn back.

Poison. It is said that poisons had no effect on Mithridates, King of Pontus. This was Mithridates VI (d. 63 B.C.), called the Great, who succeeded his father at the age of eleven, and fortified his constitution by drinking antidotes to poisons which might at any moment be administered to him by persons about the court. See MITHRIDATE.

Poisson d'Avril (pwa' son dá vril) (Fr., April fish). The French equivalent for our "April fool" (q.v.).

Poke. A bag, pouch, or sack—from which comes our pocket, a little poke. The word is rarely used nowadays, except in the phrase To buy a pig in a poke (see PIG). The word is not connected with the verb to poke.

Poke bonnet. A long, straight, projecting bonnet, commonly worn by women in the early 19th century, and still worn by Salvation Army lasses and old-fashioned Quaker women. Why it was so called is not clear—probably because it projects or pokes out.

To poke fun at one. To make one a laughing-stock.

Poker Face. An expressionless face characteristic of the good poker-player who assumes it to conceal from his adversaries any idea of what cards he may be holding.

Poky. Cramped, narrow, confined; as, a poky corner. Also poor and shabby.

The ladies were in their pokiest old headgear.—THACKERAY: The Newcomes, ch. lviii.

Polack (pō' lăk). An inhabitant of Poland. The term is not used now, except jokingly in U.S.A., Pole having for long taken its place.

So frowned he once, when, in an angry parle,
He smote the sledded Polacks on the ice
Hamlet, i, 1.

Poland. The Partition of Poland. This country, situated between the leading military powers of Eastern Europe—Russia, Austria, and Prussia—has for the last two centuries been subject to invasion by, and division between, those countries. The first partition between the three was in 1772; the second in 1793; the final partition in 1796. The kingdom was reconstituted under Napoleon's authority, but was annexed to the Russian crown in 1832. It was again set up, as a republic, in 1919, but partitioned between Germany and Russia in 1939. In 1945 it was again reconstituted as a separate state under Russian dominance.

Polish Corridor. The territory given to Poland by the Treaty of Versailles to enable her to have access to the Baltic Sea. It followed roughly the line of the Vistula and reached the sea to the west of Danzig (declared a free city) and the port of Gdynia was built by Poland for her commerce. The Corridor cut off East Prussia from the rest of Germany and was one of the causes of irritation which eventually led to World War II.

Pole. The stake, mast, measure (16½ ft.), etc., gets its name from Lat. palus, a pale or stake; pole—the North Pole, magnetic pole, etc.—is from Gr. polos, an axis, pivot.

Barber's pole. See BARBER.

The Poles are the vintagers in Normandy. The Norman vintage consists of apples beaten down by poles. The French say, En Normandie l'on vendage avec la gaulle, where gaulle is a play on the word gaul, but really means a pole. In this connexion it is interesting to record that during the German occupation of Paris in 1941-43 the students once marched through the streets as a demonstration carrying two posts (deux gaulles) and it took the German authorities some time to grasp that this was a play on the name De Gaulle—then the symbol of French nationality and liberty.

Under bare poles. See BARE.

Polichinelle. See SECRET.

Polish Off. To finish out of hand. In allusion to articles polished.

I'll polish him off in no time. I'll set him down, give him a drubbing.

To polish off a meal. To eat it quickly, and not keep anyone waiting.

Polixenes (pōl ix' e nēz). Father of Florizel and King of Bohemia in Shakespeare's Winter's Tale (q.v.).

Polka. A round dance said to have been invented about 1830 by a Bohemian servant girl. In a few years it took Europe by storm. The polka is danced in couples in 2-4 time, the characteristic feature being the rest on the second beat.

Poll (pōl) (of Teutonic origin), means the head; hence, the number of persons in a crowd ascertained by counting heads, hence the counting of voters at an election, and such phrases as to go to the polls, to stand for election, and poll tax, a tax levied on everybody.

The Cambridge term, the Poll, meaning students who obtain only a pass degree, i.e. a degree without honours, is probably from Gr. hoi polloi, the common herd. These students—poll men, are said to go out in the poll, and to take a poll degree.

Pollux (pōl' ūks). In classical mythology the twin brother of Castor (q.v.).

Polly. Mary. The change of M for P in pet names is by no means rare; e.g.—

Margaret. Maggie or Meggy, becomes Peggie, and Pegg or Peg.

Martha. Matty becomes Patty.

In the case of Mary—Polly we see another change by no means unusual—that of r into l or ll. Similarly, Sarah becomes Sally; Dorothea, Dora, becomes Dolly; Harry, Hal.

Polonius (pōl ō' nī ūs). A garrulous old courtier, in Hamlet, typical of the pompous, sententious old man. He was father of Ophelia, and lord chamberlain to the king of Denmark.

Polony (pōl ō' nī). A corruption of Bologna (sausage).

Poltergeist (pōl tēr gēst). A household spirit, well known to spiritualists, remarkable for throwing things about, plucking the bed-clothes, making noises, etc. It is a German term—polter, noise, geist, spirit.

Polt-foot. A club-foot. Ben Jonson calls Vulcan, who was lame, the "polt-footed philosopher."

Venus was content to take the blake Smith (i.e., blacksmith Vulcan) with his powlt foote.—LYLY: Euphues.

Poltroon. A coward; from Ital. poltro, a bed, because cowards are sluggards and feign themselves sick a-bed in times of war.

In falconry the name was given to a bird of prey, with the talons of the hind toes cut off to prevent its flying at game, probably owing to the old idea that the word was derived from Lat. pollice truncus, maimed in the thumb, because conscripts who had no stomach for the field used to disqualify themselves by cutting off their right thumb.

Polycrates (pōl i krā' tēz), Tyrant of Samos, was so fortunate in all things that Amasis, King of Egypt, advised him to chequer his pleasures by relinquishing something he greatly prized. Whereupon Polycrates threw into the sea a beautiful seal, the most valuable of his jewels. A few days afterwards a fine fish was sent him as a present, and in its belly was found the jewel. Amasis, alarmed at this good fortune, broke off his alliance, declaring that sooner or later this good fortune would fail; and not long afterwards Polycrates was shamefully put to death by Orætes, who had invited him to his court.

Polydore (pol' i dôr). The name assumed by Guiderius in Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

Polyhymnia (pol i him' ni à). The Muse of lyric poetry, and inventor of the lyre. See MUSES.

Polyphemus (pol i fē' mūs). One of the Cyclops, an enormous giant, with only one eye, and that in the middle of his forehead, who lived in Sicily. When Ulysses landed on the island, this monster made him and twelve of his crew captives; six of them he ate, and then Ulysses contrived to blind him, and escape with the rest of the crew (cp. LESTRIGONS). Polyphemus was in love with Galatea, a sea-nymph who had set her heart on the shepherd Acis; Polyphemus, in a fit of jealousy, crushed him beneath a rock.

Poma Alcinoos dare. See ALCINOOS.

Pomander (pom ān' dēr). From the French pomme d'ambre, apple of amber, or ambergris. A ball made of perfume, such as ambergris or musk, which was worn or carried in a perforated case in order to ward off infection or counteract bad smells. The cases, usually of gold or silver, were also called "pomanders."

Pomatum (po mā' tūm). Another name for pomade, which was so called because it was originally made by macerating over-ripe apples (Fr. pommes) in grease.

There is likewise made an ointment with the pulp of Apples and Swines grease and Rose water, which is used to beautify the face . . . called in shops pomatum, of the Apples whereof it is made.—GERARDE: Herbal, III, xcvi (1597).

Pomfret Cakes. See PONFRACT.

Pommard. A red Burgundy wine, so called from a village of that name in the Côte d'Or, France. In France the word is sometimes colloquially used for cider (or beer), the pun being on pomme, apple.

Pommel. The pommel of a sword is the rounded knob terminating the hilt, so called on account of its apple-like shape (Fr. pomme, apple); and to pommel one, now to pound him with your fists, was originally to beat him with the pommel of your sword.

Pomona (po mō' nà). The Roman goddess of fruits and fruit-trees (Lat. pomum), hence fruit generally.

Bade the wide fabric unimpaired sustain
Pomona's store, and cheese, and golden grain.
BLOOMFIELD: Farmer's Boy.

Pompadour (pom' pa dôr), as a colour, is claret purple, so called from Louis XV's mistress, the Marquise de Pompadour (1721-64). The 56th Foot is called the Pompadours, from the claret facings of their regimental uniforms.

The Essex Regiment, the 44th Foot. So named from the 2nd Battalion (raised in 1755) which wore facings of purple, the favourite colour of Mme de Pompadour.

There is an old song supposed to be an elegy on John Broadwood, a Quaker, which introduces the word:—

Sometimes he wore an old brown coat,
Sometimes a pompadour,
Sometimes 'twas buttoned up behind,
And sometimes down before.

The word is also applied to a fashion of hair-dressing in which the hair is raised (often on a pad) in a wave above the forehead.

Pompey (pom' pi). The familiar name in the British Navy for Portsmouth is Pompey. It is also a generic name formerly used of a black footman, as Abigail used to be of a lady's maid. One of Hood's jocular book-titles was Pompeii; or, Memoirs of a Black Footman, by Sir W. Gill. (Sir W. Gill wrote a book on Pompeii.)

Pompey's Pillar. A Corinthian column of red granite, nearly 100 ft. high, erected at Alexandria by Publius, Prefect of Egypt, in honour of Diocletian and to record the conquest of Alexandria in 296. It has about as much right to be called Pompey's pillar as the obelisk of Heliopolis, re-erected by Rameses II at Alexandria, has to be called Cleopatra's Needle.

Pone, from an Indian word meaning something baked; in the Southern U.S.A. it is used for maize bread.

Pons Asinorum (ponz ās i nôr' ūm) (Lat., the asses' bridge). The fifth proposition, Bk. I, of Euclid—the first difficult theorem, which dunces rarely get over for the first time without stumbling. It is anything but a "bridge"; it is really pedica asinorum, the "dolt's stumbling-block."

Pontefract or Pomfret Cakes. Liquorice lozenges impressed with a castle; so called from being made at Pontefract. The name of the town is still frequently pronounced pumfret, representing the Anglo-Norman and Middle English spelling Pontfret. The place was called Fractus Pons by Orderic (1097) and Pontefractus by John of Hexham (about 1165), in allusion to the old Roman bridge over the Aire, broken down by William I in 1069, remains of which were still visible in the 16th century.

Pontiff. The term was formerly applied to any bishop, but now only to the Bishop of Rome—the Pope—i.e. the Sovereign Pontiff. It means literally one who has charge of the bridges, as these were in the particular care of the principal college of priests in ancient Rome, the head of which was the Pontifex Maximus (Lat. pons, pontis, a bridge).

Pontius Pilate's Body-guard. The 1st Foot Regiment, now called the Royal Scots, the oldest regiment in the British Army. The fable is that when in the French service as Le Régiment de Douglas they had a dispute with the Picardy regiment about the antiquity of their respective corps. The Picardy officers declared they were on duty on the night of the Crucifixion, when the colonel of the 1st Foot replied, "If we had been on guard, we should not have slept at our posts."

Pony. Slang for £25; also (especially in the U.S.A.) for a translation crib; also for a small beer-glass holding a little under a gill.

In card games the person on the right hand of the dealer, whose duty it is to collect the cards for the dealer, is called the pony, from Lat. pone, "behind," being behind the dealer.

Pony Express. This was the U.S. government mail system across the continent just before the days of railways and telegraphs. It ran from St. Joseph, Missouri, to the Pacific Coast and was inaugurated in 1860; less than two years later it was superseded by the electric telegraph. Pony Express is a misnomer, as fleet horses were used, ridden for stages of 10 to 15 miles by men who did three stages, or over 30 miles, before passing on the wallet to the next rider. The schedule time for the whole distance was ten days, but Lincoln's inaugural address was taken across the continent in 7 days 17 hours. The fame of the Pony Express rests largely on the hardihood and courage of the riders, who braved storms, landslides, and Indian ambushes to get their mail through on time.

Poor. Poor as a church mouse. In a church there is no cupboard or pantry where even so little a creature as a mouse could find a crumb.

Poor as Job. The allusion is to Job being deprived by Satan of everything he possessed.

Poor as Lazarus. This is the beggar Lazarus, full of sores, who was laid at the rich man's gate, and desired to be fed from the crumbs that fell from Dives' table (Luke xvi, 19-31).

Poor Clares. See FRANCISCANS.

Poor Jack or John. Dried hake. We have "john dory," a "jack" (pike), a "jack shark," etc., and Jack may here be a play on the word "Hake," and John a substitute for Jack.

Tis well thou art not fish; if thou hadst, thou hadst been poor-john.—Romeo and Juliet, I, 1.

Cp. the jocular proof that an eel pie is a pigeon pie. An eel pie is a fish pie, a fish pie may be jack pie, a jack pie is a john pie, and a john pie is a pie john (pigeon).

Poor man. The blade-bone of a shoulder of mutton is so called in Scotland. In some parts of England it is termed a "poor knight of Windsor," because it holds the same relation to "Sir Loin" as a Windsor knight does to a baronet. Scott (Bride of Lammermoor, ch. xix) tells of a laird who, being asked by an English landlord what he would have for dinner, produced the utmost consternation by saying, "I think I could relish a morsel of a poor man."

Poor Richard. The assumed name of Benjamin Franklin in a series of almanacks from 1732 to 1757. They contained maxims and precepts on temperance, economy, cleanliness, chastity, and other virtues; and several ended with the words, "as poor Richard says."

Poor Robin's Almanack. A farcical almanack, parodying those who seriously indulged in prophecy, published at intervals from 1664 to as late as 1828. The early issues have often been attributed to Herrick, but they were the work of one (or both) of the brothers

Robert ("Robin") and William Winstanley. The original title was:—

POOR ROBIN. AN ALMANACK. After a New Fashion. Wherein the Reader may see (if he be not blinde) many remarkable things worthy of Observation. Containing a two-fold Kalendar, viz., the Julian or English; and the Roundheads or Fanaticks; several Saints' days, and Observations upon every Month. Written by POOR ROBIN, Knight of the Burnt-Island, a well-wisher to the Mathematics. Calculated for the Meridian of Limehouse, over against Cuckolds-haven; the Longitude and Latitude whereof is set down in the Foreheads of all jealous-pated Husbands.

As a specimen of the "predictions," the following, for January, 1664, may be taken as an example:—

Strong Beer and good Fires are as fit for this Season as a Halter for a Thiefe; and, when every Man is pleas'd, then 'twill be a Merry World indeed. . . . This Month we may expect to hear of the Death of some Man, Woman, or Child, either in Kent or Christendom.

There are none poor but those whom God hates. This does not mean that poverty is a punishment, but that those whom God loves are rich in His love. In this sense Dives may be the poor man, and Lazarus abounding in that "blessing of the Lord which maketh rich."

Pope. The word represents the A.S. papa, from ecclesiastical Latin, and Gr. pappas, the infantile word for father (cp. modern "papa"); it is not connected with Lat. papa, which denoted an inferior Roman (pagan) priest who brought the victim to the altar and felled it with an axe. In the early Church the title was given to many bishops; Leo the Great (440-61) was the first to use it officially, and in the time of Gregory VII (1073-85) it was, by decree, specially reserved to the Bishop of Rome. Cp. PONTIFF.

According to Platina, Sergius II (844-6) was the first pope who changed his name on ascending the papal chair. Some accounts have it that his name was Hogsmouth, others that it was "Peter di Porca," and he changed it out of deference to St. Peter, thinking it arrogant to style himself Peter II.

Gregory the Great (591) was the first pope to adopt the title Servus Servorum Dei (the Servant of the Servants of God). It is founded on Mark x, 44.

Fye upon all his jurisdictiones

And upon those whiche to hym are detters;

Fye upon his bulles breves and letters

Wherein he is named Servus Servorum.

Rede Me and be nott Wrothe, v, 13 (1528).

The title Vicar of Christ, or Vicar of God, was adopted by Innocent III, 1198. See also TIARA.

The number of popes is not certain; there are, however, with the election of Pius XII (1939) 262 commonly enumerated. Of these 204 were Italians, 15 Frenchmen, 15 Greeks, 7 Syrians, 6 Germans, 3 Spaniards, 2 Dalmatians, 2 Africans, and 1 each English, Portuguese, Cretan, Thracian, Sardinian, Jew (St. Peter).

The Black Pope. The General of the Jesuits.

The Pope of Geneva. A name given to Calvin (1509-64).

The Pope's eye. The tender piece of meat (the lymphatic gland) surrounded by fat in the middle of a leg of mutton. The French call it Judas's eye, and the Germans the priest's tit-bit.

The Pope's slave. St Cardinal Cajetan (d. 1534) called the Church.

The Red Pope. The Prefect of the Propaganda (q.v.).

Pope Joan. A mythical female pope, fabled in the Middle Ages to have succeeded Leo IV (855). The vulgar tale is that Joan conceived a violent passion for the monk Folda and in order to get admission to him assumed the monastic habit. Being clever and popular, she was elected pope, but was discovered through giving birth to a child during her enthronization. The whole story has long since been exploded.

The name was given to a once popular card-game played with an ordinary pack minus the eight of diamonds (called the "Pope Joan"); also to a circular revolving tray divided into eight compartments.

Popish Plot. A fictitious plot implicating the Duke of York and others in high place, invented in 1678 by Titus Oates (1649-1705) who alleged that the Catholics were about to massacre the Protestants, burn London, and assassinate the king. Some thirty innocent persons were executed, and Oates obtained great wealth by revealing the supposed plot, but ultimately he was pilloried, whipped, and imprisoned.

Popinjay (pop' in jay). An old name for a parrot (ultimately of Arabic origin; Gr. papagos), hence a conceited or empty-headed person.

I then, all smarting with my wounds being cold,
To be so pestered with a popinjay,
Answered negligently I know not what,
He should or he should not,

1 Henry IV, i, 3.

The Festival of the Popinjay. The first Sunday in May, when a figure of a popinjay, decked with parti-coloured feathers and suspended from a pole, served as a target for shooting practice. He whose ball or arrow brought down the bird by cutting the string by which it was hung, received the proud title of "Captain Popinjay," or "Captain of the Popinjay," for the rest of the day, and was escorted home in triumph.

Poplar. The poplar was consecrated to Hercules, because he destroyed Kakos in a cavern of Mount Aventine, which was covered with poplars. In the moment of triumph the hero plucked a branch from one of the trees and bound it round his head. When he descended to the infernal regions, the heat caused a profuse perspiration which blanched the under surface of the leaves, while the smoke of the eternal flames blackened the upper surface. Hence the leaves of the poplar are dark on one side and white on the other.

The white poplar is fabled to have originally been the nymph Leuce, beloved by Pluto. He changed her into this at death.

Poplin. This silk and worsted material, now made chiefly in Ireland, gets its name from the old rapal (Ital. papalino) city of Avignon, because up to the 17th century that was the chief seat of its manufacture.

Popski's Private Army. A British volunteer force in World War II operating under the orders of Lieut.-Col. Peniakoff in a series of daring and highly successful raids in North Africa and Southern Europe. The Colonel was familiarly known as "Popski" and his irregular forces wore the initials P.P.A. on their shoulders, much to the chagrin of conservative military circles.

Popular Front. A political alliance by all Left Wing parties (Labour, Liberal, Socialist, but not necessarily Communist) against reactionary government and especially dictatorship.

Populist. A term applied in U.S.A. to a member of the People's Party, a political party formed in 1891 and committed to the expansion of the currency, the restriction of land ownership, the state control of transport, etc.

Porcelain, from Ital. porcellana, "a little pig," the name given by the early Portuguese traders, to cowrie-shells, the shape of which is not unlike a pig's back, and later to Chinese earthenware, which is white and glossy, like the inside of these shells.

Porch, The. A philosophic sect, generally called Stoics (Gr. stoa, a porch), because Zeno, the founder, gave his lectures in the public ambulatory, Stoa paëcie, in the agora of Athens.

The successors of Socrates formed societies which lasted several centuries; the Academy, the Porch, the Garden.—SEELY: Ecce Homo.

Pork, pig. The former is Norman, the latter Saxon. As in the case of most edible domestic animals the Norman word is used for the meat and the Saxon for the live animal.

Porphyrogenitus (pôr fi rô jen' i tùs). A surname of the Byzantine Emperor, Constantine VII (911-59). It signifies "born in the purple" (Gr. porphuros, purple, genetos, born), and a son born to a sovereign after his accession is called a porphyrogenito. Cp. PURPLE.

Porridge. Everything tastes of porridge. However we may deceive ourselves, whatever castles in the air we may construct, the fact of home life will always intrude.

He has supped all his porridge. Eaten his last meal; he is dead.

Keep your breath to cool your porridge. A rude remark made to one who is giving unwanted or unsought advice.

Well, Friar, spare your breath to cool your porridge; come, let us now talk with deliberation, fairly and softly.—RABELAIS: Pantagruel, etc., V, xxviii.

Not to earn salt to one's porridge. To earn practically nothing; to be a "waster."

Port. The origin of the nautical term, meaning the left-hand side of a ship when looking forward, is not certain; but it is probably from port, a harbour. The word has been in use for over three centuries, and in course of time took the place of the earlier larboard which was so easily confused with starboard. When the steering-gear was on the starboard (i.e. steer-board) side it was almost a necessity to enter port and tie up at the harbour with the larboard side towards the port, and this probably accounts for the name.

In the days when a ship was steered by a tiller it was necessary to put the tiller to port in order to make the rudder—and thus the vessel—go to starboard. Thus it came that “port the helm” meant really “steer the ship to starboard.” To do away with this anomaly, after World War I the rule was introduced universally that “Port the helm” should mean “Turn to port,” and “Starboard the helm,” to starboard.

A vessel's port-holes are so called from Lat. porta, a door; the harbour is called a port from Lat. portus, a haven, the dark red wine gets its name port from Oporto, Portugal, whence it is exported; and port, the way of bearing oneself, etc. (Queen Elizabeth I, says Speed, daunted the Ambassador of Poland “with her stately port and majestic deporture”) from Lat. portare, to carry.

Any port in a storm. Said when one is in a difficulty and some not particularly good way out offers itself; a last resource.

Port Royal. A convent about 8 miles SW. of Versailles which in the 17th century became the headquarters of the Jansenists (q.v.). The community was suppressed by Louis XIV in 1660, but later again sprang into prominence and was condemned by a bull of Clement XI in 1713. Two years later the convent, which had been removed to Paris about 1637, was razed to the ground.

Portage. A place where canoes or boats must be carried overland from one stretch of navigable water to another.

Porte, The Sublime. The central office of the Ottoman Government of the Sultans in Constantinople; hence, the Government or the Empire itself. The term is French in origin, sublime signifying “lofty” or “high and mighty.”

Porteous Riot. At Edinburgh in September, 1736. John Porteous was captain of the city guard, and, at the execution of a smuggler named Andrew Wilson, ordered the guards to fire on the mob, which had become tumultuous; six persons were killed, and eleven wounded. Porteous was condemned to death, but reprieved; whereupon the mob burst into the jail where he was confined, and, dragging him to the Grassmarket (the usual place of execution), hanged him by torchlight on a barber's pole.

Portia (pôr' shâ). A rich heiress and “lady barrister” in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice (q.v.), in love with Bassanio. Her name is often used allusively for a female advocate.

Portland Vase. A cinerary urn of transparent dark blue glass, coated with opaque white glass cut in cameo fashion, found in a tomb (supposed to be that of Alexander Severus) near Rome in the 17th century. In 1770 it was purchased from the Barberini Palace by Sir William Hamilton for 1,000 guineas, and came afterwards into the possession of the Duke of Portland, one of the trustees of the British Museum, who placed it in that institution for exhibition. In 1845 a lunatic named Lloyd dashed it to pieces, but it was so skilfully repaired that the damage is barely visible. It is ten inches high, and six in diameter at the broadest part.

Portmanteau Word. An artificial word made up of parts of others, and expressive of a combination denoted by those parts—such as squarson, a cross between a squire and a parson. Lewis Carroll invented the term in Through the Looking-Glass, ch. vi; slithy, he says, means lithe and slimy, mimsy is flimsy and miserable, etc. So called because there are two meanings “packed up” in the one word.

Portsoken Ward (pôrt sô' ken). The most easterly of the City of London wards—the old Knighten Guild (q.v.)—lying outside the wall in the parish of St. Botolph, Aldgate. Its name indicates the soke or franchise of the city (not of the gate). Port is an old name for any city, and occurs in Portreeve, the chief city officer.

Poseidon (pô si' don). The god of the sea in Greek mythology, the counterpart of the Roman Neptune (q.v.). He was the son of Cronos and Rhea, brother of Zeus and Pluto, and husband of Amphitrite. It was he who, with Apollo, built the walls of Troy, and as the Trojans refused to give him his reward he hated them and took part against them in the Trojan War. Earthquakes were attributed to him, and he was said to have created the first horse.

Poser. Formerly used of an examiner, one who poses (i.e. “opposes”) questions, especially a bishop's examining chaplain and the examiner at Eton for the King's College fellowship. Nowadays the word usually denotes a puzzling question or proposition.

Posh. Onomatopœic slang for smart, swagger, well-turned-out; as, “You're looking very posh to-day,” spruce and well groomed.

Posse (pos' i) (Lat., to be able). A body of men—especially constables—who are armed with legal authority.

Posse Comitatus. The whole force of the county—that is, all the male members of a county over fifteen, who may be summoned by a sheriff to assist in preventing a riot, the rescue of prisoners, or other unlawful disorders. Clergymen, peers, and the infirm are exempt.

Possum. To play possum is to lie low, to feign quiescence, to dissemble. The phrase comes from the opossum's habitual attempt to avoid capture by pretending to be dead.

Post. Beaten on the post. Only just beaten; a racing term, the “post” being the winning-post.

By return of post. By the next mail in the opposite direction; originally the phrase referred to the messenger, or “post” who brought the dispatch and would return with the answer.

From pillar to post. See PILLAR.

Knight of the post. See KNIGHT.

Post-and-rail. Wooden fencing made of posts and rails. In Australia roughly made tea in which the stalks are floating is called post-and-rail tea.

Post captain. A term used in the Navy from about 1730 to 1830 to distinguish an officer who held a captain's commission from one of inferior rank who was given the title by courtesy because he was in command of a small ship or was acting as captain, etc. A ship of under 20 guns was not entitled to a full—or post—captain.

Post haste. With great speed or expedition. The allusion is to the old coaching days, when travelling by relays of horses, or with horses placed on the road to expedite the journey, was the rule in cases of urgency.

Post-Impressionism. Name applied to the group of French painters, headed by Cézanne, Gauguin, and Van Gogh, stemming from Impressionism (q.v.).

Post paper. A standard size of paper measuring  $15 \times 19\frac{1}{4}$  in. in writing papers, and  $15\frac{1}{2} \times 19\frac{1}{2}$  in. in printings; so called from an ancient watermark which has been supposed to represent a post-horn. This horn or bugle mark was, however, in use as early as 1314, long before anything in the nature of a postman or his horn existed. It is probably the famous horn of Roland (q.v.).

Post term (Lat. post terminum, after the term). The legal expression for the return of a writ after the term, and for the fee that then is payable for its being filed.

To be posted in a club is to have one's name put upon the notice board as no longer a member, for non-payment of dues, or other irregularity. In the British armed forces it means to be assigned to a specific rank, position, or post.

To be well posted in a subject. To be thoroughly acquainted with it, well informed. Originally an American colloquialism, probably from the counting-house, where ledgers are posted.

To run your head against a post. To go ahead heedlessly and stupidly, or as if you had no eyes.

Poste restante (Fr., remaining post). A department at a post office to which letters may be addressed for callers, and where they will remain (with certain limits) until called for.

Post (Lat.; in compounds). Post factum (Lat.). After the act has been committed.

Post hoc, ergo propter hoc (Lat.). After this, therefore because of this; expressive of the fallacy that a sequence of events is always the result of cause and effect. The swallows come to England in the spring, but do not bring the spring.

Post meridian (Lat.). After noon; usually contracted to "P.M."

'Twas post meridian half-past four,
By signal I from Nancy parted.

DIBDIN: Sea Songs.

Post mortem (Lat.). After death; as a post-mortem examination for the purpose of ascertaining the cause of death.

A post-mortem degree. In old University slang, a degree given to a candidate after having failed at the poll.

Post obit (Lat. post obitum, after the death, i.e. of the person named in the bond). An agreement to pay for a loan a larger sum of money, together with interest at death.

Posteriori. See A POSTERIORI.

Posy properly means a copy of verses presented with a bouquet. It now means the verses without the flowers, as the "posy of a ring," or the flowers without the verses, as a "pretty posy."

He could make anything in poetry, from the posy of a ring to the chronicle of its most heroic wearer.—STEDMAN: Victorian Poets (Landor), p. 47.

Pot. A big pot. An important person, a personage; a leader of his class or group.

A pot of money. A large amount of money; especially a large stake on a horse.

A little pot is soon hot. A small person is quickly "riled." Grumio makes humorous use of the phrase in The Taming of the Shrew (iv, 1).

A watched pot never boils. Said as a mild reproof to one who is showing impatience; watching and anxiety won't hasten matters.

Gone to pot. Ruined, gone to the bad. The allusion is to the pot into which bits of already cooked meat are cast prior to their making their last appearance as hash.

The pot calls the kettle black. Said of a person who accuses another of faults similar to those committed by himself.

The pot of hospitality. The pot or cauldron always hanging over the open fire which in Ireland used to be dipped into by anyone who dropped in at meal-times, or required refreshment.

And the "pot of hospitality" was set to boil upon the fire, and there was much mirth and heartiness and entertainment.—Nineteenth Century, Oct., 1891, p. 643.

To keep the pot a-boiling. To go on paying one's way and making enough to live on; also, to keep things going briskly, to see that the interest does not flag.

Pot-boiler. Anything done merely for the sake of the money it will bring in—because it will "keep the pot a-boiling," i.e. help to provide the means of livelihood; applied specially to work of small merit by artists or literary men.

Pot-hook. The hook over an open fire on which hung the pot. The term was applied to the shaky curves and loops made by the beginner in handwriting.

Pot-hunter. One who in athletic contests, etc., is keener on winning prizes (often silver cups, or pots) than on the sport; it is, of course, a term of reproach among sportsmen.

Come and take pot-luck with me. Come and take a family dinner at my house; we'll all "dip into the pot" and share anything that's going.

Pot valiant. Made courageous by liquor.

Pot-wallopers, before the passing of the Reform Bill (1832), were those who claimed a vote as householders, because they had boiled their own pot at their own fireplace in the parish for six months. The earlier form was pot-waller, from A.S. weallan, to boil.

Potato. This very common vegetable (Solanum tuberosum) was introduced into Ireland (and thence into England) from America by Sir Walter Raleigh about 1584, but the name (from Haitian batata) properly belonged to another tuberous plant (Batata edulis, of the natural order Convolvulaceæ), now known as the sweet potato, which was supposed to have aphrodisiac qualities. It is to this latter that Falstaff refers when he says "Let the sky rain potatoes" (Merry Wives, v, 5), and there are many allusions to it in contemporary literature.

Potato-bogle. So the Scots call a scarecrow, the head of these bird-bogies being a big potato or turnip.

To think small potatoes of it. To think very little of it, to account it of very slight worth, or importance.

Poteen (po tén') (Irish poitin, little pot). Whisky that is produced privately in an illicit still, and so escapes duty.

Potent. Cross potent. An heraldic cross, each limb of which has an additional cross-piece like the head of an old-fashioned crutch; so called from Fr. potence, a crutch. It is also known as a Jerusalem cross.

Potiphar's Wife (pot' i fâr) is unnamed both in the Bible and the Koran. Some Arabian commentators have called her Rahil, others Zuleika, and it is this latter name that the 15th-century Persian poet gives her in his Yusuf and Zulaikha.

In C. J. Wells's poetic drama Joseph and His Brethren (1824), of which she is the heroine, she is named Phraxanor.

Potlatch. A North American Indian feast at which gifts are distributed lavishly to the guests, while the hosts destroy much of their own property in a magnificent ostentation of wealth and possessions. It is a social barbarity to refuse an invitation to a potlatch, or, having been to one, to neglect to give a potlatch in return; rivalry in this insensate feast-giving often reduced the givers to ruin.

Potpourri (pō poo' rē) (Fr.). A mixture of dried sweet-smelling flower-petals and herbs preserved in a vase. Also a hotch-potch or olla podrida. In music, a medley of favourite tunes strung together.

Pourri means rotting [flowers], and potpourri, strictly speaking, is the vase containing the sweet mixture.

Pott. A size of printing and writing paper ( $15\frac{1}{2} \times 12\frac{1}{2}$  in.); so called from its original watermark, a pot, which really represented the Holy Grail.

Poulaines (poo' länz). The long pointed toes of the 14th century. They were put on the feet of suits of armour for purposes of defence. They appeared also on the fashionable souliers à la poulaine. The fashion is thought to have come from Poland—whence the name.

Poult (pölt). A chicken, or the young of the turkey, guinea-fowl, etc. The word is a contraction of pullet, from late Lat. pulla, a hen, whence poultry, poulterer, etc.

Poulter's Measure. In prosody, a metre consisting of alternate Alexandrines and fourteens, i.e. twelve-syllable and fourteen-syllable lines. The name was given to it by Gascoigne (1576) because, it is said, poulterers—then called poulters—used sometimes to give twelve to the dozen and sometimes fourteen. It was a common measure in early Elizabethan times; the following specimen is from a poem by Surrey:—

Good ladies, ye that have your pleasures in exile, Step in your foot, come take a place, and mourn with me a while;

And such as by their lords do set but little price
Let them sit still, it skills them not what chance come on the dice.

Pound. The unit of weight (Lat. pondus, weight); also cash to the value of twenty shillings sterling, because in the Carolingian period the Roman pound (twelve ounces) of pure silver was coined into 240 silver pennies. The symbols £ and lb. are for libra, the Latin for a pound.

In for a penny, in for a pound. See PENNY.

Pound of flesh. The whole bargain, the exact terms of the agreement, the bond literatim et verbatim. The allusion is to Shylock, in The Merchant of Venice, who bargained with Antonio for a "pound of flesh," but was foiled in his suit by Portia, who said the bond was expressly a pound of flesh, and therefore (1) the Jew must cut the exact quantity, neither more nor less than a just pound; and (2) in so doing he must not shed a drop of blood.

Poverty. When poverty comes in at the door, love flies out at the window. An old proverb, given in Ray's Collection (1742), and appearing in many languages. Keats says much the same in Lamia (Pt. ii):—

Love in a hut, with water and a crust,
Is—Love forgive us—cinders, ashes, dust.

Powder. I'll powder your jacket for you. A corruption of Fr. poudrer, to dust.

Not worth powder and shot. Not worth the trouble; the thing shot won't pay the cost of the ammunition.

Pow-wow. A consultation. Derived from the North American Indians.

Poynings' Law or Statute of Drogheda. An Act of Parliament passed in Ireland in 1495 (10 Henry VII, ch. 22) at the summons of Sir Edward Poynings (d. 1521), then Lord Deputy, providing that no Parliament could be called together in Ireland except under the Great Seal of England, that its Acts must be submitted to the English Privy Council before becoming law, and declaring all general statutes hitherto made in England to be in force in Ireland also. It was repealed in 1782.

Practical and Practicable. These two words are often confused in common usage. Practical means adapted to actual conditions, pertaining to action not theory or speculation. A practical man is one better adapted to doing manual jobs than to speculating about them. A practical joke (rarely a joke to its victim, be it observed) is a piece of humour that depends on some action on the part of the perpetrator, usually to the discomfiture of the subject.

Practicable is applied to something capable of being done, feasible. In theatrical usage a practicable door or window in a piece of stage scenery is one that can be actually opened and shut.

Præmonstratensian. See PREMONSTRATENSIAN.

Præmunire (prē mū nī' rē). A writ charging a sheriff to summon one accused of an indictable offence committed overseas, authorized by the Statute of Præmunire (1392); so called from the words præmunire facias, cause thou to warn (so and so) that appear in the opening sentence. The Statute was soon used specially to prevent the purchase in Rome of excommunications, etc., and to stop the assertion or maintenance of papal jurisdiction in England and the denial of the ecclesiastical supremacy of the Crown. Offenders could be punished by outlawry, forfeiture of goods, and attachment.

Prætorian Guard (prē tōr' i ān). The household troops of the Roman Empire. Prætor was the title given to the consul who had supreme command of the army; his bodyguard was the Prætorian Guard.

Pragmatic Sanction. Sanctio in Latin means a "decree or ordinance with a penalty attached," or, in other words, a "penal statute." Pragmaticus means "relating to state affairs," so that Pragmatic Sanction is a penal statute bearing on some important question of state. The term was first applied by the Romans to those statutes which related to their provinces. The French applied the phrase to certain statutes which limited the jurisdiction of the Pope; but generally it is applied to an ordinance fixing the succession in a certain line.

Pragmatic Sanction of St. Louis, 1268, forbade the court of Rome to levy taxes or collect subscriptions in France without the express sanction of the king. It also gave plaintiffs in the ecclesiastical courts the right to appeal to the civil courts. The "Constitutions of Clarendon" were to England what the "Pragmatic Sanction" was to France.

Pragmatic Sanction of Charles VII (of France), 1438, defining and limiting the power of the Pope in France. By this ordinance the authority of a general council was declared superior to the dictum of the Pope; the clergy were forbidden to appeal to Rome on any point affecting the secular condition of the nation; and the Roman pontiff was forbidden to appropriate a vacant benefice, or to appoint either bishop or parish priest.

Pragmatic Sanction of 1713. Whereby the succession of the Austrian Empire was made hereditary in the female line, in order to transmit the crown to Maria Theresa, the daughter of Charles VI. This is emphatically the Pragmatic Sanction, unless some qualification is added restricting the term to some other instrument.

Pragmatic Sanction of Naples, 1759, whereby Carlos II of Spain ceded the succession to his third son and his heirs forever.

Pragmatism (Gr. pragma, deed). The philosophical doctrine that the only test of the truth of human cognitions or philosophical principles is their practical results, i.e. their workableness. It does not admit "absolute" truth, as all truths change their truthness as their practical utility increases or decreases. The word was introduced in this connexion about 1875 by the American logician C. S. Peirce (1839-1914) and was popularized by William James, whose Pragmatism was published in 1907.

Prairie Schooner. A large covered wagon, drawn by oxen or mules, used to transport settlers across the North American continent.

Praise the Lord and Pass the Ammunition (World War II). Phrase used by an American Naval chaplain during the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbour, though the actual identity of the chaplain has since been in dispute. Made the subject of a popular song in 1942.

Prājapatis. See MENU.

Prang. R.A.F. slang in World War II, meaning to bomb a target with evident success; or to crash one's aircraft.

Pratique (prāt ēk'). The licence given to an incoming vessel when she can show a clean bill of health or has fulfilled the necessary quarantine regulations.

Prayer-wheel. A device used by the Tibetan Buddhists as an aid or substitute for prayer, the use of which is said to be founded on a misinterpretation of the Buddha's instructions to his followers, that they should "turn the wheel of the law"—i.e. preach Buddhism incessantly—we should say as a horse in a mill. It consists of a pasteboard cylinder inscribed with—or containing—the mystic formula Om mani padme hum (q.v.) and other prayers, and each revolution represents one repetition of the prayers.

Pre-Adamites. The name given by Isaac de la Peyrère (1655) to a race of men whom he supposed to have existed before the days of Adam. He held that only the Jews are descended from Adam, and that the Gentiles derive from these "Pre-Adamites."

Prebend (preb' end) (O.Fr. from late Lat. præbenda, a grant, pension) The stipend given out of the revenues of the college or cathedral to a canon; he who enjoys the prebend is the prebendary, though he is sometimes wrongly called the prebend.

Precarious (Lat. precarius, obtained by prayer) is applied to what depends on our prayers or requests. A precarious tenure is one that depends solely on the will of the owner to concede to our prayer; hence uncertain, not to be depended on.

Preceptor. Among the Knights Templar a preceptory was a subordinate house or community (the larger being commanderies), and the Preceptor or Knight Preceptor was the superior of a preceptory, the Grand Preceptor being the head of all the preceptories in a province. The three of highest rank were the Grand Preceptors of Jerusalem, Tripolis, and Antioch.

Précieuses, Les (prā sē ērz). The intellectual circle that centred about the Hôtel de Rambouillet in 17th-century Paris. It may be interpreted as "persons of distinguished merit." Their affected airs were the subject of Molière's comedy Les Précieuses Ridicules, 1659.

Precious Stones. The ancients divided precious stones into male and female. The darker stones were called the males, and the light ones were called the females. Male sapphires approach indigo in colour, but the female ones are sky-blue. Theophrastus mentions the distinction. The tent shook, for mighty Saul shuddered, and sparkles 'gan dart

From the jewels that woke in his turban, at once with a start.

All its lordly male-sapphires, and rubies courageous at heart.

BROWNING: Saul, viii.

Each month, according to the Poles, is under the influence of a precious stone:—

January . . .	Garnet . . .	Constancy.

Mercury . . .	Loadstone . . .	Quicksilver.

It was an idea of the ancients that precious stones were dewdrops condensed and hardened by the sun.

Precocious means ripened by the sun before it has attained its full growth (Lat. præ, before, coquere, to cook); hence, premature; development of mind or body beyond one's age.

Many precocious trees, and such as have their spring in winter, may be found—BROWN.

Prelate (prel' át) (Lat. *prælat*us, carried before) means simply a man preferred, a man promoted to an ecclesiastical office which gives him jurisdiction over other clergymen. In the Catholic Church cardinals, bishops, and many other ecclesiastical dignitaries enjoy that title and rank, with the style of Monsignore; in the Church of England the term is restricted to bishops.

Premier. The Prime Minister, or first minister of the Crown, formerly (17th century) called the Premier Minister, from Fr. Ministre premier, first minister. The first British prime minister was Sir Robert Walpole (1676-1745), chief political adviser to George I and II.

Première, the feminine of Fr. premier, is used in English of the first performance of a play or showing of a cinematograph film.

Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte. It is only the first step that costs anything. Pythagoras used to say, "The beginning is half the whole."

Well begun is half done.

Premillenarians. See SECOND (Second Adventists).

Premenstratensian (prē mon strā ten' sian) or Norbertine Order. An order of Augustinians founded by St. Norbert in 1120 in the diocese of Laon, France. A spot was pointed out to him in a vision, and he termed the spot Pré Montré or Pratum Monstratum (the meadow pointed out). The order possessed thirty-five monasteries in England—where they were known as the White Canons of the rule of St. Augustine—at the time of the Dissolution.

Prepense (prē pens'). Malice prepense. Malice designed or deliberate; "malice aforethought" (Lat. præ, before, Fr. penser, to think).

Preposterous (Lat. præ, before, posterus, coming after). Literally, "putting the cart before the horse"; hence, contrary to reason or common sense.

Your misplacing and preposterous placing is not all one in behaviour of language, for the misplacing is always intolerable, but the preposterous is a pardonable fault, and many times gives a pretie grace unto the speech. We call it by a common saying to set the carte before the horse—PUTTENHAM: Arte of English Poesie, Bk. iii, ch. xxii (1589).

Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, The. A group of artists formed in London in 1848, consisting originally of Holman Hunt, Millais, and Rossetti, having for its objects a closer study of nature than was practised by those bound by the academical dogmas, and the cultivation of the methods and spirit of the early Italian (the "pre-Raphael") painters. The group was championed by Ruskin, but was attacked by many artists and critics, and after its second exhibition (1850) Rossetti gave up exhibiting. Millais resigned, and Holman Hunt's methods underwent a change. The term Pre-Raphaelite was later applied to work characterized by exaggerated attention to detail, and high finish or "finnickiness."

... a society which unfortunately, or rather unwisely, has given itself the name of "Pre-Raphaelite"; unfortunately, because the principles on which its members are working are neither pre- nor post-Raphaelite, but everlasting. They are endeavouring to paint with the highest possible degree of completion, what they see in nature, without reference to conventional or established rules; but by no means to imitate the style of any past epoch.—RUSKIN: Modern Painters, pt. ii, sect. vi, ch. iii, § 16, n.

Presbyterian Church. A Church governed by elders or presbyters (Gr. presbuteros, elder), and ministers, all of equal ecclesiastical rank; especially the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, which was formed in 1847 by the union of the United Secession and Relief Churches, and which in 1900 united with the Free Church of Scotland.

Presence. See REAL PRESENCE.

Presents (prez' ents). Know all men by these presents—i.e. by the writings or documents now present. (Lat. per presentes, by the [writings] present.)

Press-gang. The name given to the bodies of men who formerly carried out the impressment of those liable to forced service in the Army or Navy. It was almost entirely used to get men for the Navy. Edward III set up a Commission of Empressment, 1355. In 1641 Parliament declared the system illegal, but it was later used by Cromwell to obtain men for his land forces and in the latter half of the 18th century it was used with much harshness and scandal to recruit men for the Navy.

Prester John (i.e. John the Presbyter). A fabulous Christian king and priest, supposed in mediæval times to have reigned somewhere in the heart of Asia in the 12th century. He figures in Ariosto (Orlando Furioso, Bks. xviii-xix), and has furnished materials for a host of mediæval legends.

I will fetch you a toothpicker now from the farthest inch of Asia; bring you the length of Prester John's foot; fetch you a hair off the great Cham's beard. . . .—Much Ado About Nothing, ii, 1.

According to "Sir John Mandeville" he was a lineal descendant of Ogier the Dane (q.v.), who penetrated into the north of India with fifteen of his barons, among whom he divided the land. John was made sovereign of Teneduc, and was called Prester because he converted the natives. Another tradition says he had seventy kings for his vassals, and was seen by his subjects only three times in a year. So firm was the belief in his existence that Pope Alexander III (d. 1181) sent him letters by a special messenger. The messenger never returned.

Prestige (pres tēzh). This word has a strangely metamorphosed meaning. The Lat. prestigium means juggling tricks, hence prestidigitateur (Fr.), one who juggles with his fingers. We use the word for that favourable impression which results from good antecedents. The history of the change is this: Juggling tricks were once considered a sort of enchantment; to enchant is to charm, and to charm is to win the heart.

Presto. The name frequently applied to himself by Swift in his Journal to Stella. According to his own account (Journal, August 1st, 1711) it was given him by the notorious Duchess of Shrewsbury, an Italian:—

The Duchess of Shrewsbury asked him, was not that Dr. —, Dr. —, and she could not say my name in English, but said Dr. Presto, which is Italian for Swift.

Preston and his Mastiffs. To oppose Preston and his mastiffs is to be foolhardy, to resist what is irresistible. Christopher Preston established the Bear Garden at Hockley-in-the-Hole in the time of Charles II, and was killed in 1700 by one of his own bears.

. . . I'd as good oppose Myself to Preston and his mastiffs loose.

OLDHAM: iii Satire of Juvenal.

Pretender. The Old Pretender. James Francis Edward Stuart (1688-1766), son of James II.

The Young Pretender. Charles Edward Stuart (1720-88), son of the "Old Pretender." See JACOBITES.

Pretext (prē' tekst). A pretence or excuse. From the Latin prætexta, a dress embroidered in the front worn by Roman magistrates, priests, and children of the aristocracy between the age of thirteen and seventeen. The prætextæ were dramas in which actors personated those who wore the pretexta; hence persons who pretend to be what they are not.

Prevarication. The Latin word varico is to straddle, and prævarico, to go zigzag or crooked. The verb, says Pliny, was first applied to men who ploughed crooked ridges, and afterwards to men who gave crooked answers in the law courts, or deviated from the straight line of truth. Cp. DELIRIUM.

Prevent. Precede, anticipate (Lat. præ-venio, to go before). And as what goes before us may hinder us, so prevent means to hinder or keep back.

My eyes prevent the night watches.—Ps. cxix, 148
Prevent us, O Lord, in all our doings.—Book of Common Prayer.

Previous Question. See QUESTION.

Priam (pri' am). King of Troy when that city was sacked by the Greeks, husband of Hecuba, and father of fifty children, the eldest of whom was Hector. When the gates of Troy were thrown open by the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse, Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, slew the aged Priam.

Priapus (pri' ā' pūs). In Greek mythology, the god of reproductive power and fertility (hence of gardens), and protector of shepherds, fishermen, and farmers. He was the son of Dionysus and Aphrodite, and in later times was regarded as the chief deity of lasciviousness and obscenity. See PHALLICISM.

Prick. Shakespeare has, "'Tis now the prick of noon" (Romeo and Juliet, ii, 4), in allusion to the mark on the dial—made by pricking or indenting with a sharp instrument—that indicated 12 o'clock.

The annual choosing of sheriffs used to be done by the king, who pricked the names on a list at haphazard. Sheriffs are still "pricked" by the sovereign, but the names are chosen beforehand.

Prick-eared. Said of a dog with up-standing ears. The Puritans and Roundheads were so called, because they had their hair cut short and covered their heads with a black skull-cap drawn down tight, leaving the ears exposed.

Pricklouse. An old contemptuous name for a tailor.

Prick-song. Written music for singing, as distinguished from music learnt by ear. So called because the notes were originally pricked in on the parchment. The term has long been obsolete.

Prick the garter. See GARTER.

The prick of conscience. Remorse; tormenting reflection on one's misdeeds. In the 14th century Richard of Hampole wrote a devotional treatise with this title.

To kick against the pricks. To strive against odds, especially against authority. Prick, here, is an ox-goad, and the allusion is to Acts ix, 5—"It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks."

To prick up one's ears. To pay particular attention; to do one's best to follow what is going on. In allusion to the twitching of a horse's ears when its attention is suddenly attracted.

Pride, meaning ostentation, finery, or that which persons are proud of. Spenser talks of "lofty trees yclad in summer's pride" (verdure). Pope, of a "sword whose ivory sheath (was) inwrought with envious pride" (ornamentation); and in this sense the word is used by Jacques in that celebrated passage—

Why, who cries out on pride [dress]
That can therein tax any private party?
What woman in the city do I name
When that I say "the city woman bears
The cost of princes on unworthy shoulders"?
... What is he of baser function
That says his bravery [finery] is not of my cost?"
As You Like It, ii, 7.

Fly pride, says the peacock, a bird proverbial for pride (Comedy of Errors, iv, 3). The pot calling the kettle black.

The heraldic peacock is said to be in his pride when depicted with the tail displayed and the wings drooping.

The pride of the morning. That early mist or shower which promises a fine day. The morning is too proud to come out in her glory all at once—or the proud beauty being thwarted weeps and pouts awhile. Keble uses the phrase in a different sense when he says:—

Pride of the dewy Morning,
The swain's experienced eye
From thee takes timely warning,
Nor trusts the gorgeous sky.

KEBLE: 25th Sunday after Trinity.

Pride's Purge. The Long Parliament, not proving itself willing to condemn Charles I, was purged of its unruly members by Colonel Thomas Pride (d. 1658), who entered the House with a body of soldiers (December 6th, 1648), arrested 47 members, excluded 96 more, and left the House consisting of less than 80 members—the "Rump" (q.v.).

Prig. An old cant word (probably a variant of PRICK) for to filch or steal, also for a thief. In the Winter's Tale the clown calls Autolycus a "prig that haunts wakes, fairs, and bear-baitings."

Shadwell uses the term for a pert coxcomb, and nowadays it denotes a conceited, formal, or didactic person—one who tries to teach others how to comport themselves, etc., without having any right to do so.

Shamwell. Cheatily will help you to the ready; and thou shalt shine, and be as gay as any spruce prig that ever walked the street.

Belford Senior: Well, adad, you are pleasant men, and have the neatest sayings with you; "ready," and "spruce prig," and abundance of the prettiest witty words.—SHADWELL: The Squire of Alsatia, I, i (1688).

Prima Donna (prī' mā don' à) (Ital., first lady). The principal female singer in an opera.

Prima facie (Lat.). At first sight. A prima facie case is a case or statement which, without minute examination into its merits, seems plausible and correct.

It would be easy to make out a strong prima facie case, but I should advise the more cautious policy of audi alteram partem.

Primary Colours. See COLOURS.

Prime (Lat. primus, first). In the Catholic Church the first canonical hour of the day, beginning at 6 a.m. Milton terms sunrise "that sweet hour of prime" (Paradise Lost, v, 170); and the word is used in a general way of the first beginnings of anything, especially of the world itself. Cp. Tennyson's "dragons of the prime" (In Memoriam, lvi).

Prime Minister. The first minister of the Crown; the Premier (q.v.).

Prime Number. The Golden Number; also called simply "the Prime."

Primed. Full and ready to deliver a speech. We say of a man whose head is full of his subject, "He is primed to the muzzle." Also a euphemism for "drunk." The allusion is to firearms.

Primer (pri' mer). Originally the name of the Prayer-book used by laymen in pre-Reformation England; as this was used as a child's first reading-book—generally with the addition of the ABC, etc.—the name was transferred to such books, and so to elementary books on any subject.

Great primer (pron. prim' er). A large-sized type, rather smaller than eighteen-point,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  lines to the inch.

Long primer. A smaller-sized type,  $9\frac{1}{2}$ -point,  $As\ this;$   $7\frac{1}{2}$  lines to the inch.

Primero (prim ēr ō). A very popular card-game for about a hundred years after 1530, in which the cards had three times their usual value, four were dealt to each player, the principal groups being flush, prime, and point. Flush was the same as in poker, prime was one card of each suit, and point was reckoned as in piquet.

I left him at primero with the Duke of Suffolk.—Henry VIII, i, 2.

Primrose. A curious corruption of the French primero, which is the name of the flower in M.E. This is from the late Lat. primula, and the rose (as though from prima rosa, the first, or earliest, rose) is due to a popular blunder.

Primum mobile (prī' mum mō' bile) (Lat., the first moving thing), in the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, was the ninth (later the tenth) sphere, supposed to revolve round the earth from east to west in twenty-four hours, carrying with it all the other spheres (q.v.). Milton refers to it as "that first mov'd" (Paradise Lost, iii, 483), and Sir Thomas Browne (Religio Medici) uses the phrase, "Beyond the first movable," meaning outside the material creation. According to Ptolemy the primum mobile was the boundary of creation, above which came the empyrean (q.v.), or seat of God.

The term is figuratively applied to any machine which communicates motion to others; and also to persons and ideas suggestive of complicated systems. Thus, Socrates may be called the primum mobile of the Dialectic, Megaric, Cyrenaic, and Cynic systems of philosophy.

Primus (prī' mus) (Lat., first). The archbishop, or rather "presiding bishop," of the Episcopal Church of Scotland. He is elected by the other six bishops, and presides in Convocation, or meetings relative to Church matters.

Primus inter pares. The first among equals.

Prince (Lat. princeps, chief, leader). A royal title which, in England, is now limited to the sons of the sovereign and their sons. Princess is similarly limited to the sovereign's daughters and his sons' (but not daughters') daughters.

Crown Prince. The title of the heir-apparent to the throne in some countries, as Sweden, Denmark, and Japan (formerly also in Germany).

Prince Consort. A prince who is the husband of a reigning queen

Prince Imperial. The title of the heir-apparent in the French Empire of 1852-70.

Prince of Asturias. The title of the heir-apparent to the former Spanish throne.

Prince of Piedmont. The heir-apparent to the House of Savoy, former kings of Italy.

Prince of the Church. A cardinal.

Prince of the Peace. The Spanish statesman Manuel de Godoy (1767-1851) was granted this title for having negotiated peace with France in the Treaty of Basel, 1795.

Prince of Wales. See WALES.

Prince Rupert's drops. See RUPERT.

Princess Royal, the title of an eldest daughter of a British sovereign. On the death of a Princess Royal the eldest daughter of the then reigning monarch automatically receives the title and retains it for life, no matter how many sovereigns with daughters may occupy the throne during her lifetime. George III's daughter Charlotte, Queen of Wurtemberg, was Princess Royal until her death in 1828; neither George IV nor William IV having daughters the title was in abeyance until 1840 when Queen Victoria's daughter, Princess Victoria (later the Empress Frederick of Germany) succeeded to it. She remained Princess Royal until her death in 1901, when King Edward's daughter, Princess Louise, Duchess of Fife, succeeded. On her death in 1931 the title passed to Princess Mary, Countess of Harewood, daughter of George V.

In the assembly next upstood
Nisroch, of Principalities the prime.
MILTON: Paradise Lost, vi, 447.

Printing. Wood blocks for printing were first used by the Chinese c. A.D. 600, and movable type was employed c. 1000. In the Western World there is no evidence successfully to refute the claim of Johann Gutenberg (c. 1400-68) who set up a press at Mainz c. 1450.

Printers' Bible, The. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Printers' marks.

? is  $\frac{q}{o}$ —that is, the first and last letters of quæstio (question).

! is  $\frac{i}{o}$ . Io in Latin is the interjection of joy.

¶ is the initial letter of paragraph (reversed).

* is used by the Greek grammarians to arrest attention to something striking (asterisk or star).

† is used by the Greek grammarians to indicate something objectionable (obelisk or dagger). Both marks are now used to indicate footnotes.

Priori. See A PRIORI.

Priscian's Head (prish' àn). To break Priscian's head (in Latin, Diminuere Priscianis caput). To violate the rules of grammar. Priscian was a great grammarian of the early 6th century, whose name is almost synonymous with grammar.

And held no sin so deeply red
As tha' of breaking Priscian's head

BUTLER Hudibras, pt. ii, 2.

Sir Nathaniel—Laus Deo, bone intelligo.

Holofernes: Bone!—bone for bene: Priscian a little scratch'd; 'twill serve.

Love's Labour's Lost, v, 1.

Prisoner of Chillon, The. See CHILLON.

Privateer. A privately owned vessel commissioned by a belligerent state to wage war on the enemy's commerce. The commission, known as letters of marque, was formerly given to a ship-owner who could arm and send out ships to harass the enemy, and important prizes were often captured by privateers. The practice of issuing letters of marque ceased as a result of the Declaration of Paris, 1856. At times it required some ingenuity to discriminate between privateering and piracy.

Privilege. In a Parliamentary sense this applies to the rights enjoyed by Members as such. Both Houses have the right of committing to prison an offender against their privilege, nor, unless the commitment be for some other offence than contempt, can the civil courts inquire into the matter. Contempts include disobedience to orders of the House, indignities offered to it, assaults, insults or libels on Members, interference with officers of the House or tampering with witnesses. Freedom of speech is a dearly bought and much cherished privilege, as also is freedom from arrest.

Privy Council. The council chosen by the sovereign originally to administer public affairs, but now never summoned to assemble as a whole except to proclaim the successor to the Crown on the death of the Sovereign. It usually includes Princes of the Blood, the two Primates, the Bishop of London, the great officers of State and of the Royal Household, the Lord Chancellor and Judges of the Courts of Equity, the Chief Justices of the Courts of Common Law, the Judge Advocate, some of the Puisne Judges, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Lord Mayor of London, Ambassadors, Governors of Colonies, the Commander-in-Chief, and many politicians. The business of the Privy Council is now performed by Committees (of which the Cabinet is technically one), such as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and the great departments of State—the Board of Trade, Local Government, etc., are, in theory, merely committees of the Privy Council. Privy Councillors are entitled to the prefix "the Right Honourable," and rank next after Knights of the Garter who may be commoners.

Privy Seal. The seal which the sovereign uses in proof of assent to a document, kept in the charge of a high officer of State known as the Lord Privy Seal. In matters of minor importance it is sufficient to pass the Privy Seal, but instruments of greater moment must have the Great Seal also.

Prize Court. A court of law set up in time of war to examine the validity of capture of ships and goods made at sea by the navy.

Prize money is the name given to the net proceeds of the sale of enemy property, etc., thus captured at sea. Prior to 1914 the distribution of prize money was confined to those ships actually making the capture; since that date the whole prize money is paid into a common fund.

The prize ring is the boxing ring in which a prize fight takes place, a prize fight being a boxing match for a money prize or trophy.

Pro. Latin for, on behalf of.

Pro and con (Lat.). For and against. "Con" is a contraction of contra. The pros and cons of a matter is all that can be said for or against it.

Pro tanto (Lat.). As an instalment, good enough as far as it goes, but not final; for what it is worth.

I heard Mr. Parnell accept the Bill of 1886 as a measure that would close the differences between the two countries; but since then he stated that he had accepted it as a pro tanto measure. . . . It was a parliamentary bet, and he hoped to make future amendments on it.—Joseph Chamberlain, April 10th, 1893.

Pro tempore (Lat.). Temporarily; for the time being, till something is permanently settled. Contracted into pro tem.

Probate (prō' bāt) (Lat., proved). The probate of a will is the official proving of it, and a copy certified by an officer whose duty it is to attest it. The original is retained in the court registry, and executors cannot act until probate has been obtained.

Proces-verbal (prō sã vār' bal) (Fr.). A detailed and official statement of some fact; especially a written and authenticated statement of facts in support of a criminal charge.

Procnē. See NIGHTINGALE.

Proconsul. A magistrate of Ancient Rome who was invested with the power of a consul and charged with the command of an army or the administration of a province. The name is now often applied to a colonial governor or administrator.

Procris (prok' ris). Unerring as the dart of Procris. When Procris fled from Cephalus out of shame, Diana gave her a dog (Lælaps) that never failed to secure its prey, and a dart which not only never missed aim, but which always returned of its own accord to the shooter. See CEPHALUS.

Procrustes' Bed (prō krus' tēz). Procrustes, in Greek legend, was a robber of Attica, who placed all who fell into his hands upon an iron bed. If they were longer than the bed he cut off the redundant part, if shorter he stretched them till they fitted it; he was slain by Theseus. Hence, any attempt to reduce men to one standard, one way of thinking, or one way of acting, is called placing them on Procrustes' bed.

Tyrant more cruel than Procrustes old,
Who to his iron-bed by torture fits
Their nobler parts, the souls of suffering wits.
MALLET: Verbal Criticism.

Proctor. Literally this is one who manages the affairs of another, the word being a contraction of "procurator." At the universities of Oxford and Cambridge the proctors are two officials whose duties include the maintaining of discipline. Representatives of ecclesiastical bodies in Convocation are called Proctors. The Queen's Proctor is a law official entitled to intervene in a divorce or nullity suit where collusion or fraud is suspected.

Procyon (prō' si on). The Lesser Dog-star, alpha in Canis Minoris. It is the eighth brightest star in the heavens. See ICARIUS.

Prodigal. Festus says the Romans called victims wholly consumed by fire prodigæ hostiæ (victims prodigalized), and adds that those who waste their substance are therefore called prodigals. This derivation is incorrect. Prodigal is Lat. pro-ago or prod-igo, to drive forth, and persons who had spent all their patrimony were "driven forth" to be sold as slaves to their creditors.

The Prodigal. Albert VI, Duke of Austria (1418-63).

Prodigious! See DOMINIE SAMPSON.

Prodigy (Lat. prodigium, a portent, prophetic sign). The prodigy of France. Guillaume Budé (1467-1540); so called by Erasmus.

The Prodigy of Learning. Samuel Hahnemann (1755-1843), the German, was so called by J. Paul Richter.

Producer's Goods. An economic term for goods, such as tools and raw material, which satisfy needs only indirectly, through making other goods.

Profane means literally before or outside the temple (Lat. pro fanum); hence profanus was applied to those persons who came to the temple and remaining outside and unattached, were not initiated.

Profile (prō' fil) means shown by a thread (Ital. profilo; Lat. filum, a thread). A profile is an outline, but especially a view, or drawing or some other representation, of the human face outlined by the median line. The term "profile," for an essay setting forth the outstanding characteristics of an individual—a verbal outline, so to speak—came into use in the 1940s.

Profound. The Profound Doctor. Thomas Bradwardine, Richard Middleton, and other 14th-century scholastic philosophers were given the title.

Most Profound Doctor. Ægidius de Columna (d. 1316), a Sicilian schoolman.

Prog. The verb was used in the 16th century for to poke about for anything, especially to forage for food; hence the noun is slang for food, but its origin is unknown. Burke says, "You are the lion, and I have been endeavouring to prog for you."

So saying, with a smile she left the rogue
To weave more lines of death, and plan for prog.
DR. WOLCOT: Spider and Fly.

Prog is also university slang for proctor (q.v.).

Programme Music is instrumental music based on a literary, historical, or pictorial subject and intended to describe or illustrate this theme musically.

Progress. To report progress, in parliamentary language, is to conclude for the night the business of a bill, and defer the consideration of all subsequent items thereof till the day nominated by the Prime Minister; hence, to put off anything till a more convenient time.

Projection. Powder of projection. A form of the "Philosopher's Stone" (q.v.), which was supposed to have the virtue of changing baser metals into gold. A little of this powder, being cast into the molten metal, was to project from it pure gold.

Proletariat (prō le tār' i āt). The class of the community, labourers and wage-earners, who are destitute of property. In ancient Rome the proletarii contributed nothing to the state but their proles, i.e. offspring; they could hold no office, were ineligible for the army, and were useful only as breeders of the race.

Promenade Concert. A type of concert in which a considerable portion of the audience stand in an open area in the concert-room floor. Promenade Concerts (Proms, as they are familiarly called) were started at Drury Lane and Covent Garden in 1840, but it was not until 1895 that they became a feature of London musical life under the conductorship of Sir Henry Wood (1869-1944) at the Queen's Hall. The destruction of the Hall in 1941 caused a break in the concerts but they were renewed at the Albert Hall under the management of the B.B.C.

Prometheus (prō mē' thūs) (Gr., Forethought). One of the Titans of Greek myth, son of Iapetus and the ocean-nymph Clymene, and famous as a benefactor to man. It is said that Zeus employed him to make men out of mud and water, and that then, in pity for their state, he stole fire from heaven and gave it to them. For this he was chained by Zeus to Mount Caucasus, where an eagle preyed on his liver all day, the liver being renewed at night. He was eventually released by Hercules, who slew the eagle. It was to counterbalance the gift of fire to mankind that Zeus sent Pandora (q.v.) to earth with her box of evils.

Promethean. Capable of producing fire; pertaining to Prometheus (q.v.). The earliest "safety" matches, made in 1805 by Chancel, a French chemist, who tipped cedar splints with paste of chlorate of potash and sugar, were known as "Prometheans." They were dipped into a little bottle containing asbestos wetted with sulphuric acid, and burst into flame on being withdrawn.

Promethean fire. The vital principle; the fire with which Prometheus quickened into life his clay images.

I know not where is that Promethean heat
That can thy light relume.

Othello, v, 2.

The Promethean unguent. Made from a herb on which some of the blood of Prometheus had fallen. Medea gave Jason some of it, and thus rendered his body proof against fire and warlike instruments.

Promised Land or Land of Promise. Canaan; so called because God promised Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob that their offspring should possess it.

Proof. A printed sheet to be examined and approved before it is finally printed. The first, or foul, proof is that which contains all the compositor's errors; when these are corrected the impression next taken is called a clean proof and is submitted to the author; the final impression, which is corrected by the reader, is termed the press proof.

Proof Bible, The. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Proof prints. The first impressions of an engraving. India proofs are those taken off on India paper. Proofs before lettering are those taken off before any inscription is engraved on the plate. After the proofs the connoisseur's order of value is—(1) prints which have the letters only in outline; (2) those in which the letters are shaded with a black line; (3) those in which some slight ornament is introduced into the letters; (4) those in which the letters are filled up quite black.

Proof spirit. A term applied to spirituous liquors in which 0.495 of the weight and 0.5727 of the volume is absolute alcohol, and the specific gravity is 0.91984. When the mixture has more alcohol than water it is called over proof, and when less it is termed under proof.

Prooshan Blue. A term of great endearment, when, after the battle of Waterloo, the Prussians were immensely popular in England. Sam Weller, in Pickwick Papers, addresses his father as "Vell, my Prooshan Blue."

Prop, To. In horses, an Australian term to describe to come to a sudden stop. Used in application to general life in the sense of to jib, to refuse to co-operate.

Propaganda (prop a gān' dā). The Congregation, or College, of the Propaganda (Congregatio de propaganda fide) is a committee of cardinals established in Rome by Gregory XV, in 1622, for propagating the Faith throughout the world. Hence the term is applied to any scheme, association, etc., for making proselytes or influencing public opinion in political, social, and international, as well as in religious matters.

Property Plot, in theatrical language, means a list of all the "properties" or articles which will be required in the play produced. Such as the bell when Macbeth says, "The bell invites me"; the knocking apparatus for the porter ("Heard you that knocking?"); tables, chairs, banquets, tankards, etc., etc. Everything stored in a theatre for general use on the stage is a "prop," these are the manager's props; an actor's "props" are the clothing and other articles which he provides for his own use.

Prophet, The. The special title of Mohammed. According to the Koran there have been 200,000 prophets, but only six of them brought new laws or dispensations, viz. Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mohammed.

The Great or Major Prophets. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel; so called because their writings are more extensive than the prophecies of the other twelve.

The Minor or Lesser Prophets. Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Micah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, whose writings are less extensive than those of the four Great Prophets.

Propositions, in logic, are of four kinds, called A, E, I, O. "A" is a universal affirmative, and "E" a universal negative; "I" a particular affirmative, and "O" a particular negative.

See also SYLLOGISM.

Props. See PROPERTY PLOT.

Prorogue (prō rōg') (Lat. pro-rogo, to prolong).

The Parliament was prorogued. Dismissed for the holidays, or suspended for a time. If dismissed entirely it is said to be "dissolved."

Proscenium (prō sē' ni ūm). The front part of the stage, between the drop-curtain and orchestra. (Gr. proskēnion; Lat. proscēnium.)

Proscription A sort of hue and cry; so called because among the Romans the names of the persons proscribed were written out, and the tablets bearing their names were fixed up in the public forum, sometimes with the offer of a reward for those who should aid in bringing them before the court. If the proscribed did not answer the summons, their goods were confiscated and their persons outlawed. In this case the name was engraved on brass or marble, the offence stated, and the tablet placed conspicuously in the market-place.

Prose means straightforward speaking or writing (Lat. oratio prosa—i.e. pro-versa), in opposition to foot-bound speaking or writing, oratio vincta (fettered speech—i.e. poetry).

It was Monsieur Jourdain, in Molière's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, who suddenly discovered that he had been talking prose for twenty years without knowing it.

Proselytes (pros e lits). From Gr. proselutos, one who has come to a place; hence, a convert, especially (in its original application) to Judaism. Among the Jews proselytes were of two kinds—viz. "The proselyte of righteousness" and the "stranger that is within thy gate" (see HELLENES). The former submitted to circumcision and conformed to the laws of Moses; the latter went no farther than to refrain from offering sacrifice to heathen gods, and from working on the Sabbath.

Proserpina or Proserpine (pro sēr' pi nā, pros' er pīn). The Roman counterpart of the Greek goddess Persephone, queen of the infernal regions and wife of Pluto. As the personification of seasonal changes she passed six months of the year on Olympus, and six in Hades; while at Olympus she was beneficent, but in Hades was stern and terrible. Legend says that as she was amusing herself in the meadows of Sicily Pluto seized her and carried her off in his chariot to the infernal regions for his bride. In her terror she dropped some of the lilies she had been gathering, and they turned to daffodils.

O Proserpina.

For the flowers now, that frightened thou let'st fall
From Dis's waggon! daffodils,
That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty.

Winter's Tale, iv, 4.

In later legend Proserpine was the goddess of sleep, and in the myth of Cupid and Psyche, by Apuleius, after Psyche had long wandered about searching for her lost Cupid, she is sent to Proserpine for "the casket of divine beauty," which she was not to open till she came into the light of day. Just as she was about to step on earth Psyche thought how much more Cupid would love her if she were divinely beautiful; so she opened the casket and found it contained Sleep, which instantly filled all her limbs with drowsiness, and she slept as it were the sleep of death.

Prosperity Robinson. F. J. Robinson, Earl of Ripon (1782-1859), Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1823, so called by Cobbett. In 1825 he boasted in the House of the prosperity of the nation, and his boast was not yet cold when a great financial crisis occurred.

Prospero (pros' pe rō). The rightful Duke of Milan in The Tempest, deposed by his brother. Drifted on a desert island, he practised magic, and raised a tempest in which his brother was shipwrecked. Ultimately Prospero broke his wand, and his daughter married the son of the King of Naples. The Tempest was the last play that Shakespeare wrote, and it is generally thought that Prospero is an allegorical picture of the dramatist bidding farewell to his work.

Protean. See PROTEUS.

Protectionist. One who advocates the imposition of import duties, to "protect" home produce or manufactures.

Protector, The. William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke (d. 1219), appointed Regent on the accession of Henry III (1216).

Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester (1391-1447), Protector of England during the minority of his nephew, Henry VI (1422-47).

Richard, Duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III. He took Edward V into his custody on the death of Edward IV (1483), and was named Protector of the Kingdom.

The Lord Protector of the Commonwealth. Oliver Cromwell (1599-1658) was declared such in 1653. His son Richard succeeded as Lord Protector until the Restoration in 1660.

Protestant. A member of a Christian Church upholding the principles of the Reformation, or (loosely) of any Church not in communion with Rome. Originally, one of the party which adhered to Luther who, in 1529, "protested" against the decree of Charles V of Germany, and appealed from the Diet of Spire to a general council.

The Protestant Pope. Clement XIV. He ordered the suppression of the Jesuits (1773) and was one of the most enlightened men who ever sat in the chair of St. Peter.

Proteus (prō' tūs). In Greek legend, Neptune's herdsman, an old man and a prophet, famous for his power of assuming different shapes at will. Hence the phrase, As many shapes as Proteus—i.e. full of shifts, aliases, disguises.

etc., and the adjective protean, readily taking on different aspects, ever-changing.

Proteus lived in a vast cave, and his custom was to tell over his herds of sea-calves at noon, and then to sleep. There was no way of catching him but by stealing upon him at this time and binding him; otherwise he would elude anyone by a rapid change in shape.

Protevangeliūm (prō te vān jē' li um). The first (Gr. protos) gospel, applied to an apocryphal gospel which had been attributed to St. James the Less. It has been supposed by some critics that all the gospels were based upon this, although no vestige of it has been discovered. The name is also given to the curse upon the serpent in Gen. iii, 15:—

And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel, which has been regarded as the earliest utterance of the gospel.

Prothalamion (prō thā lā' mi ūn). The term coined by Spenser (from Gr. thalamos, a bridal chamber) as a title for his "Spousall Verse" (1596) in honour of the double marriage of Lady Elizabeth and Lady Katherine Somerset, daughters of the Earl of Worcester, to Henry Gilford and William Peter, Esquires. Hence, a song sung in honour of the bride and bridegroom before the wedding.

Proto-martyr. The first martyr (Gr. protos, first). Stephen the deacon is so called (Acts v, vii), and St. Alban is known as the proto-martyr of Britain.

Protocol (prō' tō kol). The first rough draft or original copy of a dispatch, which is to form the basis of a treaty; from Gr. proto-koleon, a sheet glued to the front of a manuscript, or to the case containing it, and bearing an abstract of the contents and purport. Also the ceremonial procedure used in affairs of diplomacy or on state occasions.

Protoplasm (prō' tō plazm) (Gr. proto, first, plasma, thing moulded). The physical basis of life; the material composing cells, from which all living organisms are developed. It is a viscid, semi-fluid, semi-transparent substance composed of a highly unstable combination of oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, and nitrogen, capable of spontaneous movement, contraction, etc. It can best be seen in the simpler jellyfishes. Sarcodē (Gr. sarcos, flesh) is an earlier name of the substance.

Tarquin II of Rome. Superbus. (Reigned 535-10 B.C., d. 496).

The proud Duke. Charles Seymour, 6th Duke of Somerset (1662-1748). He would never suffer his children to sit in his presence, and would never speak to his servants except by signs.

In engineering and mechanics proud is a term denoting any screw or piece of metal which protrudes farther than it should.

Province. From Lat. provincia, the name given by the Romans to a territory brought under subjugation, possibly because previously conquered (pro, before, vincere, to conquer). It is now applied, in the plural, to districts in a country, usually at a distance from the metropolis, whence the special meaning of provincial—narrow, unpolished, rude—and to the territory under the ecclesiastical control of an archbishop or metropolitan.

The Provincial of an Order is the superior of all the monastic houses of that Order in a given province.

Prudhomme (proo' dom). The French colloquialism for a man of experience and great prudence, of estimable character and practical good sense. Your Monseigneur Prudhomme is never a man of genius and originality. The name arises from the character of Joseph Prudhomme in Henri Mounier's sketch thus entitled (1857).

Prunella (pru' nel a). A dark, smooth, woollen stuff of which clergymen's and barristers' gowns used to be made; probably so termed from its colour—plum, or prune. It is still in use for gaiters and the uppers of boots.

All leather and prunella. See LEATHER.

Prussianism. A term given to the overbearing spirit and methods characteristic of Prussians dating from the military despotism that has flourished among them since the days of Frederick the Great (1712-86). It came to full-flower after the Franco-Prussian war of 1870 when Prussia forced herself as a leader among the German states forming the new German Empire. Under the last Kaiser, who was King of Prussia, the spirit of Prussianism led to World War I, and it has taken a second world war and the virtual obliteration of German civilization to break if not to destroy Prussianism.

Prussian blue. So called because it was discovered by a Prussian, viz. Diesbach, a colourman of Berlin, in 1704. It was sometimes called Berlin blue. It is hydrated ferric ferrocyanide, and prussic acid (hydrocyanic acid) is made from it.

Pry, Paul. An idle, meddlesome fellow, who has no occupation of his own, and is always interfering with other folk's business. The term comes from the hero of John Poole's comedy, Paul Pry (1825).

Psalmanazar, George, a classical example of the imposter. A Frenchman whose real name is unknown to this day, he appeared in London in 1703 claiming to be a native of Formosa, at that time an almost unknown island. In 1704 he published an account of Formosa with a grammar of the language, which was from beginning to end a fabrication of his own. The literary and critical world of London was taken in, but his imposture was soon exposed by Catholic missionaries who had laboured in Formosa, and after a time Psalmanazar publicly confessed his fraud. He turned over a new leaf and applied himself to the study of Hebrew and other genuine labours, ending his days in 1763 as a man of some repute and the friend of Dr. Johnson.

Psalms. Seventy-three psalms are inscribed with David's name, twelve with that of Asaph the singer; eleven go under the name of the Sons of Korah, a family of singers; one (i.e. Ps. xc) is attributed to Moses. The whole compilation is divided into five books: Bk. 1, from i to xli; Bk. 2, from xlii to lxxii; Bk. 3, from lxxiii to lxxxix; Bk. 4, from xc to cvi; Bk. 5, from cvii to cl.

The Book of Psalms—or much of its contents—was for centuries attributed to David (hence called the sweet psalmist of Israel), but it is very doubtful whether he wrote any of them, and it is certain that the majority belong to a later period. The tradition comes from the author of Chronicles, and in 2 Sam. xxii is a psalm attributed to David that is identical with Ps. xviii. Also, the last verse of Ps. lxxii ("the prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended") seems to suggest that he was the author up to that point.

In explanation of the confusion between the R.C. and the Protestant psalters it should be noted that Psalms x to cxiii and cxv to cxlvi in the R.C. psalter are numbered one behind those in the A.V. and Prayer Book.

See GRADUAL PSALMS; PENITENTIAL PSALMS, etc.

Pschent (pschent). The royal double crown of ancient Egypt, combining that of Upper Egypt—a high conical white cap terminating in a knob—with the red one of Lower Egypt, the latter being the outermost.

Pseudonym. See NOM DE PLUME.

Psyche (sīk' è) (Gr., breath; hence, life, or soul itself). In "the latest-born of the myths," Cupid and Psyche, an episode in the Golden Ass of Apuleius (2nd century A.D.), a beautiful maiden beloved by Cupid, who visited her every night, but left her at sunrise. Cupid bade her never seek to know who he was, but one night curiosity overcame her prudence; she lit the lamp to look at him, a drop of hot oil fell on his shoulder, and he awoke and fled. The abandoned Psyche then wandered far and wide in search of her lover; she became the slave of Venus, who imposed on her heartless tasks and treated her most cruelly; but ultimately she was united to Cupid, and became immortal. The story is told by Walter Pater in Marius the Epicurean.

Ptolemaic System (tol e mā' ik). The system promulgated by Ptolemy, the celebrated astronomer of Alexandria in the 2nd century A.D., to account for the apparent motion of the heavenly bodies. He taught that the earth is fixed in the centre of the universe, and the heavens revolve round it from east to west, carrying with them the sun, planets, and fixed stars, in their respective spheres (q.v.), which he imagined as solid coverings (like so many skins of an onion) each revolving at different velocities. This theory, with slight modifications, held the field till the time of Copernicus (16th century).

Public (Lat. publicus, earlier poplicus from poplus, later populus, the people). The people generally and collectively; the members generally of a state, nation, or community. Also, a colloquial contraction of "public-house," frequently abbreviated still further to "pub."

The simple life I can't afford,
Besides, I do not like the grub—
I want a mash and sausage, "scored"—
Will someone take me to a pub?

G. K. CHESTERTON: Ballade of an Anti-Puritan

Public-house signs. Much of a nation's history, and more of its manners and feelings, may be gleaned from its public-house signs. A very large number of them are selected out of compliment to the lord of the manor, either because he is the "great man" of the neighbourhood, or because the proprietor is some servant whom "it delighted the lord to honour." When the name and titles of the lord have been exhausted, we get his cognizance or his favourite pursuit, as the Bear and Ragged Staff, the Fox and Hounds. As the object of the sign is to speak to the feelings and attract, another fruitful source is either some national hero or great battle; thus we get the Marquis of Granby and the Duke of Wellington, the Waterloo and the Alma. The proverbial loyalty of our nation has naturally shown itself in our tavern signs, giving us the Victoria, Prince of Wales, the Albert, the Crown, and so on. Literature is not well represented, though Shakespeare and Ben Jonson give their names to a good many houses, and in London there is a Milton Arms, a Macaulay Arms, a Sir Richard Steele, and a Sir Walter Scott, as well as The Miller of Mansfield, Pindar of Wakefield, Sir John Falstaff, Robinson Crusoe, and Valentine and Orson. The Good Samaritan, Noah's Ark, Simon the Tanner, and Gospel Oak all have a biblical flavour, and old ecclesiastical manorial rights are responsible for many tavern signs (see The Three Kings, below). Myth and legend are represented by houses named The Apollo, Hercules, Phœnix, King Lud, Merlin's Cave, Man in the Moon, Punch, Robin Hood, The Moonrakers, etc.

Some signs indicate a speciality of the house, as the Bowling Green, the Skittles; some a political bias, as the Royal Oak; a number are reminiscent of the old trade guilds, such as the Coopers' Arms, Bricklayers' Arms, Carpenters' Arms, and some are an attempt at wit, as the Five Ails and The World Turned Upside Down. The following list will serve to exemplify the subject:—

The Bag 'o Nails. A corruption of the "Bacchanals."

The Barley Mow (q.v.).

The Bear. From the popular sport of bear-baiting.

The Bear and Bacchus, in High Street, Warwick. A corruption of Bear and Baculus—i.e. Bear and Ragged Staff, the badge of the Earl of Warwick.

The Bell. In allusion to races, a silver bell having been the winner's prize up to the reign of Charles II.

The Bell Savage. See LA BELLE SAUVAGE.

The Blue Boar. The cognizance of Richard III.

The Boar's Head. The cognizance of the Gordons, etc.

The Bolt-in-Tun. The punning heraldic badge of Prior Bolton, last of the clerical rulers of St. Bartholomew's, previous to the Reformation.

The Bull. The cognizance of Richard, Duke of York. The Black Bull is the cognizance of the house of Clare.

The Bull and Gate (q.v.).

The Bull's Head. The cognizance of Henry VIII.

The Case is Altered. See Plowden.

The Castle. This, being the arms of Spain, signified that Spanish wines were to be obtained within.

The Cat and Fiddle. See CAT.

The Cat and Wheel. A corruption of "St. Catherine's Wheel"; or an announcement that cat and balance-wheels are provided for the amusement of customers.

The Chequers. (1) In honour of the Stuarts, whose shield was "checky," like a Scotch plaid. (2) In commemoration of the licence granted by the Earls of Arundel or Lords Warrenne. (3) An intimation that a room is set apart for merchants and accountants, where they can be private and make up their accounts, or use their "chequers" undisturbed.

The Coach and Horses. A favourite sign of a posting-house or stage-coach house.

The Cock and Bottle. By some said to be a corruption of the "Cork and Bottle," meaning that wine is sold there in bottles.

The Cross Keys. Common in the mediæval ages, and in allusion to St. Peter, or one of the bishops whose cognizance it is—probably the lord of the manor or the patron saint of the parish church. The cross keys are emblems of the papacy, St. Peter, the Bishop of Gloucester, St. Servetus, St. Hippolytus, St. Geneviève, St. Petronilla, St. Osyth, St. Martha, and St. Germanus.

The Devil. The sign of more than one old public-house in the neighbourhood of Fleet Street. It represents St. Dunstan seizing the devil by the nose. See DEVIL.

The Dog and Duck, or The Duck in the Pond. Indicating that the sport so called could be seen there. A duck was put into water, and a dog set to hunt it; the fun was to see the duck diving and the dog following it under water.

The Red Dragon. The cognizance of Henry VII or the principality of Wales.

The Spread Eagle. The arms of Germany; to indicate that German wines could be obtained within.

The Fox and Goose. To signify that there are arrangements within for playing the Royal Game of Fox and Goose.

St. George and the Dragon. In compliment to the patron saint of England.

The Globe. The royal cognizance of Portugal; intimating that Portuguese wines were stocked.

The Goat and Compasses. See GOAT.

The Black Goats. A public-house sign, High Bridge Lincoln, formerly The Three Goats—i.e. three gowts (gutters or drains), by which the water from the Swan Pool (a large lake that formerly existed to the west of the city) was conducted into the bed of the Witham.

The Golden Cross. This refers to the ensigns carried by the Crusaders.

The Green Man. The late gamekeeper of the lord of the manor turned publican. At one time these servants were dressed in green.

The Green Man and Still—i.e. the herbalist bringing his herbs to be distilled.

The Hare and Hounds. In compliment to the sporting squire or lord of the manor.

The Hole in the Wall. Probably so called because it was approached by a small passage or "hole" between houses standing in front of the tavern.

The Horse and Chains. A favourite sign for an inn at the foot of a hill, signifying that a chain-horse is kept.

The Horse and Groom. Where a stallion was kept for stud purposes.

The Iron Devil. Said to be a corruption of "Hirondelle" (the swallow).

The Three Kings. A mediæval sign, in allusion to the three kings of Cologne, the Magi (q.v.). Many public-house signs of this period had a reference to ecclesiastical matters, usually because they were church property or on church land, Such, for instance, are The Mitre, Abbey, Priory, and Lamb and Flag.

The Man with a Load of Mischief. A public-house sign, Oxford Street, nearly opposite to Hanway Yard. It is said to have been painted by Hogarth, and shows a man carrying a woman and a lot of other impedimenta on his back.

The Marquis of Granby. In compliment to John Manners (1721-70), eldest son of John, third Duke of Rutland—a bluff, brave soldier, generous, and greatly beloved by his men.

What conquest now will Britain boast

Or where display her banners?

Alas! in Granby she has lost

True courage and good Manners.

The Pig and Tinder Box. See PIG.

The Plum and Feathers (near Stokenchurch, Oxford). A corruption of the "Plume of Feathers," meaning that of the Prince of Wales.

The Queen of Bohemia. In honour of James I's daughter Elizabeth, who married the King of Bohemia.

The Rose. A symbol of England, as the Thistle is of Scotland, and the Shamrock of Ireland.

The Rose and Crown. One of the "loyal" public-house signs.

The Rose of the Quarter Sessions. A corruption of La Rose des Quatre Saisons.

The Salutation and Cat. The "Salutation" (which refers to the angel saluting the Virgin Mary) is the sign of the house, and the "Cat" is added to signify that arrangements are made for playing cat or tipcat.

The Saracen's Head. Reminiscent of the Crusades; adopted probably by some Crusader after his return home, or to excite sympathy with these quixotic expeditions.

The Ship and Shovel. Referring to Sir Cloudesley Shovel, a favourite admiral in Queen Anne's reign.

The Seven Stars. An astrological sign of the Middle Ages.

The Three Suns. The cognizance of Edward IV.

The Sun and the Rose. The cognizance of the House of York.

The Swan with Three Necks. See SWAN.

The Swan and the Antelope. The cognizance of Henry V.

The Talbot (a hound). The arms of the Talbot family.

The Turk's Head. Like the "Saracen's Head," an allusion to the Crusades.

The Two Chairmen. Not an uncommon sign for small houses in districts (such as Charing Cross and Wardour Street) that were fashionable residential quarters in the 18th century, when sedan chairs were in vogue.

The Unicorn. The Scottish supporter in the royal arms of Great Britain.

The White Hart. The cognizance of Richard II; the White Lion, of Edward IV as Earl of March; the White Swan, of Henry IV and Edward III.

Publicans. The name given in the New Testament to the provincial representatives (publicani, servants of the state) of the Magister or master tax-collector who resided at Rome. The taxes were farmed by a contractor called the Manceps, who divided the whole taxable area into convenient districts, each of which was under a Magister.

Pucelle, La (pū sel'). Fr., "The Maid," i.e. of Orleans, Joan of Arc (1410-31). Chaplain wrote a dull heroic poem with this title; Voltaire a mock-heroic, satirical, and in parts a scurrilous one.

Puck. A mischievous, tricky sprite of popular folk-lore, also called Robin Goodfellow, originally an evil demon, but transformed and popularized in his present form by Shakespeare (Midsummer Night's Dream), who shows him as a merry wanderer of the night, "rough, knurly limbed, faun-faced, and shock-pated, a very Shetlander among the gossamer-winged" fairies around him.

Pudens (pū' denz). A soldier in the Roman army, mentioned in 2 Tim. iv, 21, in connexion with Linus and Claudia. According to tradition, Claudia, the wife of Pudens, was a British lady; Linus, otherwise called Cyllen, was her brother; and Lucius "the British king," the grandson of Linus. Tradition further adds that Lucius wrote to Eleutherus, Bishop of Rome, to send missionaries to Britain to convert the people.

Pueblo (pweb' lō). The Spanish word for "people" but applied particularly to the farming, peace-loving Indians of New Mexico and Arizona, and to their commensal dwellings of adobe or stone.

Puff. An onomatopœic word, suggestive of the sound made by puffing wind from the mouth. As applied to inflated or exaggerated praise, extravagantly worded advertisements, reviews, etc., it dates at least from the early 17th century, and the implication is that such commendation is really as worthless and transitory as a puff of wind.

In Sheridan's The Critic (1779), Puff, who, he himself says, is "a practitioner in panegyric, or, to speak more plainly, a professor of the art of puffing" gives a catalogue of puffs:—

Yes, sir,—puffing is of various sorts, the principal are, the puff direct, the puff preliminary, the puff collateral, the puff collusive and the puff oblique, or puff by implication. These all assume, as circumstances require, the various forms of letter to the editor, occasional anecdote, impartial critique, observation from correspondent, or advertisement from the party. The Critic, I, ii.

Puffed up. Conceited; elated with conceit or praise; filled with wind. A puff is a tartlet with a very light or puffy crust.

That no one of you be puffed up one against another.—1 Cor. iv, 6.

Puff-ball. A fungus of the genus Lycoperdon, so called because it is ball-shaped and when it is ripe it bursts and the spores come out in a "puff" of fine powder.

Puisne Judges (pū' ni) means the younger-born judges. They are the judges of the High Court of Justice other than the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, and the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. The word is the same, etymologically, as puny. (Fr. puisé, subsequently born; Lat. post natus.)

Puke (pūk). (U.S.A.) An uncomplimentary term for a Missourian.

Pukka (pūk' a). A Hindustani word that has crept into common speech meaning substantial, real, bona fide, conventional. It has developed a somewhat derogatory implication.

Pulhems. A system for assessing the physical and mental capabilities of a recruit. It was introduced in the Canadian Army in 1943. The word is a mnemonic: P, physical capacity; U, upper limbs; L, locomotion; H, hearing; E, eyesight; M, mental capacity; S, stability (emotional). In 1948 the system was introduced into the British armed forces, but with two E's, for the Navy and Air Force demanded that the visual acuity of each eye be registered separately.

Pulitzer Prizes for literary work, the drama and music are awarded annually from funds left for the purpose by Joseph Pulitzer (1847-1911) a prominent and wealthy American editor and newspaper proprietor.

Pull. A long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together—i.e. a steady energetic, and systematic co-operation. The reference may be either to a boat, where all the oarsmen pull together with a long and strong pull at the oars; or it may be to the act of hauling with a rope, when a simultaneous strong pull is indispensable.

Pull devil pull baker. Let each one do the best for himself in his own line of business, but let not one man interfere in that of another.

It's all fair pulling, "pull devil, pull baker," someone has to get the worst of it. Now it's us [bush-rangers], now it's them [the police] that gets ... rubbed out.—BOLDBREWOD' Robbery under Arms, ch. xxxvii.

The long pull. The extra quantity of beer supplied by a publican to his customer over and above the pint or half-pint ordered and paid for. Under the restrictions imposed during World War I this was abolished by order, as it is a form of "treating."

To have the pull of or over one. To have the advantage over him; to be able to dictate terms or make him do what you wish.

To pull bacon. To cock a snook.

To pull one's weight. To do the very best one can, exert oneself to the utmost of one's ability. The phrase comes from rowing; an oarsman who does not put all his weight into the stroke tends to become a passenger.

To pull oneself together. To rouse oneself to renewed activity; to shake off depression or inertia.

To pull someone's leg. To delude him in a humorous way, lead him astray by chaff, exaggeration, etc.

To pull the wool over someone's eyes. To deceive or hoodwink; to blind him temporarily to what is going on.

To pull through. To get oneself well out of a difficulty—such as over a serious illness, through a stiff examination, etc. To work in harmony with one view; to co-operate heartily.

Pullman. Properly a well-fitted railway saloon or sleeping-car built at the Pullman Carriage Works, Illinois; so called from the designer, George M. Pullman (1832-97) of Chicago. The word is now applied to other luxurious railway saloons, and to motor-cars.

Pummel. See POMMEL.

Pump. To pump someone is to extract information out of him by artful questions; to draw from him all he knows as one draws water from a well by gradual pumping. Ben Jonson, in A Tale of a Tub (IV, iii) has "I'll stand aside whilst thou pump'st out of him his business."

Pumpernickel (pūmp'ēr nīk ēl). The coarse rye-bread ("brown George") eaten by German peasants, especially in Westphalia. Thackeray applied the term as a satirical nickname to petty German princelings ("His Transparency, the Duke of Pumpernickel") who made a great show with the court officials and etiquette, but whose revenue was almost nil.

Pun. He who would make a pun would pick a pocket. Dr. Johnson is generally credited with this silly dictum, but the correct version is—"Any man who would make such an execrable pun would not scruple to pick my pocket" the remark addressed by the critic, John Dennis (1657-1734) to Purcell. See the Public Advertiser, Jan. 12th, 1779, and the Gentleman's Magazine, vol. ii, p. 324; also the note to Pope's Dunciad, bk. i, l. 63.

The "execrable pun" was this: Purcell rang the bell for the drawer or waiter, but no one answered it. Purcell, tapping the table, asked Dennis "why the table was like the tavern!" Ans. "Because there is no drawer in it."

Punch. The name of this beverage, which was introduced into England from India in the early 17th century, has generally been held to derive from Hindustani panch, five, because it has five principal ingredients (viz. spirit, water, spice, sugar, and some acid fruit essence). There are, however, linguistic and phonetic objections to accepting this derivation—as well as the fact that early recipes give anything from three to six principal ingredients, and there was no reason why it should have been named from five—and it is just as likely that it is merely a contraction by sailors engaged in the East Indian trade of puncheon, the large cask from which their grog was served.

Punch, Mr. The hero of the popular puppet show, Punch and Judy. The name comes from the Italian Pulcinello. In the 18th century the suggestion was made that the name was from a popular and ugly low comedian named Puccio d'Aniello, but nothing definite is known of him, and the conjecture is certainly an example of "popular etymology." Another suggestion is that the name is derived from that of Pontius Pilate in the old mystery plays.

The show first appeared in England a little before the accession of Queen Anne, and the story is attributed to Silvio Fiorillo, an Italian comedian of the 17th century. Punch, in a fit of jealousy, strangles his infant child, whereupon his wife, Judy, fetches a bludgeon with which she belabours him till he seizes another bludgeon, beats her to death, and flings the two bodies into the street. A passing police officer enters the house; Punch flees, but is arrested by an officer of the Inquisition and shut up in prison, whence he escapes by means of a golden key. The rest is an allegory, showing how the light-hearted Punch triumphs over (1) Ennui, in the shape of a dog, (2) Disease, in the disguise of a doctor, (3) Death, who is beaten to death, and (4) the Devil himself, who is outwitted.

The satirical humorous weekly paper, Punch, or the London Charivari, is, of course, named from "Mr. Punch." It first appeared on July 17th, 1841.

Pleased as Punch. Greatly delighted. Our old friend is always singing with self-satisfaction in his naughty ways, and his evident "pleasure" is contagious to the beholders.

Suffolk punch. A short, thick-set cart-horse. The term was formerly applied to any short fat man, and is probably the same word as above, though it may be connected with puncheon, the large cask.

I did hear them call their fat child Punch, which pleased me mightily, that word having become a word of common use for everything that is thick and short. —Pepys's Diary, Apr. 30th, 1669.

Punctual. No bigger than a point, exact to a point or moment. (Lat. ad punctum.) Hence the angel, describing this earth to Adam, calls it "This spacious earth, this punctual spot"—i.e. a spot no bigger than a point (Milton: Paradise Lost, viii, 23).

Punctuality is the politeness of kings (L'ex-actitude est la politesse des rois). A favourite maxim of Louis XVIII, but erroneously attributed by Samuel Smiles to Louis XIV.

Pundit (pūn' dit). An East Indian scholar, skilled in Sanskrit, and learned in law, divinity, and science. We use the word for a learned person, also for one more stocked with book lore than deep erudition.

Punic Apple (pū' nīk). A pomegranate; so called because it is the pomum or "apple" belonging to the genus Punica.

Punica fides (pū' nīk ā fī' dēz). Treachery, violation of faith, the faith of the Carthaginians, Lat. Punicus, earlier Penicus, meaning a Phœnician, hence applied to the Carthaginians, who were of Phœnician descent. The Carthaginians were accused by the Romans of breaking faith with them, a most extraordinary instance of the "pot calling the kettle black"; for whatever infidelity they were guilty of, it could scarcely equal that of their accusers. Cp. ATTIC FAITH.

Our Punic faith

Is infamous, and branded to a proverb.

ADDISON: Cato, ii.

Pup. Slang for a pupil, especially an undergraduate studying with a tutor.

As applied to the young of dogs, the word is an abbreviation of puppy, which represents Fr. poupée, a dressed doll, a plaything.

An empty-headed, impertinent young fellow is frequently called a young puppy, hence Douglas Jerrold's epigram—more witty than true—

Dogmatism is only puppyism come to maturity.

To be sold a pup. To be swindled.

Purbeck (Dorsetshire). Noted for a marble used in ecclesiastical ornaments. Chichester cathedral has a row of columns of this limestone. The columns of the Temple church, London; the tomb of Queen Eleanor, in Westminster Abbey; and the throne of the archbishop in Canterbury cathedral, are other specimens.

Pure, Simon. See SIMON PURE.

Purgatory. The doctrine of Purgatory, according to which the souls of the departed suffer for a time till they are purged of their sin, is of ancient standing, and was held in a modified form by the Jews, who believed that the soul of the deceased was allowed for twelve months after death to visit its body and the places or persons it especially loved. This intermediate state they called by various names, as "the bosom of Abraham," "the garden of Eden," "upper Gehenna." The Sabbath was always a free day, and prayer was supposed to benefit those in this intermediate state.

The outline of this doctrine was annexed by the early Fathers, and was considerably strengthened by certain passages in the New Testament, particularly Rev. vi, 9-11, and 1 Pet. iii, 18 and 19. The first decree on the subject was promulgated by the Council of Florence, in 1439; and in 1562 it was condemned by the Church of England, the XXIInd of the "Articles of Religion" stating that—

The Romish Doctrine concerning Purgatory . . . is a fond thing vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God.

Purge. A neo-euphemism in dictator countries for the elimination (usually by murder) of persons suspected of disaffection or in some other way undesirable to party leaders. The most notorious of party purges was the infamous "night of the knives," on June 30th, 1934, when Roehm, a potential rival of Hitler, and some 7,000 others were murdered in cold blood within 24 hours. There have been many "purges" in Bolshevik Russia, but the particulars of them have never come to the light of day.

See also PRIDE'S PURGE.

Puritans. Seceders from the Reformed Church in the sixteenth century; so called because, wishing for a more radical purification of religion, they rejected all human traditions and interference in religious matters, acknowledging the sole authority of the "pure Word of God," without "note or comment." Their motto was: "The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible." The English Puritans were sometimes by the Reformers called Precisionists, from their preciseness in matters called "indifferent." Andrew Fuller named them Non-conformists, because they refused to subscribe to the Act of Uniformity.

The Puritan hated bearbating, not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectators. Indeed he generally contrived to enjoy the double pleasure of tormenting both spectators and bear.—MACAULAY: History of England, Bk. 1, ch. ii.

Purler. A cropper, or heavy fall from one's horse in a steeplechase or in the hunting-field; also, a knockdown blow.

Seraph's white horse cleared it, but falling with a mighty crash, gave him a purler on the opposite side.—OUIDA: Under Two Flags, ch. vi.

Purlieu (pěr' lū). The outlying parts of a place, the environs; originally the borders or outskirts of a forest, especially a part which was formerly part of the forest. So called from O.Fr. pourallé, a place free from the forest laws. Henry II, Richard I, and John made certain lands forest lands; Henry III allowed certain portions all round to be freed from the restrictions imposed on the royal forests, and the "perambulation" by which this was effected was called pourallée, a going through. The lieu (as though for "place") was an erroneous addition due to English pronunciation and spelling of the French word.

In the purlieus of this forest stands
A sheepcote fenced about with olive-trees.

As You Like It, iv, 3.

Purple. The colour of ecclesiastical mourning and penitence (hence worn during Lent); also that of the dress of emperors, kings, and prelates; from the Lat. purpura which was formed on Gr. porphyra, meaning both the shell-fish which yielded Tyrian purple (a species of Murex), and the purplish marble, porphyry. A priest is said to be raised to the purple when he is made a cardinal, though the cardinalial colour is actually red. It is one of the tinctures (purpure) used in heraldry, and in engravings is shown by lines running diagonally from sinister to dexter (i.e. from right to left as one looks at it). See COLOURS.

Born in the purple. Said of the child of a king or emperor (see PORPHYROGENITUS), hence of anyone of exalted birth or "born with a silver spoon in his mouth." The expression comes from a Byzantine custom which ordained that the empress should be brought to bed in a chamber the walls of which were lined with porphyry, or purple.

Purple Heart. A U.S. army medal awarded for wounds received by enemy action while on active service. It consists of a silver heart bearing the effigy of George Washington, suspended from a purple ribbon with white edges.

Purple patches. Highly coloured or florid passages in a literary work which is (generally speaking) otherwise undistinguished. The allusion is to Horace's De Arte Poetica, l, 15:—

Inceptis gravibus plerumque et magna professis,
Purpureus, late qui splendeat, unus et alter
Adasit pannus.

(Often to weighty enterprises and such as profess great objects, one or two purple patches are sewed on to make a fine display in the distance.)

Pursuivant (pěr' swi vânt). The lowest grade of the officers of arms composing the College of Arms, or Heralds' College, the others, under the Earl Marshal, being (1) the Kings of Arms, and (2) the Heralds.

England has four Pursuivants, viz. Rouge Croix, Bluemantle, Rouge Dragon, and Portcullis; Scotland has three, viz. Carrick, March, and Unicorn; and Ireland one, Athlone.

Pursy, Broken-winded, or in a bloated state in which the wind is short and difficult (Fr. poussif).

A fat and pursy man. Shakespeare has "pursy insolence," the insolence of Jesurun, "who waxed fat and kicked." In Hamlet we have "the fatness of these pursy times"—i.e. wanton or self-indulgent times.

Puseyite (pū' zi it). A High Church follower of E. B. Pusey (1800-82), Professor of Hebrew at Oxford, one of the leaders of the "Oxford Movement," and a contributor to the Tracts for the Times. See TRACTARIANS.

Push. Military slang for a strong concerted forward movement, a general attack; hence, by extension, for a body of troops engaged on an offensive; a gang, crowd, "crush."

To give one the push. To give him his congé, give him the sack.

To push off. To commence the game, the operations, etc. A phrase from boating—one starts by pushing the boat off from the bank. Push off! said imperatively, is equivalent to "Get you gone!" "Go to the devil!"

Puss. A conventional call-name for a cat; applied also (in the 17th century and since) to hares. Its original is unknown, though it is present in many Teutonic languages. The derivation from Lat. lepus, a hare, Frenchified into le pus, is of course only humorous.

Puss in Boots. This nursery tale, Le Chat Botté, is from Straparola's Nights (1530), No. xi, where Constantine's cat procures his master a fine castle and the king's heiress. It was translated from the Italian into French in 1585, and appeared in Perrault's Les contes de ma Mère l'Oie (1697), through which medium it reached England. In the story the clever cat secures a fortune and a royal partner for his master, who passes off as the Marquis of Carabas, but is in reality a young miller without a penny in the world.

Pussyfoot. A person with a soft, cat-like, sneaking tread.

Pussyfoot Johnson was the nickname of W. E. Johnson (1882-1945) who gained the sobriquet from his unwavering advocacy of prohibition, and his silent, stealthy, relentless methods of enforcing it. It was partly owing to his determination and perversity that Prohibition was introduced in U.S.A. in 1919.

Put (püt). A clown, a silly shallow-pate, a butt, one easily "put upon."

Queer country puts extol Queen Bess's reign.
BRAMSON.

Put and take. A game of chance played with a modification of the old "tee-to-tum," one side of which is marked Put—signifying that the player pays—and another with Take. It was immensely popular for a few months about Christmastime, 1921.

Putsch (pooch). A German word from the English push applied to a minor revolt or political uprising.

Pygmalion (pig mā' li òn). A sculptor and king of Cyprus in Greek legend, who, though he hated women, fell in love with his own ivory statue of Aphrodite. At his earnest prayer the goddess gave life to the statue and he married it.

The story is told in Ovid's Metamorphoses, x, and appeared in English dress in John Marston's Metamorphosis of Pygmalion's Image (1598). Morris retold it in The Earthly Paradise (August), and W. S. Gilbert adapted it in his comedy of Pygmalion and Galatea (1871), in which the sculptor is a married man. His wife (Cynisca) was jealous of the animated statue (Galatea), which, after considerable trouble, voluntarily returned to its original state. The name was used figuratively by G. B. Shaw for a play produced in 1912.

Pygmy (pig' mi). The name used by Homer and other classical writers for a supposed race of dwarfs said to dwell somewhere in Ethiopia; from Gr. pugme, the length of the arm from elbow to knuckles. Fable has it that every spring the cranes made war on them and devoured them; they used an axe to cut down corn-stalks; when Hercules went to the country they climbed up his gilet by ladders to drink from it, and while he was asleep two whole armies of them fell upon his right hand, and two upon his left and were rolled up by Hercules in his lion's skin. It is easy to see how Swift has availed himself of this Grecian legend in his Gulliver's Travels.

The term is now applied to certain dwarfish races of central Africa (whose existence was first demonstrated late in the 19th century), Malaysia, etc.; also to small members of a class, as the pygmy hippopotamus.

Pylades and Orestes (pi' lá dēz, ō res' tēz). Two friends in Homeric legend, whose names have become proverbial for friendship, like those of Damon and Pythias, David and Jonathan. Orestes was the son, and Pylades the nephew, of Agamemnon, after whose murder Orestes was put in the care of Pylades' father (Strophius), and the two became fast friends. Pylades assisted Orestes in obtaining vengeance on Ægisthus and Clytemnestra, and afterwards married Electra his friend's sister.

Pylon (pi' lon). Properly a monumental gateway (Gr. pulon), especially of an Egyptian temple; now usually applied to the obelisks that mark out the course in an aerodrome or to the standards for electric cables.

Pyramid (pir' á mid). There are some 70 pyramids still remaining in Egypt, but those specially called The Pyramids are the three larger in the group of eight known as the Pyramids of Gizeh. Of these the largest, the Great Pyramid, is the tomb of Cheops, a king of the 4th Dynasty, about 4000 B.C. It was 480 ft. in height (now about 30 ft. less), and the length of each base is 755 ft. The Second Pyramid, the tomb of Chephren (also 4th Dynasty) is slightly smaller (472 ft. by 700 ft.); and the Third, the tomb of Menkaura, or Mycerinus (4th Dynasty, about 3630 B.C.), is much smaller (215 ft. by 346 ft.). Each contains entrances, with dipping passages leading to various sepulchral chambers.

Pyramus (pir' á mùs). A Babylonian youth in classic story (see Ovid's Metamorphoses, iv), the lover of Thisbe, Thisbe was to meet him at the white mulberry-tree near the tomb of Ninus, but she, scared by a lion, fled and left her veil which the lion besmeared with blood. Pyramus, thinking his lady-love had been devoured, slew himself, and Thisbe coming up soon afterwards, stabbed herself also. The blood of the lovers stained the white fruit of the mulberry-tree into its present colour. The "tedious brief scene" and "very tragical mirth" presented by the rustics in Midsummer Night's Dream is a travesty of this legend.

Pyrrha (pi' rà). The wife of Deucalion (q.v.) in Greek legend. They were the sole survivors of the deluge sent by Zeus to destroy the whole human race, and repopulated the world by casting stones behind them which were turned into men.

Men themselves, the which at first were framed
Of earthly mould, and form'd of flesh and bone.
Are now transformed into hardest stone;
Such as behind their backs (so backward bred)
Were thrown by Pyrrha and Deucalion.

SPENSER: Fairie Queene, V, Intro., 2.

Pyrrhic Dance (pi' rik). The famous war-dance of the Greeks; so called from its inventor, Pyrrichos, a Dorian. It was a quick dance, performed in full armour to the flute, and its name is still used for a metrical foot of two short, "dancing" syllables. The Romaika, still danced in Greece, is a relic of the ancient Pyrrhic dance.

Ye have the Pyrrhic dance as yet:
Where is the Pyrrhic phalanx gone?

BYRON: The Isles of Greece.

Pyrrhic victory. A ruinous victory. Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, after his victory over the Romans at Asculum (279 B.C.), when he lost the flower of his army, said to those sent to congratulate him, "One more such victory and Pyrrhus is undone."

Pyrrhonism. Scepticism, or philosophic doubt; so named from Pyrrho (4th century B.C.), the founder of the first Greek school of sceptical philosophy. Pyrrho maintained that nothing was capable of proof and admitted the reality of nothing but sensations.

Pythagoras (pi thág' or às). The Greek philosopher and mathematician of the 6th century B.C. (born at Samos), to whom was attributed the enunciation of the doctrines of the transmigration of souls and of the harmony of the spheres, and also the proof of the 47th proposition in the 1st book of Euclid, which is hence called the Pythagorean proposition. He taught that the sun is a movable sphere, and that it, and the earth, and all the planets revolve round some central point which they called "the fire." He maintained that the soul has three vehicles: (1) the ethereal, which is luminous and celestial, in which the soul resides in a state of bliss in the stars; (2) the luminous, which suffers the punishment of sin after death; and (3) the terrestrial, which is the vehicle it occupies on this earth.

Pythagoras was noted for his manly beauty and long hair; and many legends are related of him, such as that he distinctly recollected previous existences of his own, having been (1) Æthalides, son of Mercury, (2) Euphorbus the Phrygian, son of Panthous, in which form he ran Patroclus through with a lance, leaving Hector to dispatch the hateful friend of Achilles, (3) Hermotimus, the prophet of Clazomenæ; and (4) a fisherman. To prove his Phrygian existence he was taken to the temple of Hera, in Argos, and asked to point out the shield of the son of Panthous, which he did without hesitation.

Rosalind alludes to this theory (As You Like It, iii, 2) when she says:—

I was never so be-rhymed since Pythagoras' time that I was an Irish rat, which I can hardly remember.

It is also elaborated in the scene between Feste and Malvolio in Twelfth Night, iv, 2:—

Clown: What is the opinion of Pythagoras concerning wild fowl?

Mal.: That the soul of our grandam might haply inhabit a bird.

Clown: What thinkest thou of his opinion?

Mal.: I think nobly of the soul, and no way approve his opinion.

Other legends assert that one of his thighs was of gold, and that he showed it to Abaris, the Hyperborean priest, and exhibited it in the Olympic Games; also that Abaris gave him a dart by which he could be carried through the air and with which he expelled pestilence, lulled storms, and performed other wonderful exploits.

It was also said that Pythagoras used to write on a looking-glass in blood and place it opposite the moon, when the inscription would appear reflected on the moon's disc; and that he tamed a savage Daunan bear by "stroking it gently with his hand," subdued an eagle by the same means, and held absolute dominion over beasts and birds by "the power of his voice" or "influence of his touch."

The letter of Pythagoras. The Greek upsilon, Y; so called because it was used by him as a symbol of the divergent paths of virtue and vice.

The Pythagorean tables. See TABLE.

Pythian Games (pith' í án). The games held by the Greeks at Pytho, in Phocis, subsequently called Delphi. They took place every fourth year, the second of each Olympiad.

Pythias. See DAMON.

Python (pi' thon). The monster serpent hatched from the mud of Deucalion's deluge, and slain near Delphi by Apollo.

Pyx (picks). A small metal vessel in which the Host is carried to sick people. In pre-Reformation England it was a vessel, often in the shape of a dove, suspended above the altar, in which the sacrament was reserved. Only in the churches of Amiens and Valloires is such a pyx now permitted.

Q

Q. The seventeenth letter of the English alphabet, and nineteenth (koph) of the Phœnician and Hebrew, where, in numerical notation, it represented 90 (in late Roman, 500). In English q is invariably followed by u (except occasionally in transliteration of some Arabic words), and it never occurs at the end of a word.

Q in a corner. An old children's game, perhaps the same as our "Puss in the corner"; also something not seen at first, but subsequently brought to notice. The thong to which seals are attached in legal documents is in French called the queue; thus we have lettres scellées sur simple queue or sur double queue, according to whether they bear one or two seals. In documents where the seal is attached to the deed itself, the corner where the seal is placed is called the queue, and when the document is sworn to the finger is laid on the queue.

In a merry Q (cue). Humour, temper; thus Shakespeare says, "My cue is villainous melancholy" (King Lear, I, 2).

Q. The nom de plume of Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch (1863-1944), sometime Professor of English Literature at Cambridge, and author of novels (e.g. Dead Man's Rock, 1887) and of several anthologies of prose and verse.

Old Q. William Douglas, third Earl of March, and fourth Duke of Queensberry (1724-1810), notorious for his dissolute life and escapades, especially on the turf.

On the strict Q.T. With complete secrecy. "Q.T." stands for "quiet."

To mind one's P's and Q's. See P.

Q.E.D. (Lat. quod erat demonstrandum, which was to be demonstrated). Appended to the theorems of Euclid:—Thus have we proved the proposition stated above, as we were required to do.

Q.E.F. (Lat. quod erat faciendum, which was to be done). Appended to the problems of Euclid:—Thus have we done the operation required.

Q.P. (Lat. quantum placet). Used in prescriptions to signify that the quantity may be as little or much as you like. Thus, in a cup of tea we might say "Milk and sugar q.p."

Q.S. (Lat. quantum sufficit, as much as suffices). Appended to prescriptions to denote that as much as is required may be used. Thus, after giving the drugs in minute proportions, the apothecary may be told to "mix in liquorice, q.s."

Q.V. (Lat. quantum vis). As much as you like, or quantum valeat, as much as is proper.

q.v. (Lat. quod vide). Which see.

Quack or Quack doctor; once called quack-salver. A puffer of salves; an itinerant drug-vendor at fairs, who mounted his tailboard and "quacked" forth the praises of his wares to the gaping rustics. Hence, a charlatan.

Saltimbancos, quacksalvers, and charlatans deceive them in lower degrees.—SIR THOMAS BROWNE: Pseudodoxia Epidemica, I, iii.

Quad. The university contraction for quadrangle, the college grounds; hence, to be in quad is to be confined to your college grounds. The word quad is also applied to one of a family of quadruplets. Cp. QUOD.

Quadragesima Sunday (kwod rá jes' i má). The first Sunday in Lent; so called because it is, in round numbers, the fortieth day before Easter.

Quadragesimals. The farthings or payments formerly made in commutation of a personal visit to the mother-church on Mid-Lent Sunday; also called Whitsun farthings.

Quadrant, The. The name given to the curved southern end of Regent Street, London. It was designed by John Nash (1752-1835) and built between 1813 and 1820, with colonnades that were removed in 1848. The Quadrant was one of the most impressive streets in the world; but it was pulled down in an excess of iconoclasm in 1928.

Quadriga (kwod' ri ga). A two-wheeled chariot of Classic times, drawn by four horses harnessed abreast. A spirited representation of Peace riding in a quadriga, executed by Adrian Jones in 1912, was placed on the arch at the west end of Constitution Hill, in London.

Quadrilateral. The four fortresses of Peschiera and Mantua on the Mincio, with Verona and Legnago on the Adige. Now demolished.

The Prussian Quadrilateral. The old fortresses of Luxemburg, Coblenz, Sarrelouis, and Mayence.

Quadrille (kwod ril'). An old card-game played by four persons with an ordinary pack of cards from which the eights, nines, and tens have been withdrawn. It displaced ombre (q.v.) in popular favour about 1730, and was followed by whist.

The square dance of the same name was of French origin, and was introduced into England in 1813 by the Duke of Devonshire.

Quadrillion. In English numeration, a million raised to the fourth power, represented by 1 followed by 24 ciphers; in American and French numeration it stands for the fifth power of a thousand, i.e. 1 followed by 15 ciphers.

Quadrivium (kwod riv' i um). The collective name given by the Schoolmen of the Middle Ages to the four "liberal arts" (Lat. quadri-, four; via, way), viz., arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy. The quadrivium was the "fourfold way" to knowledge; the trivium (q.v.) the "threefold way" to eloquence; both together comprehended the seven arts or sciences enumerated in the following hexameter:—
Lingua, Tropus, Ratio, Numerus, Tonus, Angulus, Astra.

And in the two following:—

Gram. loquitur, Dia. vera docet, Rhet. verba colorat. Mus. cadit, Ar. numerat, Geo. ponderat, Ast. colit astra.

Quadroon (kwod roon'). A person with one-fourth of black blood; the offspring of a mulatto woman by a white man. The mulatto is half-blooded, one parent being white and the other black.

Quadruple. Quadruple Alliance. An international alliance for offensive or defensive purposes of four powers, especially that of Britain, France, Austria, and Holland in 1718, to prevent Spain recovering her Italian possessions, and that of Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal in 1834 as a counter-move to the "Holy Alliance" between Russia, Prussia, and Austria. Another is that of 1674, when Germany, Spain, Denmark, and Holland formed an alliance against France to resist the encroachments of Louis XIV.

Quadruple Treaty. An agreement signed in 1834 between Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal, whereby the succession of Isabella II to the throne of Spain was accepted despite the Salic Law (q.v.).

Quai d'Orsay (kā dōr sā). The quay in Paris running along the left bank of the Seine where are situated the departments of Foreign Affairs and other government offices. The name is applied to the French Foreign Office and sometimes to the French Government as a whole.

Quail. The bird was formerly supposed to be of an inordinately amorous disposition, hence its name was given to a courtesan.

Here's Agamemnon, an honest fellow enough, and one that loves quails.—Troilus and Cressida, v, 1.

Quaker. A familiar name for a member of the Society of Friends, a religious body having no definite creed and no regular ministry, founded by George Fox, 1648-50. It appears from the founder's Journal that they first obtained the appellation (1650) from the following circumstance:—"Justice Bennet, of Derby," says Fox, "was the first to call us Quakers, because I bade him quake and tremble at the word of the Lord."

Quakers (that, like lanterns, bear
Their light within them) will not swear.

BUTLER: Hudibras, ii, 2.

The name had, however, been previously applied to a sect whose adherents shook and trembled with religious emotion.

Quaker City. Philadelphia.

Quaker guns. Dummy guns made of wood, for drill purposes or camouflage; an allusion to the Quaker reprobation of the use of force.

The Quaker Poet. Bernard Barton (1784-1849). Also the American John Greenleaf Whittier (1807-92).

Quarantine (Ital. quaranta, forty). The period, originally forty days, that a ship suspected of being infected with some contagious disorder is obliged to lie off port. Now applied to any period of segregation to prevent infection.

In law the term is also applied to the forty days during which a widow who is entitled to a dower may remain in the chief mansion-house of her deceased husband.

To perform quarantine is to ride off port during the time of quarantine.

Quarrel (O.Fr. quarel, from late Lat. quadrellus, diminutive of quadrus, a square). A short, stout, square-headed bolt or arrow used in the cross-bow; also, a square or diamond-shaped pane of glass for a window.

Quarrel, to engage in contention, to fall out (from O.Fr. querelle, Lat. querela, complaint, queri, to complain.)

To quarrel over the bishop's cope—over something which cannot possibly do you any good; over goat's wool. A newly appointed Bishop of Bruges entered the town in his cope, which he gave to the people; and the people, to part it among themselves, tore it to shreds, each taking a piece.

To quarrel with your bread and butter. To act contrary to your best interest; to snarl at that which procures your living, like a spoilt child, who shows its ill-temper by throwing its bread and butter to the ground.

Quarry. An object of chase, especially the bird flown at in hawking or the animal pursued by hounds or hunters. Originally the word denoted the entrails, etc., of the deer which were placed on the animal's skin after it had been flayed, and given to the hounds as a reward. The word is the O.Fr. cuirée, skinned from cuir (Lat. corium), skin.

Your castle is surprised; your wife and babes
Savagely slaughter'd; to relate the manner,
Were, on the quarry of these murder'd deer
To add the death of you.

Macbeth, iv, 2.

The place where marble, stone, etc., is dug out is called a quarry, from O.Fr. quarriere, Lat. quadrare, to square, because the stones were squared on the spot.

Quart d'heure (kar dër). Un mauvais quart d'heure (Fr., a bad quarter of an hour), used of a short, disagreeable experience.

Quarter. The fourth part of anything, as of a year or an hour, or any material thing.

In weights a quarter is 28 lb., i.e. a fourth of a hundredweight; as a measure of capacity for grain it is 8 bushels, which used to be one-fourth, but is now one-fifth, of a load. In the meat trade a quarter of a beast is a fourth part, which includes one of the legs. A quarter in the United States coinage is the fourth part of a dollar; and in an heraldic shield the quarters are the divisions made by central lines drawn at right angles across the shield, the 1st and 4th quarters being in the dexter chief and sinister base (i.e. left-hand top and right-hand bottom when looking at it), and the 2nd and 3rd in the sinister chief and dexter base.

To grant quarter. To spare the life of an enemy in your power. The origin of the phrase is not certain, but the old suggestion that it originated from an agreement anciently made between the Dutch and the Spaniards, that the ransom of a soldier should be the quarter of his pay, is not borne out. It is more likely due to the fact that the victor would have to provide his captive with temporary quarters.

Quarters. Residence or place of abode; as winter quarters, the place where an army lodges during the winter months; married quarters, the accommodation in a barrack area allotted to regular soldiers who live with their wives and families. Come to my quarters is a common phrase among bachelors as an invitation to their rooms. In the Southern U.S.A. the word is used for that part of a plantation allotted to the Negroes.

There shall no leavened bread be seen with thee, neither shall there be leaven seen . . . in all thy quarters.

Exod. xii, 7.

A district of a town or city is often known as a quarter, and in this sense the French use Quartier Latin, in Paris, which is the district where artists live and the medical schools are situated.

Quartered. See DRAWN AND QUARTERED.

Quarter Days. (1) New Style—Lady Day (March 25th), Midsummer Day (June 24th), Michaelmas Day (September 29th), and Christmas Day (December 25th).

(2) Old Style—Lady Day (April 6th), Old Midsummer Day (July 6th), Old Michaelmas Day (October 11th), and Old Christmas Day (January 6th).

Quarter Days in Scotland—

Candlemas Day (February 2nd), Whitsunday (May 15th), Lammas Day (August 1st), and Martinmas Day (November 11th).

Quarterdeck. The upper deck of a ship from the mainmast to the stern. In men-of-war it is used by officers only. Hence, to behave as though he were on his own quarterdeck, to behave as though he owned the place.

Quartermaster. In the army, the officer whose duty it is to attend to the quarters of the soldiers. He superintends the issue of all stores and equipment.

In the navy, the petty officer who, besides other duties, has charge of the steering of the ship, the signals, stowage, etc.

Quarto. A size of paper made by folding the sheet twice, giving four leaves, or eight pages; hence, a book composed of sheets folded thus. Cp. FOLIO; OCTAVO. The word is often written "4to."

Quashee (kwosh' ē). A generic name of a Negro; from West African Kwasi, a name often given to a child born on a Sunday. Cp. QUASSIA.

Quasi (kwā' zi) (Lat., as if). Prefixed to denote that so-and-so is not the real thing, but may be almost accepted in its place; thus a

Quasi contract is not a real contract, but something which has the force of one.

Quasi historical. Apparently historical; more or less so, or pretending to be so and almost succeeding.

Quasi tenant. The tenant of a house sublet.

Quasimodo Sunday (kwā zi mō dō'). The first Sunday after Easter; so called because the "Introit" of the day begins with these words: Quasi modo geniti infantes (1 Pet. ii, 2). Also called "Low Sunday."

Quasimodo was also the name of the hunchback in Victor Hugo's Nôtre Dame de Paris, 1831.

Quassia (kwosh' yā). An American plant, or rather genus of plants, named after Quassi, a Negro, who, in 1730, was the first to make its medicinal properties known. See QUASHEE.

Linnaeus applied this name to a tree of Surinam in honour of a negro, Quassi . . . who employed its bark as a remedy for fever; and enjoyed such a reputation among the natives as to be almost worshipped by some.—LINDLEY and MOORE: Treatise of Botany, Pt. ii, p. 947.

Que sais-je? (kê sâzh). The motto adopted by Michel-Eyquem de Montaigne (1533-92), the great French essayist, as expressing the sceptical and enquiring nature of his writings.

Queen. A female reigning sovereign, or the consort of a king; from A.S. cwen, a woman (which also gives quean, a word still sometimes used slightly or contemptuously of a woman), from an ancient Aryan root that gave the Old Teutonic stem kwen-, Zend genā, Gr. gunē, Slavonic zend, O.Ir. ben, etc., all meaning "woman." In the 4th-century translation of the Bible by Ulfilas we meet with gens and gino ("wife" and "woman"); and in the Scandinavian languages karl and kone still mean "man" and "wife." Cp. KING; see MAB.

Queen Anne. Daughter of James II and Anne Hyde. She reigned over Great Britain from 1702 to 1714, and her name is still used in certain colloquial phrases.

Queen Anne is dead. A slighting retort made to the teller of stale news.

Queen Anne style. The style in buildings, furniture, silver-ware, etc., characteristic of her period. Domestic architecture, for instance, was noted for many angles, gables, and irregularity of windows.

Queen Anne's Bounty. A fund created out of the firstfruits and tenths which were part of the papal exactions before the Reformation. The firstfruits are the whole first year's profits of a clerical living, and the tenths are the tenth part annually of the profits of a living. Henry VIII annexed both these to the Crown, but Queen Anne formed them into a perpetual fund for the augmentation of poor livings and the building of parsonages. The sum equals about £14,000 a year.

Queen Anne's fan. Your thumb to your nose and your fingers spread; cocking a snook.

Queen City. Cincinnati.

Queen Consort. The wife of a reigning king.

Queen Dick. Richard Cromwell (1626-1712), son of the Protector, Oliver, was sometimes so called.

In the reign of Queen Dick. See DICK.

Queen Dowager. The widow of a deceased king.

Queen Mother. The mother of a reigning sovereign.

If you hold it fit, after the play
Let his queen mother all alone entreat him
To show his griefs. Hamlet, iii, 1.

Queen of the May. See MAY.

Queen Regnant. A queen who holds the crown in her own right, in contradistinction to a Queen Consort.

Queen's Bench; Queen's Counsel. See KING'S.

Queen's College (Oxford), Queens' College (Cambridge). Note the position of the apostrophe in each case—an important matter. The Oxford College was founded (1340) by Robert de Eglesfield in honour of Queen Philippa, consort of Edward III, to whom he was confessor. The Cambridge college numbers two Queens as its founders, viz. Margaret of Anjou, consort of Henry VI (1448), and Elizabeth Woodville, Edward IV's consort, who refounded the college in 1465.

Queen's Day. November 17th, the day of the accession of Queen Elizabeth I, first publicly celebrated in 1570, and for over three centuries kept as a holiday in Government offices and at Westminster School.

November 17th at Merchant Taylors' School is a holiday also, now called Sir Thomas White's Founder's Day.

Queen's ware. Glazed Wedgwood earthenware of a creamy colour.

Queen's weather. A fine day for a fête; so called because Queen Victoria was, for the most part, fortunate in having fine weather when she appeared in public.

The Queen of Glory. An epithet of the Virgin Mary.

The Queen of Hearts. Elizabeth (1596-1662), daughter of James I, the unfortunate Queen of Bohemia, so called in the Low Countries from her amiable character and engaging manners, even in her lowest estate.

The Queen of Heaven. The Virgin Mary. In ancient times, among the Phœnicians, Astarte; Greeks, Hera; Romans, Juno; Hecate; the Egyptian Isis, etc., were also so called; but as a general title it applied to Diana, or the Moon, also called Queen of the Night, and Queen of the Tides. In Jer. vii, 18, we read: "The children gather wood . . . and the women knead dough to make cakes to the queen of heaven," i.e. the Moon.

The Queen of Love. Aphrodite, or Venus.

Poor queen of love in thine own law forlorn
To love a cheek that smiles at thee in scorn!

Venus and Adonis, 251.

Queen Square Hermit. Jeremy Bentham (1748-1832), who lived at No. 1 Queen Square, London. He was the father of the political economists called Utilitarians, whose maxim is, "The greatest happiness of the greatest number."

The White Queen. Mary Queen of Scots; so called because she dressed in white mourning for her French husband (Francis II 1544-60).

The Queen's English. See ENGLISH.

The Queen's Pipe. A name given in Queen Victoria's reign to a furnace at the Victoria Docks for destroying (by the Inland Revenue authorities) contraband and worthless tobacco, etc.

Queenhithe (London). The hithe or strand for lading and unlading barges and lighters in the City. Called "queen" from being part of the dowry of Eleanor, Queen of Henry II.

Queer. Colloquial for out of sorts, not up to the mark, also slang for drunk; and thieves' cant for anything base and worthless, especially counterfeit money.

A queer cove. An eccentric person, a rum customer; also Queer card. See CARD.

In Queer Street. In financial difficulties. The punning suggestion has been made that the origin of the phrase is to be found in a query (?) with which a tradesman might mark the name of such a one in his ledger.

To queer one's pitch. To forestall him; to render his efforts nugatory by underhand means.

Querno (kwě'r nō). Camillo Querno, of Apulia, hearing that Leo X (1513-22) was a great patron of poets, went to Rome with a harp in his hand, and sang his Alexias, a poem containing 20,000 verses. He was introduced to the Pope as a buffoon, but was promoted to the laurel.

Rome in her Capitol saw Querno sit,
Throned on seven hills the Antichrist of wit.
Dunciad, ii.

Querpo (kě'r pō). In querpo. In one's shirt-sleeves; in undress (Span. en cuerpo, without a cloak).

Boy, my cloak and rapier; it fits not a gentleman of my rank to walk the streets in querpo.—BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER. Love's Cure, ii, 1.

Question. When members of the House of Commons or other debaters call out Question, they mean that the person speaking is wandering away from the subject under consideration.

A leading question. See LEADING.

An open question. A statement, proposal, doctrine, or supposed fact, respecting which private opinion is allowed. In the House of Commons every member may vote as he likes, regardless of party politics, on an open question.

Out of the question. Not worth discussing, not to be thought of; quite foreign to the subject.

Questions and commands. An old Christmas game, in which the "commander" bids one of his subjects to answer a question which is asked. If he refuses, or fails to satisfy the commander, he must pay a forfeit or have his face smutted.

While other young ladies in the house are dancing, or playing at questions and commands, she [the devotee] reads aloud in her closet.—The Spectator, No. 354 (Hotspur's Letter), April 16th, 1712.

The previous question. The question whether the matter under debate shall be put to the vote or not. In Parliament, and debates generally, when one party wishes that a subject should be shelved it is customary to "move the previous question"; if this is carried the original discussion comes to an end, for it has been decided that the matter shall not be put to the vote.

Moving the previous question, says Erskine May—is an ingenious method of avoiding a vote upon any question that has been proposed, but the technical phrase does little to elucidate its operation. When there is no debate, or after a debate is closed, the Speaker ordinarily puts the question as a matter of course . . . but by a motion for the previous question, this act may be intercepted and forbidden.—Parliamentary Practice, p. 303 (9th ed.).

A motion for "the previous question" cannot be made on an amendment, nor in a select committee, nor yet in a committee of the whole house.

To beg the question. See BEG.

To pop the question. To propose or make an offer of marriage. As this important demand is supposed to be unexpected, the question is said to be "popped."

Questionists. In the examinations for degrees at Cambridge it was customary, at the beginning of the January term, to hold "Acts," and the candidates for the Bachelor's degree were called "Questionists." They were examined by a moderator, and afterwards the fathers of other colleges "questioned" them for three hours in Latin, and the dismissal uttered by the Regius Professor indicated what class you would be placed in, or that respondent was placed, in which case the words were simply Descendus domine.

Queue (kü). French for tail (cp. Q IN A CORNER), hence used of a pigtail, or long plait of hair, also for a line of people waiting their turn at a booking-office, theatre, shop, etc.

To queue up. A term that came into prominence during the World Wars, especially in connexion with the food shortage, when hundreds of people had to wait for hours in long lines before they could obtain their "rations" at the butcher's, grocer's, etc.

Quey (quā). A female calf, a young heifer; from O.Scand. kviga, meaning the same thing.

Quey calves are dear veal. An old proverb, somewhat analogous to "killing the goose which lays the golden eggs." Female calves should be kept and reared for cows.

Qui vive? (kē vēv) (Fr.). Literally, Who lives? but used as a sentry's challenge and so equivalent to our Who goes there? which in French would be Qui va là?

To be on the qui vive. On the alert; to be quick and sharp; to be on the tiptoe of expectation, like a sentinel. (See above.)

Quia Emptores (kwī' à emp tōr' ēz). A statute passed in the reign of Edward I (1290), to insure the lord paramount his fees arising from escheats, marriages, etc. By it freemen were permitted to sell their lands on condition that the purchaser should hold from the chief lord, and it resulted in a great increase of landowners holding direct from the Crown. So called from its opening words.

Quibble. An evasion; a juggling with words; probably a frequentative of the older quib, from Lat. quibus, a word constantly occurring in legal documents and so associated with the "quirks and quillets of the law."

Quick. Living; hence animated, lively; hence fast, active, brisk (A.S. cwīc, living, alive). Our expression "Look alive," means "Be brisk."

Quicksand is sand which shifts its place as if it were alive. See Quick.

Quickset is living hawthorn set in a hedge, instead of dead wood, hurdles, and palings. See Quick.

Quicksilver is argentum vivum (living silver), silver that moves about like a living thing. (A.S. cwīc seolfor.)

Swift as quicksilver
It courses through the natural gates
And alleys of the body.

Hamlet, i, 5.

The quick and dead. The living and the dead.

Quickie. In film parlance, a motion picture made cheaply to catch the cheap market and make a quick return on the money invested.

Quid. Slang for a sovereign (or a pound note). It occurs in Shadwell's Squire of Alsatia (1688), but its origin is unknown.

In a quid of tobacco, meaning a piece for chewing, quid is another form of cud.

Quids. Extremely lucky; to have everything fall right.

Quids (U.S.A.). A third political party (tertium quid) which was opposed to the administration of President Madison 1809-16.

Quidlibet. See QUODLIBET.

Quid pro quo (Lat.). Tit for tat; a return given as good as that received; a Roland for an Oliver; an equivalent.

Quid rides (Lat., Why are you laughing?). It is said that Lundy Foot, a Dublin tobaccoist, set up his carriage, and that Curran, when asked to furnish him with a motto, suggested this. The witticism is, however, attributed also to H. Callender, who, we are assured, supplied it to one Brandon, a London tobaccoist.

"Rides" in English, one syllable; in Latin it is two.

Quiddity. The essence of a thing, or that which differentiates it from other things—"the Correggiosity of Correggio," "the Freeness of the Free." Hence used of subtle, trifling distinctions, quibbles, or captious argumentation. Schoolmen say Quid est? (what is it?) and the reply is, the Quid is so and so, the What or the nature of the thing is as follows. The latter quid being formed into a barbarous Latin noun becomes Quidditas. Hence Quid est? (what is it?). Answer: Talis est quidditas (its essence is as follows).

He knew . . .

Where entity and quiddity
(The ghosts of defunct bodies) fly.

BUTLER: Hudibras, i, 1.

Quidnunc (Lat., What now?). One who is curious to know everything that's going on, or pretends to know it; a self-important news-monger and gossip. It is the name of the leading character in Murphy's farce The Upholsterer, or What News?

Quietism. A form of religious mysticism based on the doctrine that the essence of religion consists in the withdrawal of the soul from external objects, and in fixing it upon the contemplation of God; especially that taught by the Spanish mystic, Miguel Molinos (1640-96), who taught the direct relationship between the soul and God. His followers were termed Molinists, or Quietists. See MOLINISM.

Quietus (late Lat. quietus est, he is quit). The writ of discharge formerly granted to those barons and knights who personally attended the king on a foreign expedition, exempting them also from the claim of scutage or knight's fee. Subsequently the term was applied to the acquittance which a sheriff receives on settling his account at the Exchequer; and, later still, to any discharge, as of an account, or even of life itself.

You had the trick in audit-time to be sick till I had signed your quietus.—WEBSTER: Duchess of Malfi, iii, 2 (1623).

Who would fardels bear . . .
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin?

Hamlet, iii, 1.

Quill-drivers. Writing clerks.

Quillet (kwil' èt). An evasion. This may be an abbreviation of the old word quillity (formed on analogy with quiddity) meaning a quibble, or it may be from Lat. quidlibet, i.e. "anything you choose." A fanciful suggestion is that it came to England from the French law courts, where each separate allegation in the plaintiff's charge, and every distinct plea in the defendant's answer began with qu'il est; whence quillet, to signify a false charge, or an evasive answer.

Oh, some authority how to proceed;
Some tricks, some quilllets, how to cheat the devil.
Love's Labour Lost, iv, 3.

Quinapalus (kwin äp' à lus). A kind of "Mrs. Grundy" or "Mrs. Harris" invented by Feste, the Clown in Twelfth Night, when he wished to give some saying the weight of authority. Hence someone "dragged in" when one wishes to clench an argument by some supposed quotation.

What says Quinapalus: "Better a witty fool, than a foolish wit."—Twelfth Night, i, 5.

Quinbus Flestrin (kwin' bus fles' trin). The man-mountain. So the Lilliputians called Gulliver (ch. ii). Gay has an ode to this giant.

Bards of old of him told,
When they said Atlas' head
Propped the skies.

GAY: Lilliputian Ode.

Quincunx (kwin' künkx). An arrangement of five things, one in each corner and one in the middle of a square or oblong space. The term is also applied to trees in an orchard so planted that those in one row face the spaces between those in the adjacent rows.

Quinine. See CINCHONA.

Quinquagesima Sunday (kwin kwá jes' i má) (Lat., fiftieth). Shrove Sunday, or the first day of the week which contains Ash Wednesday. It is so called because in round numbers it is the fiftieth day before Easter.

Quins, The. Marie, Emilie, Yvonne, Cecile, and Annette Dionne, the famous quintuplets born May 28th, 1934, to a farmer in Callander, Ontario. There are seven other children in the family. Medical attention and interest was drawn to the phenomenon of their birth and successful rearing. The Quins were wards of King George VI who, with the Queen, received them during the royal visit to Canada in 1939.

Quinsy (kwin' zi). This is a curious abbreviation. The Latin word is quincania, and the Greek kunanché, from kuon anché, dog strangulation, because persons suffering from quinsy throw open the mouth like dogs, especially mad dogs. It first appeared in English (14th century) as quinaci and later forms were quynnancy and quincancy. Quincancy-wort is still a name given to the small woodruff (Asperula cynanchica), which was used as a cure for quinsy by the herbalists.

Quintain (kwin' tin). Riding at the quintain was a form of medieval knightly exercise. A dummy figure—sometimes only a head—was fastened to one end of a pole swinging horizontally on an upright firmly embedded in the ground. The knight, mounted or on foot, tilted at this figure, and unless he impaled it with his spear it would swing away from him and the opposite end of the pole would swing round and give him a smart blow.

Quintessence. The fifth essence. The ancient Greeks said there are four elements or forms in which matter can exist—fire, air, water, and earth (see ELEMENTS); the Pythagoreans added a fifth, the fifth essence—quintessence—ether, more subtle and pure than fire, and possessed of an orbicular motion, which flew upwards at creation and formed the material basis of the stars. Hence the word stands for the essential principle or the most subtle extract of a body that can be procured. Horace speaks of "kisses which Venus has imbued with the quintessence of her own nectar."

Swift to their several quarters hasted then
The cumbrous elements—earth, flood, fire;
But this ethereal quintessence of heaven
Flew upward . . . and turned to stars
Numberless as thou seest.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, iii, 716.

Quintilians (kwin til' yáns). Members of a 2nd-century heretical sect of Montanists, said to have been founded by one Quintilia, a prophetess. They made the Eucharist of bread and cheese, and allowed women to become priests and bishops.

Quintillion (kwin til' yón). In English, the fifth power of a million; 1 followed by 30 ciphers; in France and the United States the cube of a million, a million multiplied by a thousand four times over, 1 followed by 18 ciphers. Cp. BILLION.

Quip Modest, The. Sir, it was done to please myself. Touchstone says (As You Like It, v, 4): "If I sent a person word that his beard was not well cut, and he replied he cut it to please himself," "he would answer with the quip modest, which is six removes from the lie direct; or, rather, the lie direct in the sixth degree."

Quipu (ke' poo). An ancient Peruvian device for recording events, keeping accounts, etc. It consisted of a cord with knotted and coloured strings, arranged in particular designs and patterns.

Quirinal (kwí' ri nal). The palace in Rome of the former kings of Italy. The term was usually applied emblematically to the Italian kingdom and government as opposed to the Vatican, the seat of Papal authority and ecclesiastical government.

Quirt (U.S.A.). A riding whip with a short stock and a long lash or braided leather. From the Spanish cuerda, cord.

Quis. Latin, Who?

Quis custodiet custodes? (Lat.) [The shepherds keep watch over the sheep], but who is there to keep watch over the shepherds? Said when one is not certain of the integrity of one whom one has placed in a position of trust.

Quis separabit? (Lat., Who shall separate us?) The motto adopted by the Most Illustrious Order of St. Patrick when it was founded in 1783.

Quisling (kwiz' ling). Term applied to a traitor and collaborator in time of enemy occupation. Vidkun Quisling was a Norwegian who, before the invasion of his country by the Germans in 1940, acted as their advance agent and strove for the downfall of his country. He was appointed the puppet premier, but fled at the defeat of Germany and was caught and executed October 24th, 1945.

Quit. (Fr. quitter, to leave, to depart). In U.S.A. this word is more commonly used in the sense of to leave a job or a place.

Quit rent. A rent formerly paid by a tenant whereby he was released from feudal service. The term is still used of the small annual sum paid by some freeholders and copyholders in lieu of services due from them.

Quit in the sense of "acquitted" means discharged from an obligation, "acquitted."

To John I owed great obligation;

But John unhappily thought fit

To publish it to all the nation—

Now I and John are fairly quit.

PRIOR.

To be quit of. To be free from, to be rid of.

Cry quits. When two boys quarrel, and one has had enough, he says, "Cry quits," meaning, "Let us leave off, and call it a drawn game." So in an unequal distribution, he who has the largest share restores a portion and "cries quits," meaning that he has made the distribution equal. Here quit means "acquit" or discharge.

Double or quits. See DOUBLE.

Quixote, Don. See DON QUIXOTE.

The Quixote of the North. Charles XII of Sweden (1682, 1697-1718), also called The Madman.

Quixotic (kwik zot' ik). Having foolish and unpractical ideas of honour, or schemes for the general good, like Don Quixote (q.v.).

Quiz. One who banters or chaffs another. The origin of the word—which appeared about 1780—is unknown; but fable accounts for it by saying that a Mr. Daly, manager of a Dublin theatre, laid a wager that he would introduce into the language within twenty-four hours a new word of no meaning. Accordingly, on every wall, or all places accessible, were chalked up the four mystic letters, and all Dublin was inquiring what they meant. The wager was won, and the word remains current in our language.

Since World War II the word has been applied to a test, usually competitive, of general knowledge.

Quo warranto (kwō war ān' tō). A writ against a defendant (whether an individual or a corporation) who lays claim to something he has no right to; so named because the offender is called upon to show quo warranto (rem usurpavit) (by what right or authority he lays claim to the matter of dispute).

Quoad hoc (kwō' ād hok) (Lat.). To this extent, with respect to this.

Quod. Slang for prison. Probably the same word as quad (q.v.), which is a contraction of quadrangle, the enclosure in which prisoners are allowed to walk, and where whippings used to be inflicted. The word was in use in the 17th century.

Flogged and whipped in quod.

HUGHES: Tom Brown's Schooldays.

Quodlibet (Lat., what you please). Originally a philosophical or theological question proposed for purposes of scholastic debate, hence a nice and knotty point, a subtlety. Quidlibet is a form of the same word.

Quondam (kwon' dam) (Lat., former). We say, He is a quondam schoolfellow—former schoolfellow; my quondam friend, the quondam chancellor, etc.

My quondam barber, but "his lordship" now.

DRYDEN.

Quorum (kwōr' um) (Lat., of whom). The lowest number of members of a committee or board, etc., the presence of whom is necessary before business may be transacted; formerly, also, certain Justices of the Peace—hence known as Justices of the Quorum—chosen for their special ability, one or more of whom had to be on the Bench at trials before the others could act. Slender calls Justice Shallow justice of the peace and quorum. (Merry Wives of Windsor, i, 1.)

Quos ego (kwōs eg' ō). A threat of punishment for disobedience. The words, from Virgil's Æneid (I, 135), were uttered by Neptune to the disobedient and rebellious winds, and are sometimes given as an example of aposiopesis, i.e. a stopping short for rhetorical effort, "Whom I—," said Neptune, the "will punish" being left to the imagination.

Neptune had but to appear and utter a quos ego for these windbags to collapse, and become the most subservient of salaried public servants.—Truth, January, 1886.

Quot. Quot homines, tot sententiæ (Lat.). As many minds as men; there are as many opinions as there are men to hold them. The phrase is from Terence's Phormio (II, iv, 14).

Quot linguae calles, tot homines vales (Lat.). As many languages as you know, so many separate individuals you are worth. Attributed to Charles V.

Quota (kwō' tā) (Lat.). The allotted portion or share; the rate assigned to each. Thus we say, "Every man is to pay his quota."

R

R. The eighteenth letter of the English alphabet (seventeenth of the Roman) representing the twentieth of the Phœnician and Hebrew. In the ancient Roman numeration it stood for 80. In England it was formerly used as a branding mark for rogues, particularly kidnappers.

It has been called the "snarling letter" or "dog letter," because a dog in snarling utters a sound resembling r-r-r-r-r, r-r-r-r-r, etc.—sometimes preceded by a g.

Irritata canis quod R R quam plurima dicat.

Lucillus.

In his English Grammar made for the Benefit of all Strangers Ben Jonson says—

R is the dog's letter, and hurreth in the sound; the tongue striking the inner palate, with a trembling about the teeth.

And see the Nurse's remark about R in Romeo and Juliet, ii, 4.

R in prescriptions. The ornamental part of this letter is the symbol of Jupiter (♃), under whose special protection all medicines were placed. The letter itself (Recipe, take) and its flourish may be thus paraphrased: "Under the good auspices of Jove, the patron of medicines, take the following drugs in the proportions set down." It has been suggested that the symbol is for Responsum Raphaelis, from the assertion of Dr. Napier and other physicians of the 17th century, that the angel Raphael imparted the virtues of drugs.

The R months. See under OYSTER.

The three R's. Reading, writing, and arithmetic. The phrase is said to have been originated by Sir William Curtis (d. 1829), who gave this as a toast.

The House is aware that no payment is made except on the "three R's."—MR. CORY, M.P.: in House of Commons, Feb. 28th, 1867.

R.A.P. Rupees, annas, and pies, in India; corresponding to our £ s. d.

R.I.P. Requiescat in pace. Latin for May he (or she) Rest in Peace; a symbol used on mourning cards, tombstones, etc.

Ra (ra). The principal deity of ancient Egypt, one of the numerous forms of the sun-god, and the supposed ancestor of all the Pharaohs. He was the protector of men and vanquisher of evil; Nut, the sky, was his father, and it was said of him that every night he fought with the serpent, Apepi. He is usually represented as hawk-headed, and is crowned with the solar disk and uræus. See OSIRIS.

Rabbinic (rā bin' ik). The Hebrew language as used by the rabbis in their ecclesiastical and theological writings. The term is often applied to modern Hebrew. Among the Jews a Rabbiniſt is one who follows closely the doctrines and precepts of the Talmud and the traditions of the rabbis.

Rabelaisian (rāb el ā' zīān). Coarsely and boisterously satirical; grotesque, extravagant, and licentious in language; reminiscent in literary style of the great French satirist François Rabelais (1483-1553).

Dean Swift, Thomas Amory (d. 1788, author of John Bunble), and Sterne have all been called "the English Rabelais"—but the title is not very fitting; indeed, the title is a contradiction in terms; Rabelais was so essentially a Frenchman of the Renaissance that it is impossible to think of an English counterpart of any period.

If we are to seek for an approximation of Aristophanic humour, we shall find it perhaps in Rabelais. Rabelais exhibits a similar disregard for decency, combining the same depth of purpose and largeness of insight with the same coarse fun.—J. A. SYMONDS: Studies of Greek Poets.

Raboin. See TAILED MEN.

Race Suicide. The extinction of a race through the undue use of contraceptives by so large a number of people that the birth rate falls below the death rate.

Races. The principal horse-races in England are run at Newmarket, Doncaster, Epsom, Goodwood, and Ascot (see CLASSIC RACES), but there are a large number of other courses where important meetings are held, and the greatest event in the world of steeplechasing—the Grand National—is run at Aintree, near Liverpool.

There are seven annual race meetings at Newmarket: (1) The Craven; (2) first spring; (3) second spring; (4) July; (5) first October; (6) second October; (7) the Houghton.

At Doncaster races are held for two days about the middle of May, four days early in September, and two days toward the end of October.

The Epsom meeting (when the Derby, Oaks, Coronation Cup, etc., are run) is held for four days in the first week of June.

Goodwood (four days) starts on the last Tuesday in July, and Ascot (four days) in the middle of June.

The following are the principal English horse-races, with distances and venue:—

Alexandra Cup (Ascot), 2 m. 6 fur. 75 yd.

Many of the more important of these races will be found entered in their alphabetical places throughout this Dictionary.

Rache (räch). A hound that hunts by scent (A.S. raecc, a hound, A.Nor. brache, Ger. bracken). They were later called "running hounds" and then simply "hounds," and were used in the Middle Ages for stag, wild boar, and buck hunting.

And first I will begin with raches and their nature, and then greyhounds and their nature, and then alaunts and their nature . . . and then I shall devise and tell the sicknesses of hounds and their diseases,— EDWARD, 2ND DUKE OF YORK: The Master of Game, Prologue (about 1410).

Rachel (ra shel'). A French actress whose real name was Elizabeth Felix (1821-58). She was the daughter of poor Jewish pedlars, but going on the stage as a girl she won a great triumph in 1843 in the name part of Racine's Phèdre. As Adrienne Lecouvreur, in Scribe's play of that name (1849), she confirmed her position as one of the greatest tragic actresses in Europe. The cosmetics bearing the name "Rachel" immortalize a Parisian beauty-specialist of the Second Empire.

Racialism. The practice of and adherence to the theory that human races have certain characteristics that unalterably mould their cultures. From this arises the belief that one's own race has a right to rule less "advanced" races and is justified in asserting this right by force.

Rack. A flying scud, drifting clouds. (Icel. rek, drift; recka, to drive.)

The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
And . . . leave not a rack behind.

Tempest, iv, 1.

The instrument of torture so called (connected with Ger. recken, to strain) was a frame in which a man was fastened and his arms and legs stretched till the body was lifted by the tension several inches from the floor. Not infrequently the limbs were forced thereby out of their sockets. Coke says that the rack was first introduced into the Tower by the Duke of Exeter, constable of the Tower, in 1447, whence it was called the "Duke of Exeter's daughter." Its use in England was abolished in 1640.

Rack. The framework for putting plates and other things on; the grating for holding fodder, etc., is probably connected with this.

Rack and ruin. Utter destitution. Here "rack" is a variety of wrack and wreck.

To lie at rack and manger. To live without thought of the morrow, like cattle or horses whose food is placed before them without themselves taking thought; hence, to live at reckless expense.

When Virtue was a country maide,
And had no skill to set up trade,
She came up with a carrier's jade,
And lay at rack and manger.

Life of Robin Goodfellow (1628).

To rack one's brains. To strain them to find out or recollect something; to puzzle about something.

Rack and pinion railway. Railway designed for ascending and descending mountains. It has a third rail cut with teeth over which rides a mechanism which, in the event of an accident, engages the teeth and so prevents the train from falling to the bottom.

Rack rent. The actual value or rent of a tenement, and not that modified form on which the rates and taxes are usually levied; an exorbitant rent, one which is "racked" or stretched.

Racket. Noise or confusion. The word is probably imitative, like crack, bang, splash, etc.

To stand the racket. To bear the expense; to put up with the consequences.

Racy. Having distinctive or characteristic piquancy. It was first applied to wine, and comes to us from the Spanish and Portuguese raiz (root), meaning having a radical or distinct flavour.

Rich, racy verse, in which we see

The soil from which they come, taste, smell, and see.
COWLEY.

The word now generally implies a hint of indecency.

Racy of the soil. Characteristic of the inhabitants, especially the dwellers in the country, workers on the land.

Radar. Term derived from Radio-Detection-and-Ranging, primarily a means of detecting the presence of aircraft by sending out frequencies which are reflected back when they encounter a solid object. Subsequently developed for use by ships navigating in fog. A British invention, made by R. A. W. Watt, telecommunications advisor to the Air Ministry, in 1935. Britain was far ahead of the world at the start of the war, and without this invention could not have won the Battle of Britain in 1940. Two radar stations were lent to France by Britain in 1939, and a courageous Frenchman, René Varin, was dispatched from England to effect their destruction after the fall of France. The United States had some experimental stations, one of which was at Pearl Harbour and plotted the incoming Japanese aircraft, though the report was unfortunately not taken seriously. When in due course the Germans had developed Radar, countermeasures were developed; they took the form of bundles of tin-foil streamers dropped from bomber formations which registered on and confused the enemy's Radar screens. In 1950 Radar frequencies were sent to and reflected back from the Moon.

Radcliffe Library. A library at Oxford, founded with a bequest of £40,000 left for the purpose by Dr. John Radcliffe (1650-1714), and originally intended for a medical library. Dr. Radcliffe was a prominent London physician, famous for his candour. When summoned to Queen Anne he told her that there was nothing the matter with her but "vapours," and he refused to attend her on her deathbed.

Radegonde or Radegund, St. (räd' e gond). Wife of Clothaire, king of the Franks (558-61).

St. Radegonde's lifted stone. A stone 60 feet in circumference, placed on five supporting stones, said by the historians of Poitou to have been so arranged in 1478, to commemorate a great fair held on the spot in the October of that year. The country people insist that Queen Radegonde brought the impost stone on her head, and the five uprights in her apron, and arranged them all as they appear to this day.

Radevore (răd' e vôr). A kind of cloth, probably tapestry, known in the 14th century. It has been suggested (Skeat) that it was named from Vaur, in Languedoc, ras (Eng. rash, a smooth—rased—textile fabric) de Vor.

This woful lady ylern'd had in youthe
So that she worken and embrowden kouthie,
And weven in hire stole the radevore
As hyt of women had be y-moved yore.

CHAUCER: Legend of Good Women, 2351.

Radical. The term was first applied as a party name in 1818 to Henry Hunt, Major Cartwright, and others of the same clique, ultra-Liberals verging on republicanism, who wished to introduce radical reform, i.e. one that would go to the root (Lat. radix, radicis) of the matter, in the electoral system, and not merely to disfranchise and enfranchise a borough or two. Bolingbroke, in his Discourses on Parties (1735), says, "Such a remedy might have wrought a radical cure of the evil that threatens our constitution." The term is not now used.

Raft (from the Middle English raff, abundance, plenty) is applied to express a number of persons or things.

Rag. A tatter, hence a remnant (as "not a rag of decency," "not a rag of evidence"), hence a vagabond or ragamuffin.

Lash hence these overweening rags of France,
Richard III, v, 3.

The word was old cant for a farthing, and was also used generally to express scarcity—or absence—of money:—

Money by me? Heart and good-will you might,
But surely, master, not a rag of money.

Comedy of Errors, iv, 4.

In university slang (and now in general slang) a rag is a boisterous jollification, in which practical jokes and horseplay have a large share. To rag a man is to torment him in a rough and noisy fashion.

Glad rags. See GLAD.

Rag-tag and bob-tail. The rabble, the "great unwashed." The common expression in the 16th and 17th centuries was the rag and tag.

Rag-time. Fast syncopated rhythm, usually played by coloured jazz musicians, popular in the first decade of the 20th century. The name has been perpetuated in the celebrated tune Alexander's Rag-time Band by Irving Berlin (1912).

The Rag. The Army and Navy Club. "The rag," of course, is the flag.

"By the way, come and dine to-night at the Rag," said the major.—Truth. Queer Story, April 1st, 1886.

Rag water. Whisky (thieves' jargon).

To chew the rag. A slang expression for "grousing," complaining, or talking at length on one particular subject.

Ragamuffin. A muffin is a poor thing of a creature, a "regular muff"; so that a ragamuffin is a sorry creature in rags.

I have led my ragamuffins where they are peppered.
—1 Henry IV, v, 3.

Ragged Robin. A wild flower (Lychnis flos-cuculi). The word is used by Tennyson for a pretty damsel in ragged clothes.

The prince

Hath picked a ragged robin from the hedge.

TENNYSON: Idylls of the King; Enid.

Ragman Roll. The set of documents recording the names of the Scottish barons who paid homage to Edward I on his progress through Scotland in 1291, now in the Public Record Office. The name probably arose from the quantity of seals hanging from it, and it still survives as "rigmarole" (q.v.).

Ragnarok (răg' na rok). The Götterdämmerung, or Twilight of the Gods, in the old Scandinavian mythology. The day of doom, when the present world and all its inhabitants will be annihilated. Vidar of Vali will survive the conflagration, and reconstruct an imperishable universe.

And, Frithiof, mayst thou sleep away
Till Ragnarok, if such thy will.

FRITHIOF-SAGA: Frithiof's Joy.

Ragout (ra goo'). A seasoned dish; stewed meat and vegetables highly seasoned. Fr. ragoûter (re, again, goûter, to taste) means to coax a sick person's appetite.

Rahu (ra' hū). The demon that, according to Hindu legend, causes eclipses. He one day quaffed some of the nectar of immortality, but was discovered by the Sun and Moon, who informed against him, and Vishnu cut off his head. As he had already taken some of the nectar into his mouth, the head was immortal, and he ever afterwards hunted the Sun and Moon, which he caught occasionally, causing eclipses.

Rail To sit on the rail. To hedge or to reserve one's decision. A common American phrase, expressive of the same meaning as our "to sit on the fence" (q.v.).

Railroad, Railway. The former is the American form of English railway.

To railroad (U.S.A.). To hustle someone through (as of school) or out (as of an assembly) with unseemly haste and without reference to the proper formalities.

Railway King, The. George Hudson (1800-71), chairman of the North Midland Company, and for a time the dictator of the railway speculations—known as the Railway Mania of 1844-45. In one day he cleared the large sum of £100,000. Sydney Smith gave him the name. His business methods, however, were of questionable honesty. He was obliged to resign his many chairmanships in 1854 and to take refuge on the Continent, where he died in comparative poverty.

Rain. To rain cats and dogs. In northern mythology the cat is supposed to have great influence on the weather, and English sailors still say, "The cat has a gale of wind in her tail," when she is unusually frisky. Witches that rode upon the storms were said to assume the form of cats; and the stormy north-west wind is called the cat's-nose in the Harz district even at the present day.

The dog is a signal of wind, like the wolf, both of which animals were attendants of Odin, the storm god. In old German pictures the wind is figured as the "head of a dog or wolf," from which blasts issue.

So cat may be taken as a symbol of the down-pouring rain, and the dog of the strong gusts of wind accompanying a rainstorm.

Lay by something for a rainy day. Save something against evil times.

Raining-tree or Rain-tree. Old travellers to the Canaries frequently mentioned a linden tree from which sufficient water to supply all the men and beasts of the whole of the island of Fierro was said to fall. Of course, in certain states of the weather moisture will condense and collect on the broad leaves of many trees.

The Tamia caspia of the Eastern Peruvian Andes is known as the rain-tree, as also is Pithecolobium saman, an ornamental tropical tree, one of the mimoseæ and Brunefelsia pubescens, a tree whose flowers are odorous before rain.

Rainbow. The old fable has it that if one reaches the spot where a rainbow touches the earth and digs there one will be sure to find a pot of gold. Hence visionaries, wool-gatherers, daydreamers, are sometimes called rainbow chasers, because of their habit of hoping for impossible things.

Rainbow Corner. In World War II Messrs. Lyons' Corner House in Shaftesbury Avenue, London, was taken over and turned into a large café and lounge for American service men under this name. It became a general meeting place for Americans in London during the war. The name was a sentimental reference to the earlier Rainbow Division (q.v.), plus the rainbow in the insignia of SHAEF (q.v.).

Rainbow Division. The most famous and finest Division of the American Army sent to Europe in World War I.

Raison d'être (rā' zon dātr) (Fr.). The reason for a thing's existence, its rational ground for being; as "Once crime were abolished there would be no raison d'être for the police."

Rajah (ra' ja). Sanskrit for king, cognate with Lat. rex. The title of an Indian king or prince, given later to tribal chiefs and comparatively minor dignitaries and rulers; also to Malayan and Japanese chiefs. Maha-rajah means the "great-rajah."

Rake. A libertine. A contraction of rakehell, used by Milton and others.

And far away amid their rakehell band,
They speed a lady left all succourless.

FRANCIS QUARLES.

Rally is re-alligo, to bind together again. (French rallier.) In Spenser it is spelt "re-allie"—

Before they could new counsels re-allie. ~

Faerie Queene.

Yes, we'll rally round the flag, boys,

We'll rally once again.

G. F. ROOT: Battle-cry of Freedom.

In this sense rally is also the gathering together of a group or party, as Scout Rally, or Nuremberg Rally of the Nazis.

A rally in lawn-tennis, badminton, etc., is a rapid return of strokes. To rally, meaning to banter or chaff is not connected with this word, but from Fr. rallier, to deride; our railillery is really the same word.

Ralph or Ralphy. The squire of Hudibras (q.v.). The model was Isaac Robinson, a zealous butcher in Moorfields, always contriving some queer art of church government. He represents the Independent party, and Hudibras the Presbyterian.

The name is made to rhyme with either safe, Alf, or half.

Ralph Roister Doister. The title of the earliest English comedy; so called from the chief character. Written by Nicholas Udall about 1533 for performance by the boys at Eton, where he was then headmaster.

Ram. Formerly, the usual prize at wrestling matches. Thus Chaucer says of his Miller, "At wastlynghe he wolde 'bere' away the ram." (Canterbury Tales: Prologue, 548.)

The Ram feast. Formerly held on May morning at Holne, Dartmoor, when a ram was run down in the "Ploy Field" and roasted whole, with its skin and fur, close by a granite pillar. At midday a scramble took place for a slice, which was supposed to bring luck to those who got it.

The Ram and Teazle. A public-house sign, in compliment to the Clothiers' Company. The ram with the golden fleece is emblematical of wool, and the teazle is used for raising the nap of wool spun and woven into cloth.

The ram of the Zodiac. This is the famous Chrysomallion, whose golden fleece was stolen by Jason in his Argonautic expedition. It was transposed to the stars, and made the first sign of the Zodiac.

Rama (ra' ma). The seventh incarnation of Vishnu (see AVATAR). Rama performed many wonderful exploits, such as killing giants, demons, and other monsters. He won Sita to wife because he was able to bend the bow of Siva.

Ramachandra. See AVATAR.

Ramadan (rām' ā dān). The ninth month of the Mohammedan year, and the Mussulman's Lent or Holy Month (also transliterated Ramazan).

As the Moslem year is calculated on the system of twelve lunar months, Ramazan is liable at times to fall in the hot weather, when abstinence from drinking as well as from food is an extremely uncomfortable and inconvenient obligation. What wonder, then, that the end of the fast is awaited with feverish impatience?—H. M. BATSON: Commentary on Fitzgerald's "Omar," st. xc.

Rama-Yana (ra' ma ya' na) (i.e. the deeds of Rama). The history of Rama, the great epic poem of ancient India, ranking with the Mahabharata (q.v.), and almost with the Iliad. It is ascribed to the poet Valmiki, and, as now known, consists of 24,000 stanzas in seven books.

Rambouillet, Hotel de (rām bwē' yā). The house in Paris where, about 1615, the Marquise de Rambouillet, disgusted with the immoral and puerile tone of the time, founded the salon out of which grew the Académie française. Mme de Sévigné, Descartes, Richelieu, Bossuet, and La Rochefoucauld were among the members. They had a language of their own, calling common things by uncommon names, and so on; the women were known as Les précieuses and the men as Esprits doux. Preciosity, pedantry, and affectation led to the disruption of the coterie which, after having performed a good and lasting service, was finally demolished by the satire of Molière's Les précieuses ridicules (1659) and Les femmes savantes (1672).

Rambunctious (rām būngk' shūs). Slang term for tiresomely ferocious.

Ramilie, Ramillies (rām' i li). A name given to certain articles of dress in commemoration of the Duke of Marlborough's victory over the French at Ramillies in 1706. The Ramillies Hat was the cocked hat worn between 1714-40, with the brim turned up in three equal-sized cocks. The Ramillies wig, that lasted on until after 1760, had a long, gradually diminishing plait, called the Ramillies plait, with a large bow at the top and a smaller one at the bottom.

Raminagobris (rām in ä gō' bris). Rabelais (Pantagruel III, xxi) under this name satirizes Guillaume Crétin, a poet in the reigns of Charles VIII, Louis XII, and François I.

In La Fontaine's fables the name is given to the great cat chosen as judge between the weasel and the rabbit.

Rampage. On the rampage. Acting in a violently excited or angry manner. The word was originally Scotch, and is probably connected with ramp, to storm and rage.

Rampallion (rām pāl' yon). A term of contempt; probably a "portmanteau word" of ramp and rapsallion; in Davenport's A New Trick to Cheat the Devil (1639) we have: "And bold rampallion-like, swear and drink drunk."

Away, you scullion! you rampallion! you fustilarian! I'll tickle your catastrophe.—2 Henry IV, ii, 1

Rampant. The heraldic term for an animal, especially a lion, shown rearing up with the fore paws in the air; strictly, a lion rampant should stand on the sinister hind-leg, with both fore-legs elevated, and the head in profile.

Ranch (ranch). A very extensive cattle farm in North America, where large herds are maintained entirely on pasturage. The word is also applied to the buildings connected with the ranch where the owner and cowboys live.

Dude ranch. A ranch run as a resort, where city-dwellers can spend their holidays attempting to be cowboys.

Randan. On the randan. On the spree; having a high old time in town. There was a popular music-hall song in the 'nineties of last century in which the exploits of the "randy-dandy boys" out on the spree were related.

Random-tandem. Three horses driven tandem fashion. See TANDEM.

Ranee or Rani. A Hindu queen; the feminine of Rajah (q.v.).

Ranelagh (răn' é là). An old London place of amusement on the site that now forms part of the grounds of Chelsea Hospital. It was named after Richard Jones, 1st Earl of Ranelagh, who built a house and laid out gardens here in 1690. From 1742 to 1803 Ranelagh rivalled Vauxhall Gardens for concerts, masquerades, etc. A notable feature was the Rotunda, built in 1742. It was not unlike the Albert Hall in design, and was 185 ft. across with numerous boxes in which refreshments were served, while the brightly lit floor formed a thronged promenade. The Ranelagh Club was established in 1894 in Barns Elm Park, S.W., to provide facilities for polo, tennis, golf, etc.

Range (U.S.A.). Open grazing ground in the Far West.

Rangers. Picked men in the U.S. Army who worked with British Commandos. They were named after Rogers's Rangers, a body of colonial Indian fighters organized by Major Robert Rogers. Their first appearance was on the Dieppe raid in 1942 on which a small party went as armed observers.

Rank. A row, a line (especially of soldiers); also high station, dignity, eminence, as—

The rank is but the guinea's stamp,

The man's the gowd, for a' that!

BURNS: Is there for Honest Poverty?

Rank and fashion. People of high social standing; the "Upper Ten."

Rank and file. See FILE.

Risen from the ranks. Said of a commissioned officer in the army who formerly worked his way up from private soldier—from the ranks. Often called a ranker. Hence applied to a self-made man in any walk of life.

Ransom. In origin the same word as redemption, from Lat. redemptionem, through O.Fr. rançon, earlier redempon.

A king's ransom. A large sum of money.

Rantipole (răn' ti pōl). A harum-scarum fellow, a madcap (Dut. randten, to be in a state of idiocy, and perhaps poll, a head or person). Napoleon III was called Rantipole, for his escapades at Strasbourg and Boulogne.

Ranz des vaches (ranz dē vash). Simple melodies played by the Swiss mountaineers on their Alphorn when they drove their herds to pasture, or call them home. Des vaches means "of the cows"; the meaning of ranz is not so certain, but it is thought to be a dialectal variation of ranger, the call being made pour ranger des vaches, to bring the cows home.

Rap. Not worth a rap. Worth nothing at all. The rap was a base halfpenny, intrinsically worth about half a farthing, circulated in Ireland in 1721, because small coin was so very scarce.

Many counterfeits passed about under the name of raps.—SWIFT: Drapier's Letters.

Rape. One of the six divisions into which Sussex is divided; it is said that each has its own river, forest, and castle. Herepp is Norwegian for a parish district, and rape in Domesday Book is used for a district under military jurisdiction, but connexion between the two words is doubtful.

Rape of the Lock. Lord Petre, in a thoughtless moment of frolic gallantry, cut off a lock of Arabella Fermor's hair, and this liberty gave rise to the bitter feud between the two families which Alexander Pope worked up into the best heroic-comic poem of the language. The first sketch was published in 1712 in two cantos, and the complete work, including the most happily conceived machinery of sylphs and gnomes, in five cantos in 1714. Pope, under the name of Esdras Barnevelt, apothecary, later pretended that the poem was a covert satire on Queen Anne and the Barrier Treaty.

Say, what strange motive, goddess, could compel
A well-bred lord to assault a gentle belle;
O say, what stranger cause, yet unexplored,
Could make a gentle belle reject a lord.

Introduction to the Poem.

Raphael (răf' əl). One of the principal angels of Jewish angelology. In the book of Tobit we are told how he travelled with Tobias into Media and back again, instructing him on the way how to marry Sara and to drive away the wicked spirit. Milton calls him the "sociable spirit," and the "affable archangel" (Paradise Lost, vii, 40), and it was he who was sent by God to advertise Adam of his danger.

Raphael, the sociable spirit, hath designed
To travel with Tobias, and secured
His marriage with the seven-times-wedded maid.
Paradise Lost, v, 221-3.

Raphael is usually distinguished in art by a pilgrim's staff, or carrying a fish, in allusion to his aiding Tobias to capture the fish which performed the miraculous cure of his father's eyesight.

Raphaëlesque. In the style of the great Italian painter Raphael (1483-1520), who was specially notable for his supreme excellence in the equable development of all the essential qualities of art—composition, expression, design, and colouring.

Raphael's cartoons. See CARTOON.

Rapparee (răp' ə rē). A wild Irish plunderer; so called from his being armed with a rapaire, or half-pike.

Rappee. A coarse kind of snuff, manufactured from dried tobacco by an instrument called in French a râpe, or rasp; so called because it is râpé, rasped.

Rara avis (răr' ə ā' vis) (Lat., a rare bird). A phenomenon; a prodigy; a something quite out of the common course. First applied by Juvenal to the black swan, which, since its discovery in Australia, is quite familiar to us, but was unknown before.

Rara avis in terris nigroque simillima cygne (a bird rarely seen on the earth, and very like a black swan).—Juvenal, vi, 165.

Rare (U.S.A.). Underdone, as of a steak; or lightly cooked, as of an egg.

Rare Ben. The inscription on the tomb of Ben Jonson, the dramatist (1573-1637), in the Poets' Corner, Westminster Abbey, "O rare Ben Jonson," was, says Aubrey, "done at the charge of Jack Young (afterwards knighted), who, walking there when the grave was covering, gave the fellow eighteenpence to cut it."

Raree Show. A peep-show; a show carried about in a box. In the 17th century, when this word appears in England, most of the travelling showmen were Savoyards, and this represents their attempt at English pronunciation.

Rascal. Originally a collective term for the rabble of an army, the commonalty, the mob, this word was early (14th century) adopted as a term of the chase, and for long almost exclusively denoted the lean, worthless deer of a herd. In the late 16th century it was retrans-ferred to people, and so to its present meaning, a mean rogue, a scamp, a base fellow. Shakespeare says, "Horns! the noblest deer hath them as huge as the rascal"; Palsgrave calls a starveling animal, like the lean kine of Pharaoh, "a rascall refus beast" (1530). The French have racaille (riff-raff).

Come, you thin thing; come, you rascal.—2 Henry IV, v, 4.

Rascal counters. Pitiful £ s. d., "filthy lucre." Brutus calls money paltry compared with friendship, etc.

When Marcus Brutus grows so covetous,
To lock such rascal counters from his friends
Be ready, gods, with all your thunderbolts,
Dash him to pieces.

Julius Cæsar, iv, 5.

Raspberry. To give a. A 20th-century slang expression, used on both sides of the Atlantic, for showing contempt of someone. In action, to give a raspberry is to put one's tongue between the closed lips and expel air forcibly with a resulting rude noise. It is otherwise known as the Bronx cheer.

Rasselas (răs' e lās). Prince of Abyssinia, in Dr. Johnson's philosophical romance of that name (1759). He leaves a secluded "Happy Valley," shut off from all contact with the world or with evil, and his adventures in the world outside teach him that the virtuous man is not necessarily a happy one.

"Rasselas" is a mass of sense, and its moral precepts are certainly conveyed in striking and happy language. The mad astronomer who imagined that he possessed the regulation of the weather and the distribution of the seasons, is an original character in romance; and the happy valley in which Rasselas resides is sketched with poetical feeling.—YOUNG.

Rat. The Egyptians and Phrygians deified rats. The people of Bassora and Cambay to the present time forbid their destruction. In Egypt the rat symbolized utter destruction, and also wise judgment, the latter because rats always choose the best bread.

Pliny tells us (viii, lvii) that the Romans drew presages from these animals, and to see a white rat foreboded good fortune. The bucklers at Lanuvium being gnawed by rats presaged ill-fortune, and the battle of the Marsees, fought soon after, confirmed this superstition.

As wet as, or like a drowned rat. Soaking wet; looking exceedingly dejected.

I smell a rat. I perceive there is something concealed which is mischievous. The allusion is to a cat smelling a rat, while unable to see it.

Irish rats rhymed to death. It was once a prevalent opinion that rats in pasturages could be extirpated by anathematizing them in rhyming verse or by metrical charms. This notion is frequently alluded to by ancient authors. Thus, Ben Jonson says: "Rhyme them to death, as they do Irish rats" (Poetaster); Sir Philip Sidney says: "Though I will not wish unto you . . . to be rimed to death, as is said to be done in Ireland" (Defence of Poesie); and Shakespeare makes Rosalind say: "I was never so be-rhymed since . . . I was an Irish rat," alluding to the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls (As You Like It, iii, 2).

Rats! An exclamation of incredulity, wonder, surprise, etc.

To rat. To forsake a losing side for the stronger party, as rats are said to forsake unseaworthy ships. One who deserts his party, as a "blackleg" during a strike, is sometimes called a rat.

Averting . . .

The cup of sorrow from their lips,
And fly like rats from sinking ships.

SWIFT: Epistle to Mr. Nugent.

To take a rat by the tail. French colloquialism (Prendre un rat par la queue) for to cut a purse. The phrase dates back to the age of Louis XIII. A cutpurse would cut the purse at the string, or else he would spill the contents.

Rat, Cat, and Dog.

The Rat, the Cat, and Lovell the Dog,
Rule all England under the Hog.

The Rat, i.e. Rat-cliff; the Cat, i.e. Cat-esby; and Lovel the Dog, is Francis, Viscount Lovel, the king's "spaniel." The Hog or boar was the crest of Richard III. William Collingham, the author of this rhyme, was put to death for his pregnant wit.

Rat-killer. Apollo received this derogatory soubriquet from the following incident:—Crisin, one of his priests, having neglected his official duties, Apollo sent against him a swarm of rats; but the priest, seeing the invaders coming, repented and obtained forgiveness of the god, who annihilated the swarms which he had sent with his far-darting arrows.

Ratishon, Interim of. See AUGSBURG.

Rattening. Destroying or taking away a workman's tools, or otherwise incapacitating him from doing work, with the object of forcing him to join a trade union or to obey its rules. The term used to be common in Yorkshire, but is not heard much nowadays.

Raven. A bird of ill omen; fabled to forebode death and bring infection and bad luck generally. The former notion arises from its following an army under the expectation of finding dead bodies to raven on; the latter notion is a mere offshoot of the former, seeing pestilence kills as fast as the sword.

The boding raven on her cottage sat,
And with hoarse croakings warned us of our fate.

GAY: Pastorals; The Dirge.

Like the sad-presaging raven that tolls
The sick man's passport in her hollow beak,
And, in the shadow of the silent night,
Does shake contagion from her sable wing.

MARLOWE: Jew of Malta (1592).

Jovianus Pontanus relates two skirmishes between ravens and kites near Beneventum, which prognosticated a great battle, and Nicetas speaks of a skirmish between crows and ravens as presaging the irruption of the Scythians into Thrace. Cicero was forewarned of his death by the fluttering of ravens, and Macaulay relates the legend that a raven entered the chamber of the great orator the very day of his murder and pulled the clothes off his bed. Like many other birds, ravens indicate by their cries the approach of foul weather, but "it is ful unufel to beleve that God sheweth His prey counsaile to crowes, as Isidore sayth."

Of inspired birds ravens are accounted the most prophetic. Accordingly, in the language of that district, "to have the foresight of a raven" is to this day a proverbial expression.—MACAULAY: History of St. Kilda, p 174.

When a flock of ravens forsakes the woods we may look for famine and mortality, because "ravens bear the characters of Saturn, the author of these calamities, and have a very early perception of the bad disposition of that planet." See Athenian Oracle, Supplement, p. 476.

As if the great god Jupiter had nothing else to doe but to dryve about jacke-dawes and ravens.—CARNEADES.

According to Roman legend ravens were once as white as swans and not inferior in size; but one day a raven told Apollo that Coronis, a Thessalian nymph whom he passionately loved, was faithless. The god shot the nymph with his dart; but, hating the tell-tale bird—

He blacked the raven o'er,

And bid him prate in his white plumes no more.

ADDISON: Translation of Ovid, Bk. II.

In Christian art the raven is an emblem of God's Providence, in allusion to the ravens which fed Elijah. St. Oswald holds in his hand a raven with a ring in its mouth; St. Benedict has a raven at his feet; St. Paul the Hermit is drawn with a raven bringing him a loaf of bread, etc.

The fatal raven, consecrated to Odin, the Danish war god, was the emblem on the Danish standard, Landeyda (the desolation of the country), and was said to have been woven and embroidered in one noontide by the daughters of Regner Lodbrok, son of Sigurd, that dauntless warrior who chanted his death-song (the Krakamal) while being stung to death in a horrible pit filled with deadly serpents. If the Danish arms were destined to defeat, the raven hung his wings; if victory was to attend them, he stood erect and soaring, as if inviting the warriors to follow.

The Danish raven, lured by annual prey,
Hung o'er the land incessant.

THOMSON: Liberty, Pt. iv.

The two ravens that sit on the shoulders of Odin are called Huginn and Muninn (Mind and Memory.)

Ravenstone (Ger. rabenstein). The old stone gibbet of Germany; so called from the ravens which are wont to perch on it.

Do you think

I'll honour you so much as save your throat
From the Ravenstone, by choking you myself?

BYRON: Werner, ii, 2.

Raw. Johnny Raw. A raw recruit; a "new chum," greenhorn.

To touch one on the raw. To mention something that makes a person wince, like touching a horse on a raw place in currying him.

Rawhead and Blood-Bones. A bogey at one time the terror of children.

Servants awe children and keep them in subjection by telling them of Rawhead and Bloodybones.—LOCKE.

Razee. An old naval term for a ship of war cut down (or razed) to a smaller size, as a seventy-four reduced to a frigate.

Razor. To cut blocks with a razor. See CUT.

Razzia (răt' zi à). An incursion made by the military into an enemy's country for the purpose of carrying off cattle or slaves, or for enforcing tribute. It is the French form of an Arabic word, and is usually employed in connexion with Algerian and North African affairs.

Razzle-dazzle. A boisterous spree, a jollification.

On the razzle-dazzle. On the spree; on an hilariously drunken frolic.

Re (rē) (Lat.). Respecting; in reference to; as, "re Brown," in reference to the case of Brown.

Reach of a river. The part which lies between two points or bends; so called because it reaches from point to point.

When he drew near them he would turn from each, And loudly whistle till he passed the Reach.

CABRABE: Borough.

Read. To read between the lines. See LINE.

To read oneself in. Said of a clergyman on entering upon a new incumbency, because one of his first duties is to give a public reading of the Thirty-nine Articles in the church to which he has just been appointed, and to make the Declaration of Assent.

Reader. The designation of certain lecturers at many of the Universities, as the Reader in Roman Law (Durham), the Reader in Phonetics (London). In the Inns of Court, one who reads lectures in law. In printing, one who reads and corrects proof-sheets before publication. In a publisher's office, one who reads and reports on manuscripts submitted for publication.

Ready. An elliptical expression for ready money. Goldsmith says, Æs in presenti perfectum format ("Ready-money makes a man perfect"). (Eton Latin Grammar.)

Lord Strut was not very flush in the "ready."—DR. ARBUTHNOT.

Ready-to-Halt. A pilgrim in Pt. ii of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress who journeyed on crutches. He joined the party under the charge of Mr. Greatheart, but "when he was sent for" he threw away his crutches, and, lo! a chariot bore him to the Celestial City.

Real Presence. The doctrine that Christ Himself is present in the bread and wine of the Eucharist after consecration. In the Church of England "real" implies that—

The Body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten, in the Supper, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. —(Thirty-nine Articles; No. xxvii.)

In the Roman Catholic and Lutheran Churches "real" implies that the actual Body is present—in the former case by transubstantiation, and in the latter by consubstantiation.

Realism. A form of philosophy which, for example, gathered a school of eminent French writers at the end of the 19th century. The leaders were Zola and Maupassant, and their aim was to describe life as it is and not as people like to think that it is or should be. The brutality and outspokenness of their writings led to an outcry; Anatole France, for example, described Zola's great novel La Terre as "a heap of ordure."

Ream (ultimately from Arab. rizmah, a bundle).

A ream of paper, unless otherwise specified, contains 480 sheets; a "perfect" ream for printing papers contains 516 sheets; a ream of envelope paper contains 504 sheets, and of news, 500 sheets.

An "insides" ream contains 480 sheets all "insides," i.e. 20 good or inside quires of 24 sheets; a "mill" ream contains 480 sheets, and consists of 18 "good" or "insides" quires of 24 sheets each, and 2 "outsides" quires of 24 sheets each.

Rearmouse or Reremouse. The bat (A.S. hrere-mus, probably the fluttering-mouse, from hrere-an, to move or flutter). Of course, the "bat" is not a winged mouse.

Reason. It stands to reason. It is logically manifest; this is the Latin constat (constare, literally, to stand together).

The Goddess of Reason. The central figure in an attempt to substitute a religion for Christianity during the French Revolution, which was known as The Feast of Reason. The role was taken by various young women who, in turns, were enthroned and "worshipped" in the cathedral of Notre Dame. Mlle Condeille, of the Opera, was one of the earliest of these "goddesses" (Nov. 10th, 1793); she wore a red Phrygian cap, a white frock, a blue mantle, and tricolour ribbons; her head was filleted with oak-leaves, and in her hand she carried the pike of Jupiter-People. Others were Mme Momoro (wife of the printer), and the actresses Mlle Maillard and Mlle Aubray. The procession was attended by the municipal officers and national guards, while troops of ballet girls carried "torches of truth"; and many apostate clergy stripped themselves of their canonicals, and, wearing red nightcaps, joined in this blasphemous mockery. So did Julien of Toulouse, a Calvinistic minister. Such Feasts of Reason were held in various towns of France for several years after.

The woman's reason. "I think so just because I do think so" (see Two Gentlemen of Verona, i, 2).

First then a woman will, or won't, depend on't; If she will do't, she will, and there's an end on't.

AARON HILL: Epilogue to "Zara."

Rebecca's Camels Bible. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Rebeccaïtes (re bek' a itz). Welsh rioters in 1843, who, led by a man in woman's clothes, went about demolishing turnpike gates. The name was taken from Gen. xxiv, 60. When Rebecca left her father's house, Laban and his family "blessed her," and said, "Let thy seed possess the gate of those that hate them."

Rebellion, The Great. In English history, the struggle between Parliament (the people) and the Crown, which began in the reign of James I, broke into Civil War in 1642, and culminated in the execution of Charles I (Jan. 29th, 1649).

The revolts in favour of the Stuarts in 1715 and 1745 (see FIFTEEN; FORTY-FIVE) have also each been called The Rebellion.

Rebus (rē' būs) (Lat., with things). A hieroglyphic riddle, non verbis sed rebus. The origin of the word has, somewhat doubtfully, been traced to the lawyers of Paris who, during the carnival, used to satirize the follies of the day in squibs called De rebus quæ geruntur (on the current events), and, to avoid libel actions, employed hieroglyphics either wholly or in part.

In heraldry the name is given to punning devices on a coat of arms suggesting the name of the family to whom it belongs; as the broken spear on the shield of Nicholas Breakspear (Pope Adrian IV).

Recessional. The music or words, or both accompanying the procession of clergy and choir when they retire after a service. The term is often associated with Rudyard Kipling's well-known verses (1897) beginning:

God of our fathers, known of old—
Lord of our far-flung battle-line—
Beneath whose awful Hand we hold
Dominion over palm and pine—
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget!

Rechabites (rek' á bits). Members of a teetotal benefit society (the Independent Order of Rechabites), founded in 1835, and so named from Rechab, who enjoined his family to abstain from wine and to dwell in tents (Jer. xxxv, 6, 7).

Recipe, Receipt. Recipe is Latin for take, and contracted into Rx is used in doctors' prescriptions. See R.

Reckon. I reckon, in the sense of "I guess" was in use in England by the early 17th century; it is now almost obsolete in Britain but is still widely used in the U.S.A.

Day of reckoning. Settlement day; when one has to pay up one's account or fulfil one's obligation; also used of the Day of Judgment.

Dead reckoning. See under DEAD.

Out of one's reckoning. Having made a mistake—in the date, in one's expectation, etc., or an error of judgment.

To reckon without one's host. See HOST.

Recollects. See FRANCISCANS.

Record. That which is recorded (originally "got by heart"—Lat. cor, cordis, heart); hence the modern meaning, the best performance or most striking event of its kind recorded, especially in such phrases as to beat the record, to do it in record time, etc.; also the engraved disk on which music that can be audibly transmitted by means of a gramophone is recorded.

Court of Record. A court whose proceedings are officially recorded and can be produced as evidence.

Off the record. Originally a legal term, whereby a judge directs that improper or irrelevant evidence shall be struck off the record. This since became commonly synonymous with in confidence, an unofficial expression of views.

Recreant is one who yields (from O.Fr. re-croire, to yield in trial by combat); alluding to the judicial combats, when the person who wished to give in cried for mercy, and was held a coward and infamous.

Recusants (rek' ū zānts). The name given in English history to those who refused to attend services of the Church of England. At different times heavy fines and even imprisonment have attached to recusancy. The name was commonly used of Roman Catholics.

Red. One of the primary colours (q.v.); in heraldry said to signify magnanimity and fortitude; in ecclesiastical use worn at certain seasons; and in popular folklore the colour of magic.

Red is the colour of magic in every country, and has been so from the very earliest times. The caps of fairies and musicians are well-nigh always red.—YEATS: Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 61.

Nowadays it is more often symbolical of anarchy and revolution—"Red ruin, and the breaking up of laws" (Tennyson: Guinevere, 421). In the French Revolution the Red Republicans were those extremists who never hesitated to dye their hands in blood in order to accomplish their political object. In Russia red is supposed to be the beautiful colour. Krda is beauty; kranie is red. This may account for its adoption by the Bolsheviks, but, in general, red is regarded as the colour of liberty. See RED FLAG below.

Red is the colour of the royal livery; and it is said that this colour—technically called "pink" (q.v.)—was adopted by huntsmen because fox-hunting was declared a royal sport by Henry II.

In the old ballads red was frequently applied to gold ("the gude red gowd"), and this use still survives in thieves' cant, a gold watch being a red kettle, and the chain a red tangle. One of the names given by the alchemists to the Philosophers' Stone (q.v.) was the red tincture, because, with its help, they hoped to transmute the base metals to gold.

Red Ball Route, Express, or Highway. See ROUTES.

Red Biddy. A noisome and highly intoxicating concoction of which cheap port is the basis, much favoured by old crones in very low-class English life.

Admiral of the Red. See ADMIRAL.

Red Book. A directory relating to the court, the nobility, and the "Upper Ten" generally. The Royal Kalendar, published from 1767 to 1893, was known by this name, as also Webster's Royal Red Book, a similar work, first issued in 1847.

The name is also given to other special works covered in red, as, e.g. the old Austro-Hungarian Empire, the official parliamentary papers of which corresponded to our "Blue Books." A book which gave account of the court expenditure in France before the Revolution, and an English manuscript containing the names of those who held lands per baroniam in the reign of Henry II, etc.

The Red Book of Hergest. A Welsh manuscript of the 14th century, containing the Mabinogion, poems by Taliesin and Llywarch Hen, a history of the world from Adam to 1320, etc. It is now the property of Jesus College, Oxford.

The Red Book of the Exchequer. Liber ruber Scaccarii in the Record Office. It was compiled in the reign of Henry III (1246), and contains the returns of the tenants in capite in 1166, who certify how many knights' fees they hold, and the names of those who hold or held them; also the only known fragment of the Pipe Roll of Henry II, copies of the important Inquisition returned into the exchequer in 13 John, and matter from the Pipe Rolls and other sources. It was printed in the Rolls Series (edited by Hubert Hall) in 1896.

Redbreasts. The old Bow Street "runners," police officers combining the duties of informers, detectives, and general agents.

The Bow Street runners ceased out of the land soon after the introduction of the new police. I remember them very well as standing about the door of the office in Bow Street. They had no other uniform than a blue dress-coat, brass buttons . . . and a bright red cloth waistcoat. . . . The slang name for them was "Redbreasts."—DICKENS: Letters.

Red Button. In the Chinese Empire a mandarin of the first class wore one of these as a badge of honour in his cap. Cp. PANIANDRUM.

An interview was granted to the admiral [Elliot] by Kishen, the imperial commissioner, the third man in the empire, a mandarin of first class and red button.—HOWITT: History of England, p. 471 (1841).

Mother Red Cap. An old nurse "at the Hungerford Stairs."

Not a red cent. No money at all; "stony-broke." An Americanism; the cent used to be copper, but is now an alloy of copper, tin, and zinc.

Redcoats. British soldiers, from the colour of the uniform formerly universal in line regiments. Cromwell's New Model Army was the first to wear red coats as a uniform. Each regiment was distinguished by the colour of the facings—Blue, Green, Buff, etc., and was known by that name.

Red Comyn. Sir John Comyn of Badenoch, nephew of John Balliol, king of Scotland, so called from his ruddy complexion and red hair, to distinguish him from his kinsman "Black Comyn," who was swarthy and black-haired. He was stabbed by Robert Bruce (1306) in the church of the Minorites at Dumfries, and afterwards dispatched by Lindesay and Kirkpatrick.

The Red Crescent, Lion, Sun. The equivalent in non-Christian countries of the Red Cross (q.v.), i.e. the military hospital service.

Red Cross. The badge adopted by all civilized nations (except those who use the Red Crescent, etc.), in accordance with the Geneva Convention of 1864, as that of military ambulance and hospital services, hospital ships, etc. It is a red Greek Cross on a white ground, and is also called the Geneva Cross.

Hence the name of various national societies for the relief of the wounded and sick.

Also, the St. George's Cross (q.v.), the basis of the Union Jack, and the old national emblem of England.

The Red Cross Knight in Spenser's Faerie Queene (Bk. I) is a personification of St.

George, the patron saint of England. He typifies Christian Holiness, and his adventures are an allegory of the Church of England. The Knight is sent by the Queen to destroy a dragon which was ravaging the kingdom of Una's father. With Una he is driven into Wandering Wood, where they encounter Error, and pass the night in Hypocrisy's cell. Here he is deluded by a false vision and, in consequence, abandons Una and goes with Duessa (False-faith) to the palace of Pride. He is persuaded by Duessa to drink of an enchanted fountain, becomes paralysed, and is taken captive by Orgoglio, whereupon Una seeks Arthur's help, and the prince goes to the rescue. He slays Orgoglio, and the Red Cross Knight is taken by Una to the house of Holiness to be healed. On leaving Holiness they journey onwards, and as they draw near the end of their quest the dragon flies at the knight, who has to do battle with it for three whole days before he succeeds in slaying it. The Red Cross Knight and Una are then united in marriage.

The Red Feathers. See REGIMENTAL NICKNAMES.

Red Eye (U.S.A.). Cheap whisky.

Red Flag. The emblem of Bolshevism, Communism, and revolution generally. English Communists have a "battle hymn" with this title. The red flag was used during the French Revolution as the symbol of insurrection and terrorism, and in the Roman Empire it signified war and a call to arms.

Red Hackle. See REGIMENTAL NICKNAMES.

Red-handed. In the very act; as though with red blood of murder still on his hand.

The Red Hand of Ulster. See ULSTER.

Red-haired persons have for centuries had the reputation of being deceitful and unreliable—probably owing to the tradition that Judas Iscariot (q.v.) had red hair. The fat of a dead red-haired person used to be in request as an ingredient for poisons (see Middleton's The Witch, V, ii) and Chapman says that flattery, like the plague—

Strikes into the brain of man,
And rageth in his entrails when he can,
Worse than the poison of a red-hair'd man.
Bussy d'Ambois, iii, ii.

The old rhyme says—

With a red man rede thy rede;
With a brown man break thy bread;
At a pale man draw thy knife;
From a black man keep thy wife.

See also HAIR.

The Red Hat. The cardinalate.

Red Horse (U.S.A.). A man from Kentucky.

Red Herring. See HERRING.

Indian red. Red hæmatite (peroxide of iron), found abundantly in the Forest of Dean, Gloucestershire. It is of a deep, laky hue, used for flesh tints. Persian red, which is of a darker hue with a sparkling lustre, is imported from the island of Ormuz in the Persian Gulf.

The Romans obtained this pigment from the island of Elba.

Red Indians. The North American Indians; so called because of their copper-coloured skin; also called Redskins and red men.

A red-laced jacket. Old military slang for a flogging.

Red-lattice phrases. Pot-house talk. A red lattice at the doors and windows was formerly the sign that an ale-house was duly licensed; see the page's quip on Bardolph in 2 Henry IV, ii, 2—"a calls me e'en now, my lord, through a red lattice, and I could discern no part of his face from the window."

I, I, I myself sometimes leaving the fear of heaven on the left hand . . . am fain to shuffle, to hedge and to lurch; and yet you rogue, will ensconce your rags . . . your red-lattice phrases . . . under the shelter of your honour.—Merry Wives of Windsor, ii, 2.

The Red Laws. The civil code of ancient Rome. Juvenal says, Per lege rubros majoram leges (Satires, xiv, 193). The civil laws, being written in vermilion, were called rubrica, and rubrica vetavit means, It is forbidden by the civil laws.

The prætor's laws were inscribed in white letters, as Quintilian informs us (xiii, 3 "prætores edicta sua in alba proponebant") and imperial rescripts were written in purple.

Red-letter day. A lucky day; a day to be recalled with delight. In almanacs, saints' days and holidays are printed in red ink, other days in black; and only the former have special services in our Prayer Book.

"It's a great piece of luck, ma'am," said Mrs. Bel-field, "that you should happen to come here of a holiday! . . . Why, you know, ma'am, to-day is a red-letter day!"—FANNY BURNEY: Cecilia, X, vi.

To see the red light. To be aware of approaching disaster. The phrase comes from the railway-signal, where the red light signifies danger.

Red Light District. That quarter of a large city where brothels are located, these houses being frequently indicated by a red light outside.

Red man. A term of the old alchemists, used in conjunction with "white woman" to express the affinity and interaction of chemicals. In the long list of terms that Surface scoffingly gives (Ben Jonson's The Alchemist, II, iii) "your red man and your white woman" are mentioned.

The French say that a red man commands the elements, and wrecks off the coast of Brittany those whom he dooms to death. The legend affirms that he appeared to Napoleon and foretold his downfall.

See also RED INDIANS, above.

To paint the town red. See PAINT.

Red rag. Old slang for the tongue.

Discovering in his mouth a tongue,
He must not his palaver balk;
So keeps it running all day long,
And fancies his red rag can talk.

PETER PINDAR: Lord B. and his Motions.

Also in the phrase Like a red rag to a bull, anything that is calculated to excite rage.

Red Sea. So called by the Romans (Mare rubrum) and by the Greeks, as a translation of the Semitic name, the reason for which is uncertain; also formerly called the "Sedgy Sea," because of the seaweed which collects there.

To see red. To give way to excessive passion or anger; to be violently moved, run amok.

Red snow. Snow reddened by the presence of a minute alga, Protococcus nivalis, in large numbers. It is not at all uncommon in arctic and alpine regions, where its sanguine colour formerly caused it to be regarded as a portent of evil.

Red tape. Official formality, or rigid adherence to rules and regulations, carried to excessive lengths; so called because lawyers and government officials tie their papers together with red tape. Charles Dickens is said to have introduced the expression; but it was the scorn continually poured upon this evil of officialdom by Carlyle that brought it into popular use.

Redan (re dān') (Fr. redent, notched or jagged like teeth). The simplest of fieldworks, and very quickly constructed. It consists of two faces at an angle formed thus  $\wedge$ , the angle, or salient, being towards the enemy. In the Crimean War the British failure to capture the batteries of the Redan before Sebastopol (1854-55) cost many lives and lengthened the war.

Redder. One who tries to separate parties fighting, the adviser, the person who redes or interferes. Thus the proverb, "The redder gets aye the worst lick of the fray."

Rede (A.S. ræd). Counsel, advice; also as verb.

To reck one's own rede. To be governed by one's own better judgment.

Do not, as some ungracious pastors do,
Show me the steep and thorny way to heaven,
Whilst, like a puffed and reckless libertine,
Himself the primrose path of dalliance treads,
And recks not his own rede.

Hamlet, i, 3.

Rede Lectureships. Sir Robert Rede (d. 1519) Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, founded three public lectureships at Cambridge. These were reorganized in 1858, one to be delivered by a man of eminence in science or literature.

Redemptioner. An immigrant who is obliged to pay back his passage money out of his earnings after landing in the new country.

Reductio ad absurdum. A proof of inference arising from the demonstration that every other hypothesis involves an absurdity. Thus, suppose I want to prove that the direct road from two given places is the shortest, I should say, "It must either be the shortest or not the shortest. If not the shortest, then some other road is the direct road; but there cannot be two shortest roads, therefore the direct road must be the shortest."

Reduplicated or Ricochet Words. There are probably some hundreds of these words, which usually have an intensifying force, in use in English. The following, from ancient and modern sources, will give some idea of their variety:—chit-chat, click-clack, clitter-clatter, dilly-dally, ding-dong, drip-drop, fat-lal, flim-flam, fiddle-faddle, flip-flap, flip-flop, hanky-panky, harum-scarum, helter-skelter, heyve-keyve, higgledy-piggledy, hob-nob, hodge-podge, hoity-toity, hubble-bubble, hugger-mugger, hurly-burly, mingle-mangle, mish-mash, mixy-maxy, namby-pamby, niddy-noddy, niminy-piminy, nosy-posy, pell-mell, ping-pong, pit-pat, pitter-patter, prubbles and prables, randem-tandem, randy-dandy, razzle-dazzle, riff-raff, roly-poly, shilly-shally, slip-slop, slish-slosh, tick-tack, tip-top, tittle-tattle, wibble-wobble, wig-wag, wiggie-waggle, wish-wash, wishy-washy.

Ree. an interjection formerly used by teamsters when they wanted the horses to go to the right. "Heck!" or "Hey!" was used for the contrary direction.

Who with a hey and ree the beasts command.

Micro Cynicon (1599).

Riddle me, riddle me ree. Expound my riddle rightly.

Reed. A broken or bruised reed. Something not to be trusted for support; a weak adherent. Egypt is called a broken reed, in which Hezekiah could not trust if the Assyrians made war on Jerusalem. "which broken reed if a man leans on, it will go into his hand and pierce it" (see 2 Kings xviii, 21; Is. xxxvi, 6).

A reed shaken by the wind. A person blown about by every wind of doctrine. John the Baptist (said Christ) was not a "reed shaken by the wind," but from the very first had a firm belief in the Messiahship of the Son of Mary, and this conviction was not shaken by fear or favour. See Matt. xi, 7.

Reef. He must take in a reef or so. He must reduce his expenses; he must retrench. A reef is that part of a sail which is rolled and tied to reduce the area caught by the wind.

Reefer. An Australian term for one searching for gold. In American slang it is used for a marijuana cigarette, otherwise known as, i.e., tea or gauge, muggles, muta. In English a reefer is a short, double-breasted overcoat largely worn in the Navy.

Reekie, Auld. A familiar name for Edinburgh. It is said that Durham of Largo, one of the old, patriarchal lairds, was in the habit of regulating the time of evening worship by the appearance of the smoke of Edinburgh. When it increased, in consequence of the good folk preparing supper, he would say, "It is time noo, bairns, to tak the buike and gang to our beds, for yonder's Auld Reekie, I see, putting on her night-cap."

Reel. Right off the reel. Without intermission. A reel is a device for winding rope. A reel of cotton is a certain quantity wound on a bobbin.

We've been travelling best part of twenty-four hours right off the reel.—BOLDREWOOD: Robbery under Arms, ch xxxi.

In the cinematograph world a reel is a convenient length of film for winding on one spool and showing at one performance.

The Scottish dance, reel, is from Gaelic righil or ruithil.

Referendum. The submission of a definite political question to the whole electorate for a direct decision by the general vote. This is not done in Great Britain, but is a general rule in Switzerland. After the Great War certain questions, as the apportionment of Schleswig-Holstein and other disputed areas, were submitted to a plebiscite, which is not quite the same thing as a referendum, but is the taking of a general vote as to future policy.

Refresher. An extra fee paid to a barrister in long cases in addition to his retaining fee, originally to remind him of the case entrusted to his charge.

Regan (rê gán). The second of King Lear's unfilial daughters, in Shakespeare's tragedy—"most barbarous, most degenerate." She was married to the Duke of Cornwall.

Regatta (re gât' a). A boat-race, or organized series of boat-races; the name originally given to the races held between Venetian gondoliers, the Italian meaning "strife" or "contention."

Regency. There have been a number of regencies in European history, usually during the minority of a sovereign. In British history the term is usually applied to the period 1811-20 when George Prince of Wales (afterwards George IV) acted as regent because of his father's insanity.

In French history the word refers to the years from 1715 to 1723 when the Duke of Orleans was regent for the minor Louis XV.

Regent's Park (London). This park, formerly called Marylebone Park, covering 472 acres, was originally attached to a palace of Queen Elizabeth I, but at the beginning of the 17th century much of the land was let on long leases, which fell in early in the 19th century. It was laid out by the architect, John Nash (1752-1835) for the Prince Regent (George IV), and named in honour of him.

Regicides. The name applied in English history to those men who sat in judgment on Charles I, in 1649, and especially the 58 who signed his death warrant. After the Restoration, when some of the regicides were dead and others in flight, 10 were executed and 25 others imprisoned for life. The bodies of Cromwell, Ireton, Bradshaw, and Pride were disinterred, and after a solemn trial for treason were dismembered and exhibited at Temple Bar and other places.

Regimental and Divisional Nicknames.

(In addition to the better-known ones mentioned in alphabetical order).

British Army

Assaye Regiment. The 74th Foot, so called because they first distinguished themselves in the battle of Assaye, where 2,000 British and 2,500 Sepoy troops under Wellington defeated 50,000 Maharras, in 1803. This regiment is now called "the 2nd Battalion of the Highland Light Infantry." The first battalion was the old No. 71.

Belfast Regiment, The. The old 35th Foot, raised in Belfast in 1701, is now called the 1st battalion of the Royal Sussex, the 2nd battalion being the old 107th.

Bloody Eleventh. The Devonshire Regiment, 11th Foot, raised in 1685. At the Battle of Salamanca, in the Peninsular War, the regiment fought so stubbornly that there was hardly a man among them who was not wounded, and from this exploit they got their name.

Bloodsuckers. The 63rd Regiment of Foot are nicknamed "the Bloodsuckers."

Brickdusts. The 53rd Foot; so called from the brickdust-red colour of their facings. Also called Five-and-thre'pennies, a play on the number and the old rate of daily pay of the ensigns or subalterns.

Now the 1st battalion of the "King's Shropshire Light Infantry." The 2nd battalion is the old 85th.

Buckmaster's Light Infantry. The 3rd West India Regiment was so called from Buckmaster, the tailor, who used to issue "Light Infantry uniforms" to the officers of the corps without any authority from the Commander-in-Chief.

Bufs. The Royal East Kent Regiment, the 3rd Foot. They were first raised in 1572, but the Bufs actually date from 1664 when the regiment was properly constituted. They take their name from the colour of the equipment. They were originally called the Holland Regiment on account of long service in that country in the 17th century.

The Rothshire Bufs. The old 78th, now the second battalion of the Seaforth Highlanders.

The Fighting Fifth. The 5th Foot, now the "Northumberland Fusiliers." This sobriquet was given to the regiment during the Peninsular War; it was also known as the "Old and Bold Fifth," and "the Duke of Wellington's Body-guard."

Heavies. The heavy cavalry, especially the Dragoon Guards, which consists of men of greater build and height than Lancers and Hussars. The term Heavies or Heavy Artillery was formerly applied to ordnance of any calibre of 6 in. and over, manned by gunners of the Royal Garrison Artillery.

Hindustan Regiment. The old 76th; so called because it first distinguished itself in Hindustan. It is also called the Seven and Sixpennies, from its number. Now the 2nd battalion of the West Riding, the 1st being the old No. 33rd.

The Immortals. In the British Army the 76th Foot were called "The Immortals," because so many were wounded, but not killed, in India (1788-1806). This regiment, with the old 33rd, now forms the two battalions of the West Riding regiment.

Kirke's Lambs. The Queen's Royal West Surrey Regiment, so called from their colonel, Percy Kirke (c. 1646-91). The regiment was originally known as the Tangier Regiment, the badge of which was a Pascal Lamb, the crest of the house of Braganza, in compliment to Queen Catherine, to whom they were a guard of honour in her progress to London. There was an ironical turn to the nickname as "Kirke's Lambs" were notoriously a tough lot.

Lacedæmonians. The (lās e de mō' nī anz). An old nickname of the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry; because in 1777 their colonel made a long harangue, under heavy fire, on Spartan discipline and the military system of the Lacedæmonians. See RED FEATHERS.

Old and Bold. The old 14th Foot the Prince of Wales's Own (West Yorkshire Regiment).

Old Bold. The 1st Battalion Worcestershire Regiment, the old 29th Foot.

Old Bold Fifth. The Northumberland Fusiliers; formerly the 5th Foot.

Old Dozen. The Suffolk Regiment, formerly the 12th Foot.

Old Fogs. The 87th Foot, the Royal Irish Fusiliers, so called from the war-cry "Fag-an-Bealach" (Clear the way), pronounced Faug-a-hollaigh.

Orange Lilies. The nickname of the old 35th Foot, now the Royal Sussex Regiment, raised at Belfast in 1701 by the Earl of Donegal. A firm supporter of William III he chose orange facings for the uniform; the lilies represent the white plumes given in recognition of their gallantry at Quebec in 1759, when they routed the Royal Roussillon French Grenadiers.

The Red Feathers. The Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry. They cut to pieces General Wayne's brigade in the American War, and the Americans vowed to give them no quarter. So they mounted red feathers that no others might be subjected to this threat. Later they wore red puggarees on Indian service. See LACEDÆMONIANS.

Red Hackle. The nickname of "The Black Watch," the regiment officially known as "The Royal Highlanders." They are easily recognized by the small bunch of red feathers, known as the red hackle, which they wear on their bonnets in lieu of a regimental badge.

The Saucy Greens. The 2nd Battalion Worcestershire Regiment, the old 36th Foot.

The Saucy Sixth. The Royal Warwickshires, formerly the 6th Foot.

The Saucy Seventh. The 7th (Queen's Own) Hussars.

American Army

Infantry Divisions

1st: The Red One. Name given it by the Germans, who saw the red "1" on their shoulder patch. According to legend, the original red "1" was improvised from the cap of an enemy soldier killed by a 1st Division doughboy in World War I when the division earned the right to proclaim itself the first American division (1918) in France, first to fire on the enemy, first to suffer casualties, first to take prisoners, first to stage a major offensive, and first to enter Germany.

2nd: Indian Head. A long-forgotten truck driver of the division in World War I adorned the side of his vehicle with a handsome shield framing an Indian head which was adopted by the division as its shoulder insignia. Hence the name "Indian Division."

3rd: Marne or Rock of the Marne. In World War I because of its impregnable stand against the Germans' last great counter-offensive. The three diagonal stripes in its insignia symbolize its participation in three major battles in 1918.

4th: Ivy. From its insignia. The selection of that design is one of the few known instances of authorized military frivolity. "I-vy" is simply spelling out letter form the Roman numeral for "four."

5th: Red Diamond. From its insignia. The Red Diamond was selected at the suggestion of Major Charles A. Meals that their insignia be the "Ace of Diamonds, less the Ace." Originally there was a white "5" in the centre. This was removed when they reached France.

6th: Sight Seen' Sixth. In World War I the division was in so many engagements and so many long marches that it got this name.

7th: Hourglass. From insignia, a red circle bearing a black hourglass which is formed by a "7" resting on an inverted "7."

8th: Pathfinder. From their insignia, which is a golden arrow through a figure "8" pointing the way. Also called the "Golden Arrow Division."

9th: Hitler's Nemesis. A newspaper at home dubbed them this.

10th: Mountaineers. This division was given the task of dislodging crack German mountain troops from the heights of Mt. Belvedere. It was composed of famous American skiers, climbers, forest rangers, and wild life Servicemen.

24th: Victory. The Filipinos on Leyte greeted them with the "V" sign.

25th: Tropic Lightning. Activated from elements of the Hawaiian Division, Regular Army troops. No other division was so quickly in combat after it was formed.

26th: Yankee. Originally composed of National Guard troops from the New England (Yankee) States.

27th: New York. Division originally composed of New York State National Guard. Sometimes called the "Empire Division." New York is called the Empire State.

28th: Keystone. Troops from Pennsylvania, which is known as the "Keystone State."

29th: Blue and Gray. Organized in World War I from National Guardsmen of New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia. Its shoulder patch of blue and grey, the colours of the rival armies in the Civil War, symbolizes unity of former embattled states. They are combined in a monad, the Korean symbol for eternal life.

30th: Old Hickory. Composed after World War I from National Guardsmen of the Carolinas, Georgia, and Tennessee. Andrew Jackson's old stamping grounds. He was known as "Old Hickory."

31st: Dixie. Originally composed of men of the "Deep South" or "Dixie."

32nd: Red Arrow. On tactical maps the enemies' lines are indicated in red. Their patch is a reminder to those who wear it that the enemy has never stopped them. Another nickname, "Les Terribles," was given them by an admiring French general during World War I, when they earned four battle streamers and were first to crack the Hindenberg line.

33rd: Illinois or Golden Cross. The division was originally composed mostly of Illinois troops. Their shoulder patch was a yellow cross on a black circle. The cross was an old symbol for marking government property and the only paint available where they were assembling their equipment was yellow. The insignia was originally to mark equipment. It was officially known as the "Prairie Division" because its personnel came from the prairie states. It was also called the "Money Division" because of the large amount of buried treasure they unearthed.

34th: Red Bull. Its patch is a red bull's skull on an olla, a Mexican water bottle. Inspired by the desert country of the South-west where it trained in World War I.

35th: Santa Fe. So called because the ancestors of its personnel blazed the old Santa Fe trail. Insignia is the original marker used on the trail.

36th: Texas. Personnel was from Oklahoma and Texas. The arrowhead of its insignia represented Oklahoma and the "T" was for Texas.

37th: Buckeye. Composed of Ohio troops. Ohio is known as the "Buckeye State." Insignia is that of the state flag.

38th: Cyclone. Got its name in 1917 at Shelby, Mississippi, when the tent city in which it was bivouacked was levelled by winds. The division struck like a cyclone when it landed in Luzon.

40th: Sunshine. From its insignia, which is symbolic of the Golden West sunshine. Troops were from California, Nevada, and Utah.

41st: Jungleers. It was the first complete division to reach the South-west Pacific and has done more jungle fighting than any other American outfit.

42nd: Rainbow. Nickname originated from the fact that this division was composed of military groups from the district of Columbia and twenty-five states, representing several sections, nationalities, religions, and viewpoints. They blended themselves into one harmonious unit. A major in World War I, noting its various origins, said, "This division will stretch over the land like a rainbow."

43rd: Winged Victory. Received its name on Luzon. It is formed from the name of its commanding general, Maj.-Gen. Leonard F. Wing, and the ultimate goal of the division.

45th: Thunderbird. Included 1,500 American Indians from twenty-eight tribes. Originally the insignia was an old Indian symbol of the swastika, but when Hitler adopted it they changed the division insignia to another traditional Indian symbol, the Thunderbird, sacred bearer of unlimited happiness.

63rd: Blood and Fire. When the division was activated in June following the Casablanca Conference they adopted the conference's resolution, to make their enemies "bleed and burn in expiation of their crimes against humanity," as their symbol.

65th: Battle Axe. Its patch is a white halbert on a blue shield. The halbert, a sharp-pointed battle-axe, was a potent weapon of the 15th-century foot soldier, being suitable either for a powerful cutting smash or for a quick thrust. It is an emblem that signifies both the shock action and the speed of the modern infantry division.

66th: Panther. The black panther on its shoulder patch symbolizes the attributes of a good infantryman: ability to kill, to be aggressive, alert, stealthy, cunning, agile, and strong.

69th: Fighting 69th. They were given the name probably from the fact that on their first day in action they cracked the fortifications of the Siegfried Line on a front stretching more than a mile and took 200 prisoners. Before their momentum could be checked they had gone on to capture the towns of Reschil, Dickerscheid, and Honnigen.

70th: Trailblazers. Their insignia combines an axe, a snowy mountain, and a green fir tree, symbols of the pioneers who blazed the trail to Oregon and the Willamette Valley, where most of their training was accomplished.

76th: Liberty Bell. In World War I their original shoulder patch was a Liberty Bell. In 1919 this was officially changed to the present one: a shield with a white label, an heraldic device indicating the eldest son. The 76th was the first draft division from civilian ranks. Its present nickname is "Onaway," the alert call of the Chippewa Indians in whose hunting grounds they trained.

77th: Statue of Liberty. Their insignia bears the picture of the Statue of Liberty, because most of the personnel in World War I was from New York City.

78th: Lightning. The shoulder patch originated in World War I because the battles of that division were likened by the French to a bolt of lightning, leaving the field blood red.

79th: Cross of Lorraine. Having distinguished itself at Montfaucon in Lorraine, the division selected the Cross of Lorraine, a symbol of triumph, as its insignia.

80th: Blue Ridge. Its insignia symbolizes the three Blue Ridge states, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and West Virginia, from which most of its World War I personnel were drawn.

81st: Wild Cat. Gets its name from Wildcat Creek that flows through Fort Jackson, S.C. It is generally credited as the first to wear the shoulder patch.

83rd: Ohio. Its insignia is the word "Ohio" in monogrammatic form. It was composed mostly of draftees from Ohio in World War I.

84th: Railsplitter. Primarily made up of National Guard units from Illinois, Kentucky, and Indiana, the Lincoln states. They called themselves the Lincoln Division. Their insignia is a red disc with a white axe which splits a rail. In World War II they called themselves the "Railsplitters." The Germans called them the "Hatchet-men."

85th: Custer. The initials on its insignia "CD" stand for Custer Division, because they were activated at Camp Custer, Michigan in World War I.

87th: Golden Acorn. Their patch is a green field with a golden acorn which symbolizes strength.

88th: Blue Devil. Their patch is a blue four-leaf clover formed from two crossed Arabic numerals, "88."

89th: Rolling W. The "W" on its insignia within a circle forms an "M" when it is inverted, the two letters standing for Middle West, the section of the country from which its personnel were drawn. The circle indicates speed and stability.

90th: Tough 'Ombres. The letter "T" of its insignia, standing for Texas, bisects the letter "O" for Oklahoma. The men of the division say it stands for "Tough 'Ombres."

91st: Powder River. The division has a war-whoop which comes from a World War I incident. When asked where they were from, they yelled, "Powder River—Let 'er buck." Powder River is in Montana, the home state of the division in World War I.

92nd: Buffalo. Insignia is a black buffalo on olive drab background with black border. In the days of hostile Indians a troop of Negroes who were on border patrol killed buffaloes in the winter and used them for clothing. The Indians called them the "Black Buffaloes." The men of this Negro division in World War I were trained at Fort Huachuca in this same locality.

95th: Victory. Their oval blue patch bears a red numeral "9" with a white Roman numeral "V." The "V" also stands for "Victory."

96th: Deadeye. Their name came from their perfect marksmanship while in training.

97th: Trident. Their insignia is a trident, white on a blue field. Neptune's trident represents the coastal states Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire, from which they came. There is a prong for each state. The blue represents their freshwater lakes, and the white their snowy mountains.

98th: Iroquois. Its patch consists of a shield in the shape of the great seal of the State of New York. The head of the Iroquois Indian chief is in orange. These were the colours of the Dutch House of Nassau, which was responsible for the settlement of New Amsterdam, later New York. The five feathers worn by the Indian represent the Five Nations (Onondagas, Cayugas, Senecas, Mohawks, and Oneidas) who formed the Iroquois Confederacy. The personnel of the division were from New York.

99th: Checkerboard. The blue and white squares resembling a checkerboard were on the coat-of-arms of William Pitt. The home station of the division was Pittsburgh.

100th: Century. Because of the number of the division.

102nd: Ozark. A large golden "O" on a field of blue. Within the "O" is the letter "Z," from which is suspended an arc. This represents the word "Ozark." The personnel came from the Ozark Mountain region.

103rd: Cactus. A green Saguaro cactus in a blue base superimposed on a yellow disc was adopted by this Reserve division which had its headquarters in Denver, Colorado. Yellow disc represents the golden sky, while the green cactus growing in the blue sage-covered earth is characteristic of the South-west.

104th: Timberwolf. The grey timber wolf of their patch represents the North-west, where they trained.

Airborne Divisions

11th: Angels. Insignia is a white numeral "11" on a red circle in a white-winged circle against a blue field. The winged circle gives an appearance of an angel.

13th: Blackcats. Gets its name from its flaunting of superstition. Its number is "13," it was reactivated on Friday the 13th.

17th: Thunderbolt. From the surprise of their attacks from the air. Also called the "Golden Talon," from its shoulder patch: stretching golden talons on a field of black, representing ability to seize; black suggests darkness under which many operations were carried out.

82nd: All American. In World War I the division was composed of men from every state in the union. Originally an infantry division, when it was reactivated as an airborne division it retained its insignia, adding the word "Airborne" above.

101st: Screaming Eagle. Its white eagle's head with gold beak on a black shield is based on Civil War tradition. The black shield recalls the "Iron Brigade," one regiment of which possessed the famous eagle "Old Abe" which went into battle with them as their screaming mascot.

Armoured Divisions

1st: Old Ironsides. Once so called, but the members dropped it.

2nd: Hell on Wheels. No reason found.

3rd: Spearhead. Speedy outfit which led the First Army out of Normandy and across France.

B.D.—25

4th: Breakthrough. From the big brass to the buck private the men of the division think that "4th Armoured" is sufficient, but outsiders who fought along with it gave it the name. It hammered and slammed at Nazi defences from the time of the Normandy invasion to the collapse of the Wehrmacht, and it never failed to break through.

5th: Victory. Three years before it plunged into battle the division officially adopted the nickname "Victory"—V (5th) for Victory.

6th: Super Sixth. Chosen by themselves.

7th: Lucky Seventh. "7" is considered a lucky number.

8th: Show Horse. Used as a training division.

9th: Phantom. Name given to it by the Germans.

10th: Tiger. Its motto is to "Terrify and Destroy."

11th: Thunderbolt. Because it could strike so quickly.

12th: Hellcat. No reason found.

13th: Black Cat. Tanks were offspring of caterpillar tractors called "cats" by those who operated them.

14th: Liberator. They freed more than 20,000 allied prisoners of war.

1st Cavalry Division: Hell for Leather. No reason found, but probably came from the old saying applied to a hard rider, "Hell bent for leather."

Infantry Regiments

3rd: Old Guards. This regiment is the oldest one in the Regular army. It was organized in 1784.

27th: Wolfhounds. Probably took its name in the Siberian campaign in which it participated. Their mascot was a Russian wolfhound named Kolchak.

165th: Fighting Irish. No reason found.

175th: Dandy Fifth. No reason found.

3rd Armoured Cavalry Regiment: Brave Rifles. This regiment was first organized in 1846 as a regiment of mounted riflemen. In 1847 they were the first troops to enter the captured city of Mexico and raise the Stars and Stripes. General Scott addressed them: "Brave Rifles! Veterans, you have been baptized in fire and blood and come out steel." This was adopted as their motto. In 1861 the name of the regiment was changed to the 3rd Cavalry and is now the 3rd Armoured.

7th Cavalry Regiment: Garry Owens. No reason found.

Alaskan Scouts: Castner's Cutthroats. No reason found.

Regiomontanus (rē' ji ō mon tā' nūs). The Latin equivalent of Königsberger, adopted as a patronymic by Johann Müller (1436-76), the German mathematician and astronomer, who was born at Königsberg and became Bishop of Ratisbon.

Regium donum (rē' ji um dō' num) (Lat.). An annual grant of public money to the Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist ministers of Ireland. It began in 1672, and was commuted in 1869.

Regius Professor (rē' jus). One who holds in an English university a professorship founded by Henry VIII. In the universities of Scotland they are appointed by the Crown. The present stipend is about £400 or £500.

Regnal Year is the year of a sovereign's reign, accession, e.g. regnal year 1 of Elizabeth II dating from the accession began on February 6th, 1952. The regnal year is only used for dating Acts of Parliament.

Regular (U.S.A.). In the early 19th century this meant thorough, well founded. In the 20th century it is more usually applied to people, e.g. a regular guy, a straightforward dependable man.

Regulars. All the British military forces serving in the army as a profession, as distinct from the Auxiliary Forces, viz. the Special Reserve (which takes the place of the old Militia), and the Territorial Force (i.e. Yeomanry and the old Volunteers).

Rehabilitation is a word of wide implications, the most general of which is, perhaps, the restoration to normalcy of one who has suffered in mind or body as a result of war wounds or strain, or who has lost touch with his usual way of life for some length of time through mental or physical illness.

Rehoboam (2 Chron. xiii, 7). A fanciful name sometimes given to a measure of claret, a double jeroboam (q.v.).

- 1 rehoboam = 2 jeroboams or 32 pints.
- 1 jeroboam = 2 tappet-hens or 16 pints.
- 1 tappet-hen = 2 magnums or 8 pints.
- 1 magnum = 2 quarts or 4 pints.

Charlotte Brontë—why is not known—applied the name to some sort of clerical hat.

He [Mr. Helstone] was short of stature [and wore] a rehoboam, or shovel hat, which he did not . . . remove.—Shirley, ch. i.

Reign of Terror. The period in the French Revolution from March 1793 until July 1794, when supreme power was in the hands of the Committee of Public Safety, formed by the Jacobins and dominated by Robespierre, St. Just, and Couthon. In addition to supporters of the old regime, hundreds of revolutionaries themselves perished by the guillotine, drowning, or shooting, as a result of the universal atmosphere of suspicion, mistrust, hatred, and private spite.

Reilly, To lead the life of. To live luxuriously. From a comic song "Is That Mr. Reilly," by Pat Rooney, popular in the U.S.A. in the 1880s. The song described what the hero would do if he "struck it rich."

Rein (connected with retain, from Lat. retinere, to hold back). The strap attached to the bit, used in guiding horses. To give the reins. To let go unrestrained; to give licence.

To take the reins. To assume the guidance of direction.

Reins (Lat. renes). The kidneys, supposed by the Hebrews and others to be the seat of knowledge, pleasure, and pain. The Psalmist says (xvi, 7), "My reins instruct me in the night season," Solomon (Prov. xxiii, 16), "My reins shall rejoice when thy lips speak right things," and Jeremiah says (Lam. iii, 13), God "caused his arrows to enter into my reins," i.e. sent pain into my kidneys.

Relic, Christian. The corpse of a saint or any part thereof; any part of his clothing; or anything intimately connected with him. The veneration of Christian relics goes back to the 2nd century, and a vast amount of legend, exaggeration, and downright fiction has grown up around them since then. Honour may be paid to those relics whose genuineness is morally certain, but the question of their authenticity is one of fact, to be determined by the evidence, and the Church does not guarantee the genuineness of a single specific relic. Many famous relics are almost certainly spurious, but there is no need to presume deliberate fraud. Many of the relics in churches in Rome and elsewhere are in themselves interesting on account of their great antiquity, even if they are not "genuine."

Relief Church. A secession from the Church of Scotland led in 1752 by Thomas Gillespie (1708-74). He offered passive obedience respecting the settlement of ministers. The "Presbytery of Relief" was constituted in 1761; in 1847 the sect was embodied in the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland.

Religious. His Most Religious Majesty. The title by which the kings of England were formerly addressed by the Pope. It still survives in the Prayer Book, in the Prayer "for the High Court of Parliament under our most religious and gracious Queen at this time assembled" (which was written, probably by Laud, in 1625), and in James I's Act for a Thanksgiving on the Fifth of November occurs the expression "most great, learned, and religious king."

In the Middle Ages, and later, the Popes did not use the names of the various sovereigns, but addressed them by special appellations: thus the king of France was always addressed by the Vatican as "Most Christian"; the king of Austria as "Most Apostolic"; the king of Spain as "Most Catholic"; the king of Portugal as "Most Faithful"; the king of England as "Most Religious."

Remember! The last injunction of Charles I, on the scaffold, to Bishop Juxon. It has been interpreted as meaning that Charles, who was at heart a Catholic, felt that his misfortunes were a divine visitation on him for retaining church property confiscated by Henry VIII, and made a vow that if God would restore him to the throne he would restore this property to the Church. He was asking the Bishop to remember this vow, and to see that his son carried it out. Charles II, however, wanted all the money he could get, and the Church lands were never restored.

Remigius, or Remy, St. (remij' i ùs, re' mi) (438-533), bishop and confessor, is represented as carrying a vessel of holy oil, or in the act of anointing therewith Clovis, who kneels before him. When Clovis presented himself for baptism, Remy said to him, "Sigambrian, henceforward burn what thou has worshipped, and worship what thou hast burned."

Remonstrants. Another name for the Arminians (q.v.).

Renaissance (Fr., re-birth). The term applied, broadly, to the movement and period of transition between the mediæval and modern worlds which, beginning with Petrarch and subsequent Italian humanists in the 14th century, was immensely stimulated by the fall of Constantinople (1453), resulting in the dissemination of Greek scholarship and Byzantine art, the invention of printing (about the same time), and the discovery of America (1492). In England this revival first manifested itself in the early years of the 16th century, and affected principally literature and, later, architecture.

All the Renaissance principles of art tended, as I have before often explained, to the setting Beauty above Truth, and seeking for it always at the expense of Truth. And the proper punishment of such pursuit—the punishment which all the laws of the universe rendered inevitable—was, that those who thus pursued beauty should wholly lose sight of beauty.—RUSKIN: Modern Painters, IV, xvi, § 12.

Renard (ren' ard). Une queue de renard. A mockery. At one time a common practical joke was to fasten a fox's tail behind a person against whom a laugh was designed. Panurge (q.v.) never refrained from attaching a fox's tail or the ears of a leveret behind a Master of Arts or Doctor of Divinity, whenever he encountered them. (Gargantua, II, 16.) See also REYNARD.

C'est une petite vipère,
Qui n'épargneroit pas son père,
Et qui par nature ou par art
Sait couper la queue au renard.
BEAUCAIRE: L'Embaras de la Foire.

Rendezvous. The place to which you are to repair, a meeting, a place of muster or call. Also used as a verb. (Fr. rendez, betake; vous, yourself.) In British military parlance usually contracted to R.V.

His house is a grand rendezvous of the élite of Paris. The Imperial Guard was ordered to rendezvous in the Champs de Mars.

René (re' nã). Le Bon Roi René (1408-80). Son of Louis II, Duc d'Anjou, Comte de Provence, father of Margaret of Anjou. The last minstrel monarch, just, joyous, and debonaire; a friend to chase and tilt, but still more so to poetry and music. He gave in largesse to knights-errant and minstrels (so says Thiebauld) more than he received in revenue.

Studying to promote, as far as possible, the immediate mirth and good humour of his subjects... he was never mentioned by them excepting as Le bon Roi René, a distinction... due to him certainly by the qualities of his heart, if not by those of his head.—SCOTT: Anne of Geierstein, ch. xxix.

Reno Divorces. Reno is the largest city in the State of Nevada, where the divorce laws are easier than in most of the other States. Seven grounds for absolute divorce are recognized, and a residence of six weeks only is requisite to enable a suit to be brought.

Rentier (ron' ti ä). A French term, in course of being adopted into English, describing one who does not work but derives an income from shares, land, etc.

Repenter Curls. The long ringlets of a lady's hair. Repentir is the French for a penitentiary, and les repenties are the girls sent there for reformation. Mary Magdalen had such long hair that she wiped off her tears therewith from the feet of Jesus. Hence the association of long curls and reformed (repenties) prostitutes.

Repertory Company. A theatrical company that produces a number of plays, operas, etc., often at successive performances, or gives, maybe, a week to each. Such companies are becoming established in many smaller towns out of reach of the big centres of population.

Reply Churlish. Sir, you are no judge; your opinion has no weight with me. Or, to use Touchstone's illustration (As You Like It, v, 4) "If a courtier tell me my beard is not well cut, and I disable his judgment, I give him the reply churlish, which is the fifth remove from the lie direct, or, rather, the lie direct in the fifth degree." Reproof Valiant. Sir, allow me to tell you that is not the truth. This is Touchstone's fourth remove from the lie direct, or, rather, the lie direct in the fourth degree.

Republic of Letters. The world of literature; authors generally and their influence. Goldsmith, in The Citizen of the World, No. 20 (1760), says it "is a very common expression among Europeans"; it is found in Molière's Le Mariage Forcé, Sc. vi (1664).

Republican Queen. Sophia Charlotte (1668-1705), wife of Frederick I of Prussia, was so nicknamed on account of her advanced political views. She was the daughter of George I of Britain, the friend of Leibniz, and a woman of remarkable culture. Charlottenburg was named after her.

Requests, Court of. See CONSCIENCE, COURT OF.

Requiem (rê' kwi em). The first word of the prayer Requiem æternam dona eis, domine, et lux perpetua luceat eis (Eternal rest give them, O Lord, and let everlasting light shine upon them) used as the introit of a Mass for the Dead (Requiem Mass).

Reremous. See REARMOUSE.

Reservation (U.S.A.). A tract of land set aside for occupation solely by Indians.

Resolute. The Resolute Doctor. John Baconthorpe (d. 1346), head of the Carmelites in England (1329-33) and commentator on Aristotle.

The Most Resolute Doctor. Guillaume Durandus de St. Pourçain (d. about 1333), a French Dominican philosopher, bishop of Meaux (1326), and author of Commentaries sur Pierre Lombard (publ. 1508).

Responsions. See SMALLS.

Restoration. Term applied in British history to the recall to the throne, in 1660, of the royal family of Stuart in the person of Charles II, eldest son of Charles I, who was beheaded in 1649. After the austerity imposed on the nation by the Puritan regime of the Commonwealth, the return of the King brought about a reaction that flowered in the drama, literature, and life of the nation. In France the royal house of Bourbon was restored after the fall of Napoleon in 1815. Louis XVIII was the brother of the late king Louis XVI whose son, dynastically known as Louis XVII, never came to the throne or reached manhood.

Resurrection Men. Grave-robbers, body-snatchers (q.v.). The term was first applied to the infamous Burke and Hare, of Edinburgh, who in 1829 were convicted of rifling graves to sell the bodies for dissection by doctors and students at the School of Medicine. They also murdered persons to supply bodies when occasion served.

The body-snatchers, they have come,
And made a snatch at me;
'Tis very hard them kind of men
Won't let a body be.
The cock it crows—I must be gone—
My William, we must part;
But I'll be yours in death although Sir Astley has my heart.

HOOD: Mary's Ghost.

The reference is to Sir Astley Cooper (1768-1841), the great surgeon and lecturer on anatomy.

Retiarius (rē ti ār' i us) (Lat.). A gladiator who made use of a net (rete), which he threw over his adversary.

As in the thronged amphitheatre of old
The wary Retiarius trapped his foe.

THOMSON: Castle of Indolence, canto ii.

Retort Courteous, The. Sir, I am not of your opinion; I beg to differ from you; or, to use Touchstone's illustration (As You Like It, v, 4), "If I said his beard was not cut well, he was in the mind it was." The lie seven times removed; or rather, the lie direct in the seventh degree.

Retread. A U.S. and Australian term for a soldier who fought in World War I and joined up again for World War II.

Returned Letter Office. See BLIND DEPARTMENT.

Reveille (re vāl' i) (Fr. réveiller, to awake). The signal by bugle or beat of drum, notifying soldiers that it is time to rise, and informing the sentries that they may forbear from challenging.

Revenons à nos moutons. See MOUTONS.

Reverend. An archbishop is the Most Reverend (Father in God); a bishop, the Right Reverend; a dean, the Very Reverend; an archdeacon, the Venerable; and all the rest of the clergy, the Reverend.

Revised Version, The. See BIBLE, THE ENGLISH.

Revival of Letters, The. A term applied to the Renaissance (q.v.) in so far as the movement reacted on literature. It really commenced earlier—at the close of the Dark Ages (q.v.)—but it received its chief impulse from the fall of Constantinople (1453) and the consequent dispersal over Europe of Greek MSS. and Greek scholars.

Revue (re vū'). A theatrical entertainment characterized by songs and music, dancing, and constant change, with a somewhat indefinite plot and (hence the name) usually allusions to current topics.

Revue amuses by fun, by satire of passing events, by gorgeous spectacle which delights the child in all of us, by song and dance, by glimpses of drama, by the agility of man and the beauty of woman, above all by the rapid alternation of these elements; its crowning virtue is variety.—A. B. WALKLEY: in The Times, Mar. 22nd, 1922.

Rexists. A Belgian political party formed by Léon Degrelle in 1936 advocating Fascist ideals and working hand in hand with the Nazis. It was markedly collaborationist during the German occupation of Belgium and was accordingly suppressed when the country regained its liberty. The name is an adaptation of "Christus Rex," Christ the King, the watchword of a Catholic Young People's Action Society, founded in 1925.

Reynard (rā' nard). A fox. Caxton's form of the name in his translation (from the Dutch) of the Roman de Renart (see REYNARD THE FOX, below). Renart was the Old French form, from Ger. Reinhart, a personal name; the Dutch was Reynaerd or Reynaert.

Where prowling Reynard trod his nightly round.

BLOOMFIELD: Farmer's Boy.

Reynard the Fox. A mediæval beast-epic, satirizing contemporary life and events, in which all the characters are animals. Such anthropomorphic epics were common in mediæval France.

The germ of the story is found in Æsop's fable, The Fox and the Lion; this was built upon by more than one writer, but the Roman as we now know it is by a Fleming named Willem, of the early 13th century, of which a new and enlarged version was written about 1380 by an unknown author, Caxton having made his translation from a late 15th-century Dutch version of this, which was probably by Herman Barkhusen.

False Reynard. By this name Dryden describes the Unitarians in his Hind and Panther.

With greater guile

False Reynard fed on consecrated spoil;

The graceless beast by Athanasius first

Was chased from Nice, then by Socinius nursed.

Pt. i, 51-54.

Reynard's globe of glass. Reynard, in Reynard the Fox (see above), said he had sent this invaluable treasure to her majesty the queen as a present; but it never came to hand, inasmuch as it had no existence except in the imagination of the fox. It was supposed to reveal what was being done—no matter how far off—and also to afford information on any subject that the person consulting it wished to know. Your gift was like the globe of glass of Master Reynard. A great promise, but no performance.

Rhadamanthus. In Greek mythology one of the three judges of hell; Minos and Æacus being the other two.

Rhapsody meant originally "songs strung together" (Gr. rhapto, to sew or string together; ode, a song). The term was applied to portions of the Iliad and Odyssey, which bards recited, as our minstrels sang the deeds of famous heroes.

Rheims-Douai Version, The. See DOUAI BIBLE.

Rhetorical Question. The term in Logic for a question to which no considered answer is expected or desired, the question having been asked to produce effect only. An example is the once-popular "Are we downhearted?" only asked to elicit the answer "No."

Rhino (rī' nō). Slang for money; the term was in use as early as the 17th century. See under Nose, To pay through the nose.

Some, as I know,

Have parted with their ready rhino.

The Seamans' Adieu (1670).

Rhodes Scholarships. Under the will of Cecil Rhodes (1853-1902) scholarships at Oxford were endowed for foreign and overseas students. By subsequent rearrangement U.S.A. sends 32 annually (4 students from each of 8 regions consisting of 6 States); India 2; 1 from each State or Province of Canada, Australia, and South Africa. Scholarships are also awarded to certain schools in New Zealand, Newfoundland, Rhodesia, Jamaica, Bermuda, Malta, and East Africa. 5 scholarships were allotted to Germany until 1914, and 2 for the period between the wars. The scholarships are worth £400 per annum for a period of 3 years.

Rhodian Bully, The. The Colossus of Rhodes (q.v.).

Yet fain wouldst thou the crouching world bestride,
Just like the Rhodian bully o'er the tide.

PETER PINDAR: The Lustiad, canto 2.

Rhodian Law, The. The earliest system of marine law known to history; compiled by the Rhodians about 900 B.C.

Rhopalic Verse. Verse consisting of lines in which each successive word has more syllables than the one preceding it (Gr. rhopalon, a club, which is much thicker at one end than at the other).

Rem	tibi	confect	doctissime,	dulcisonorum.
Spes	deus	æternæ-est	stationis	conciliator.
Hope	ever	solaces	miserable	individuals.
1	2	3	4	5

Rhyme. Neither rhyme nor reason. Fit neither for amusement nor instruction. An author took his book to Sir Thomas More, chancellor of Henry VIII, and asked his opinion. Sir Thomas told the author to turn it into rhyme. He did so, and submitted it again to the lord chancellor. "Ay! ay!" said the witty satirist, "that will do, that will do. 'Tis rhyme now, but before it was neither rhyme nor reason."

The lines on his pension, traditionally ascribed to Spenser, are well known:--

I was promised on a time
To have reason for my rhyme;
From that time unto this season,
I received nor rhyme nor reason.

Rhyming Slang. A kind of slang in which the word intended was replaced by one that rhymed with it, as "Charley Prescott" for waistcoat, "plates of meat" for feet. When the rhyme is a compound word the rhyming part is almost invariably dropped, leaving one who does not know somewhat in the dark. Thus Chivy (Chevy) Chase rhymes with "face," by dropping "chase" chivy remains, and becomes the accepted slang word. Similarly, daisies = boots, thus: daisy-roots will rhyme with "boots," drop the rhyme and daisy remains. By the same process sky is slang for pocket, the compound word which gave birth to it being "sky-rocket." "Christmas," a railway guard, as "Ask the Christmas," is, of course, from "Christmas-card"; and "raspberry," heart, is "raspberry-tart."

Then came a knock at the Rory o' More [door]
Which made my raspberry beat.

Other examples are given under their proper heads.

Rhyming to death. The Irish at one time believed that their children and cattle could be "eyebitten," that is, bewitched by an evil eye, and that the "eyebitter," or witch, could "rime" them to death. See RATS.

Thomas the Rhymer. A border poet and seer of the close of the 13th century, also called Thomas of Erceeldoune and Thomas Learmont. He is the reputed author of a number of poems, including one on Tristram (which Scott believed to be genuine), and is fabled to have predicted the death of Alexander III of Scotland, the Battle of Bannockburn, the union of England and Scotland under James VI, etc. He must not be confused with Thomas Rymer (d. 1713), Historiographer Royal to William III. See TRUE THOMAS.

Ribbon Development. Urban extension in the form of a single depth of houses along roads radiating from the town. This extravagant and impractical method of development was made illegal under the Town and Country Planning Act of 1947.

Ribbonism. The principles, etc., of the Ribbon Society, a secret Roman Catholic association organized in Ireland about 1808. Its two main objects were (1) to secure fixity of tenure, called the tenant-right; and (2) to deter anyone from taking land from which a tenant has been ejected. The name arose from a ribbon worn as a badge in the buttonhole.

Plying a person secretly with threatening letters in order to drive him out of the neighbourhood, or to compel him to do something he objects to, used to be known as the Ribbon dodge, because the Ribbon men sent such letters, often decorated with rude drawings of coffins, cross-bones, or daggers, to obnoxious neighbours.

Ribston Pippin. So called from Ribston, in Yorkshire, where the first pippins, introduced from Normandy about 1707, were planted. It is said that Sir Henry Goodriche planted three pips; two died, and from the third came all the Ribston apple-trees in England.

Rice. The custom of throwing rice after a bride comes from India, rice being, with the Hindus, an emblem of fecundity. The bridegroom throws three handfuls over the bride, and the bride does the same over the bridegroom. Cp. MARRIAGE KNOT.

Rice Christians. Converts to Christianity for worldly benefits, such as a supply of rice to Indians. Profession of Christianity born of lucre, not faith.

Rice-paper. See MISNOMERS.

Richard Roe. See DOE.

Richmond. Another Richmond in the field. Said when another unexpected adversary turns up. The reference is to Shakespeare's Richard III, v, 4, where the king, speaking of Henry of Richmond (afterwards Henry VII), says—

I think there be six Richmonds in the field;

Five have I slain to-day, instead of him—

A horse! a horse! my kingdom for a horse!

Rick Mould. Fetching the rick mould is a "flat-catching" trick played during the hay-harvest. The greenhorn is sent to borrow a rick-mould, with strict injunction not to drop it. Something very heavy is put in a sack and hoisted on his back; when he has carried it carefully in the hot sun to the hayfield he gets well laughed at for his pains.

Ricochet (rik' ô shā). The skipping of a flung stone over water ("ducks and drakes"), the bound of a bullet or other projectile after striking; hence, applied to anything repeated over and over again, e.g. the fabulous bird that had only one note. Marshal Vauban (1633-1707) invented a ricochet battery, the application of which was ricochet firing.

Riddle. Josephus relates how Hiram, King of Tyre, and Solomon had once a contest in riddles, when Solomon won a large sum of money, though he subsequently lost it to Abaddon, one of Hiram's subjects.

Plutarch states that Homer died of chagrin because he could not solve a certain riddle. See SPHINX.

Riddle me riddle me ree. See REE.

A riddle of claret. Thirteen bottles, a magnum and twelve quarts; said to be so called because in certain old golf clubs magistrates invited to the celebration dinner presented the club with this amount, sending it in a riddle or sieve.

Ride. To ride (U.S.A.). To oppress, to pick on and irritate until the person becomes exasperated.

Riding the marshes. See BOUNDS, BEATING THE.

To ride abroad with St. George, but at home with St. Michael. Said of a henpecked braggart. St. George is represented as riding on a war charger; St. Michael on a dragon. Abroad a man rides, like St. George, on a horse which he can control and govern, but at home he has "a dragon" to manage, like St. Michael.

To ride and tie. Said of a couple of travellers who have only one horse between them. One rides on ahead and then ties the horse up and walks on, the other taking his turn on the horse when he has reached it.

To ride for a fall. To proceed with one's business recklessly; usually, also desperately and regardless of consequences.

To ride up Holborn Hill. See HOLBORN.

To take for a ride. Originally this meant to pull someone's leg or make him the butt of a joke, but it has become a gangster euphemism for murder. The victim is induced or forced to enter a car with one or more companions who, in the course of the ride, murder him. Under the Nazi regime in Germany high officials, generals, etc. (e.g. Rommel), were requested to take a car ride with one or two of Hitler's trustees and then given the alternative choice of suicide or being murdered.

Rider. An addition to a manuscript, such as a codicil to a will; an additional clause tacked to a bill in Parliament, over-riding the preceding matter when the two come into collision; hence, a corollary or obvious supplement, and, in Euclid, etc., a subsidiary problem.

In American Negro parlance, a rider is a lover. The word is found throughout Negro folk music as easy rider.

Ridiculous. There is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous. In his Age of Reason (1794), Pt. II, note, Tom Paine said, "The sublime and the ridiculous are often so nearly related that it is difficult to class them separately. One step above the sublime makes the ridiculous, and one step above the ridiculous makes the sublime again."

Napoleon, who was a great admirer of Tom Paine, use to say, "Du sublime au ridicule il n'y a qu'un pas."

Riding. The three administrative divisions of Yorkshire are so called because each forms the third part of the county, A.S. thriding; the initial th- of the old word being lost through amalgamation with the east, west, or north. The divisions of Tipperary are (and those of Lincolnshire formerly were) also called ridings. Some others of the counties have special names for their parts, as the laths of Kent and rapes of Sussex.

Ridotto (ri dot' ô) (Ital.). An assembly where the company is first entertained to music, and then joins in dancing. The word originally meant music reduced to a full score (Lat. reductus).

Rien de trop. See DE TROP.

Rienzi, Cola di (rē en' zi). A patriot of Rome who incited the people to rise against the Papal and Imperial governments. In May 1347, he was declared Tribune, but his power was crushed and he fled. In 1354 Pope Innocent VI sent him to Rome once more as a Senator, but while attempting to quell a riot he met his death. In Rienzi (1835) Bulwer Lytton tells the story of the Tribune.

Riff-raff. The offscouring of society, perhaps the "refuse and sweepings." Raff in Swedish means sweepings, but the old French term rif et raf meant one and all, whence the phrase Il n'a laissé ni rif ni raf (he has left nothing behind him). Gabriel Harvey (in Pierce's Supererogation, 1593) speaks of "the riffe-raffe of the scribbling rascality."

Riffle (U.S.A.). A small rapid, a place where the current of a stream flows swiftly and the water is disturbed. From this, probably, is evolved the jazz term, a riff, which is a short, improvised musical phrase.

Rifle. The firearm gets its name from the spiral grooves (Low Ger. riffel, Swed. refia) in the bore, which give the bullet a rotatory motion. The verb, to rifle, meaning to pillage or plunder, is connected with this through the O.Fr. rifler, to graze, scratch, strip, etc.

Rift in the Lute. A small defect which mars the general result.

Unfaith in aught is want of faith in all

It is the little rift within the lute

That by-and-by will make the music mute,

And ever widening slowly silence all.

TENNYSON: Merlin and Vivien; Vivien's Song.

Rig. There is more than one word composed of these three letters, but the etymology and division of them are alike uncertain. In the sense of dressing it was originally applied to a ship; a ship that is thoroughly furnished with spars, gear, tackle, and so on is well rigged, and its ropes and stays are its rigging. Hence, a good rig out, a first-rate outfit in clothes, equipment, etc.

In the U.S.A. before the days of motor-cars a rig was a carriage or private conveyance.

The word also formerly was used of a strumpet, and a lewd woman was said to be riggish. Also, a hoax or dodge; hence a swindle, and the phrase to rig the market, to raise or lower prices by underhand methods so that one can make a profit.

To run the rig. To have a bit of fun, or indulge in practical jokes.

He little thought when he set out
Of running such a rig.

COWPER: John Gilpin.

Rigadoun. A lively dance for two people, said to have been invented towards the close of the 17th century by a dancing-master of Marseilles named Rigadou.

Isaac's Rigadoun shall live as long
As Raphael's painting, or as Virgil's song.

JENYNS: Art of Dancing, canto ii.

Right. In politics the Right is the Conservative party, because in the continental chambers the Conservatives sit on the right-hand side of the Speaker, the Liberals, Radicals, and Labour on the left.

It'll all come right in the end. The cry of the optimist when things are going wrong.

In one's right mind. Sane; in a normal state after mental excitement. The phrase comes from Mark v, 15—

And they . . . see him that was possessed with the devil, and had the legion, sitting, and clothed, and in his right mind.

Miner's right. The Australian term for a licence to dig for gold—a formidable looking document, engrossed on parchment.

Right as a trivet. Quite right; in an excellent state. The trivet was originally a three-legged stand—a tripod—and the allusion is to its always standing firmly on its three legs.

Right foot foremost. It is still considered unlucky to enter a house, or even a room, on the left foot, and in ancient Rome a boy was stationed at the door of a mansion to caution visitors not to cross the threshold with their left foot, which would have been an ill omen.

Right-hand man. An invaluable, or confidential, assistant; originally applied to the cavalryman at the right of the line, whose duties were of great responsibility.

Right Honourable. A prefix to the title of earls, viscounts, barons, and the younger sons of dukes and marquesses. All privy councillors and some lord mayors, Lords Justices of Appeal, and other civic dignitaries are also Right Honourables. The corresponding prefix for a marquess is The Most Honourable, and for a duke His Grace. Younger sons of earls, and all sons of viscounts and barons are Honourables, as are justices of the High Court, maids of honour, and certain Colonial and other ministers. Members of Parliament when in the House are usually addressed as "My honourable friend," or "the honourable member for So-and-so."

Righto! or Right ho! A colloquial form of cheerful assent; right you are is a similar exclamation.

Right of way. The legal right to make use of a certain passage whether high road, by-road, or private road. Private right of way may be claimed by immemorial usage, special permission, or necessity; but a funeral cortège or bridal party having passed over a certain field does not give to the public the right of way, as many suppose.

To do one right. To be perfectly fair to him, to do him justice.

King Charles, and who'll do him right now?

BROWNING: Cavalier Tunes.

In Elizabethan literature the phrase is very common, and meant to answer when one's health had been drunk.

Falstaff [To SILENCE, who drinks a bumper]: Why, now you have done me right.

2 Henry IV, v, 3.

To send one to the right about. To clear him off, send him packing.

Declaration of Rights. An instrument submitted to William and Mary and accepted by them (February 13th, 1689), setting forth the fundamental principles of the constitution. The chief items are: The Crown cannot levy taxes without the consent of Parliament, nor keep a standing army in times of peace; the Members of Parliament are free to utter their thoughts, and a Parliament is to be convened every year; elections are to be free, trial by jury to be inviolate, the right of petition not to be interfered with, and the Sovereign should take the oath against Transubstantiation and not marry a Roman Catholic.

To put things to rights. To put every article in its proper place.

Rigmarie (rig ma 'rè). An old Scottish coin of low value. The word originated from one of the "billon" coins struck in the reign of Queen Mary, which bore the words Reg. Maria as part of the legend.

Billon is mixed metal for coinage, especially silver largely alloyed with copper.

Rigmarole (rig' mà rôl). A rambling, disconnected account, an unending yarn.

You never heard such a rigmarole. . . . He said he thought he was certain he had seen somebody by the rick and it was Tom Bakewell who was the only man he knew who had a grudge against Farmer Blaize and if the object had been a little bigger he would not mind swearing to Tom and would swear to him for he was dead certain it was Tom only what he saw looked smaller and it was pitch-dark at the time . . . etc.—MEREDITH: Richard Feverel, ch. xi.

The word is said to be a popular corruption of Ragman Roll (q.v.); it is recorded from the early 18th century.

Rigol. A circle or diadem (Ital. rigolo, a little wheel).

[Sleep] That from this golden rigol hath divorced
So many English kings.

2 Henry IV, iv, 4.

Rig-veda. See VEDA.

Rile. A dialect word, common in Norfolk and other parts for stirring up water to make it muddy; hence, to excite or disturb, and hence the modern colloquial meaning, to vex, annoy, make angry. It comes from O.Fr. roillier, to roll or flow (of a stream).

Rimfaxi. See HORSE.

Rimmon. The Babylonian god who presided over storms. Milton identifies him with one of the fallen angels:

Him followed Rimmon, whose delightful seat
Was fair Damascus, on the fertile bank
Of Abbana and Parphar, lucid streams,
Paradise Lost, Bk. i, 467.

To bow the knee to Rimmon. To palter with one's conscience; to do that which one knows to be wrong so as to save one's face. The allusion is to Naaman obtaining Elisha's permission to worship the god when with his master (2 Kings v, 18).

Rinaldo. One of the great heroes of mediæval romance (also called Renault of Montauban, Regnault, etc.), a paladin of Charlemagne, cousin of Orlando (q.v.), and one of the four sons of Aymon. He was the owner of the famous horse Bayard, and is always painted with the characteristics of a borderer—valiant, ingenious, rapacious, and unscrupulous.

In Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered Rinaldo was the Achilles of the Christian army, despising gold and power but craving renown.

In Ariosto's Orlando Furioso he appears as the son of the fourth Marquis d'Este, Lord of Mount Auban or Albano, eldest son of Amon or Aymon, nephew of Charlemagne. He was the rival of his cousin Orlando, but Angelica detested him.

Ring. The noun (meaning a circlet) is the A.S. hring; the verb (to sound a bell, or as a bell) is from A.S. hringan, to clash, ring, connected with Lat. clangere, to clang.

A ring worn on the forefinger is supposed to indicate a haughty, bold, and overbearing spirit; on the long finger, prudence, dignity, and discretion; on the marriage finger, love and affection; on the little finger, a masterful spirit. Cp. WEDDING FINGER.

The wearing of a wedding-ring by married women is now universal in Christian countries, but the custom varies greatly in detail. It appears to have originated in the betrothal rings given as secular pledges by the Romans. Until the end of the 16th century it was the custom in England to wear the wedding-ring on the third finger of the right hand.

As the forefinger was held to be symbolical of the Holy Ghost, priests used to wear their ring on this in token of their spiritual office. Episcopal rings, worn by cardinals, bishops and abbots are of gold with a stone—cardinals a sapphire, bishops and abbots an amethyst—and are worn upon the third finger of the right hand. The pope wears a similar ring, usually with a cameo, emerald, or ruby. A plain gold ring is put upon the third finger of the right hand of a nun on her profession.

Amongst the Romans, only senators, chief magistrates, and in later times knights, enjoyed the jus annuli aurei, the right to wear a ring of gold. The emperors conferred this upon whom they pleased, and Justinian extended the privilege to all Roman citizens.

Rings noted in Fable and History.

Agramant's ring. This enchanted ring was given by Agramant to the dwarf Brunello, from whom it was stolen by Bradamant and given to Melissa. It passed successively into the hands of Rogero and Angelica (who carried it in her mouth) (Orlando Furioso, Bk. v).

The ring of Amasis. A ring with the same story as that of Polycrates. See below.

Corcud's ring. This magic ring was composed of six metals, and ensured the wearer success in any undertaking in which he chose to embark (Chinese Tales; Corcud and his Four Sons).

The Doge's ring. The doge of Venice, on Ascension Day, used to throw a ring into the sea from the ship Bucentaur (q.v.), to denote that the Adriatic was subject to the republic of Venice as a wife is subject to her husband. See DOGE.

The ring of Edward the Confessor. It is said that Edward the Confessor was once asked for alms by an old man, and gave him his ring. In time some English pilgrims went to the Holy Land and happened to meet the same old man, who told them he was John the Evangelist, and gave them the identical ring to take to "Saint" Edward. It was preserved in Westminster Abbey.

The ring of Gyges. See GYGES.

The ring of Innocent. On May 29th, 1205, Innocent III sent John, King of England, four gold rings set with precious stones, and explained that the rotundity signifies eternity—remember we are passing through time into eternity; the number signifies the four virtues which make up constancy of mind—viz. justice, fortitude, prudence, and temperance; the material signifies "the wisdom from on high," which is as gold purified in the fire; the green emerald is emblem of "faith," the blue sapphire of "hope," the red garnet of "charity," and the bright topaz of "good works." (Rymer: Fœdera, vol. i, 139.)

Dame Liones' ring, given by her to Sir Gareth during a tournament. It ensured the wearer from losing blood when wounded.

"This ring," said Dame Liones, "increaseth my beauty. . . . That which is green it turns red, and that which is red it turns green. That which is blue it turns white and that which is white it turns blue. Whoever beareth this ring can never lose blood, however wounded."—History of Prince Arthur, i, 146.

Luned's ring rendered the wearer invisible. Luned or Lynet gave it to Owain, one of King Arthur's knights.

Take this ring, and put it on thy finger, with the stone inside thy hand, and close thy hand upon it. As long as thou concealst the stone the stone will conceal thee.—Mabinogion (Lady of the Fountain).

The Ring of the Nibelung. See NIBELUNG.

The ring of Ogier (q.v.) was given him by Morgan le Fay. It removed all infirmities, and restored the aged to youth again.

Otnit's ring of invisibility belonged to Otnit, King of Lombardy, and was given to him by the queen-mother when he went to gain the soldan's daughter in marriage. The stone had the virtue of directing the wearer the right road to take in travelling (The Heldenbuch).

Polycrates' ring was flung into the sea to propitiate Nemesis, and was found again by the owner inside a fish. Cp. KENTIGERN.

Reynard's wonderful ring. This ring, which existed only in the brain of Reynard, had a stone of three colours—red, white, and green. The red made the night as clear as the day; the white cured all manner of diseases; and the green rendered the wearer of the ring invincible (Reynard the Fox, ch. xii).

Solomon's ring, among other wonderful things, sealed up the refractory Jinni in jars, and cast them into the Red Sea.

The steel ring, made by Seidel-Beckit, enabled the wearer to read the secrets of another's heart (Oriental Tales, The Four Talismans).

The talking ring was given by Tartaro, the Basque Cyclops, to a girl whom he wished to marry. Immediately she put it on, it kept incessantly saying, "You there, and I here." In order to get rid of the nuisance, the girl cut off her finger and threw it and the ring into a pond.

This Basque legend is given in Campbell's Popular Tales of the West Highlands, and in Grimm's Tales (The Robber and his Sons).

Ring of the Fisherman. A seal ring with which the pope is invested at his election, and used only for sealing papal briefs. It is officially broken up at his death by the Chamberlain of the Roman Church. Its device is that of St. Peter fishing from a boat.

The Ring. A phrase used in Australia in the early 19th century to describe a group of the most hard-bitten convicts at the Norfolk Island penitentiary, who exercised an evil influence over their fellows. This use of the word ante-dates by some 30 years its employment in U.S.A.

The Ring. Bookmakers or pugilists collectively, and the sports they represent; because the spectators at a prize-fight or race form a ring round the competitors. Specifically, The Ring was the hall for prize-fights in the Blackfriars Road.

Ringleader. The moving spirit, the chief, in some enterprise, especially one of a mutinous character; from the old phrase to lead the ring, the ring being a group of associated persons.

To make a ring. To combine in order to control the price of a given article. If the chief merchants of any article (say salt, flour, or sugar) combine, they can fix the selling price, and thus secure enormous profits.

A swindle is also commonly found in auction rooms today, particularly at book, furniture, and art sales in the provinces. The dealers present agree not to push up the prices of the goods offered, which are knocked down cheaply to one or another of the party. A fresh auction is then held among the ring privately, whereat each dealer obtains the items he most wants at something approaching its real value; the profit thus accruing is divided among the participating members, who then get both the money and the goods. For example, books bought at one provincial sale in Great Britain in 1948 for under £20,000 were resold the same day by the ring amongst themselves for £87,000.

To make rings round one. To defeat him completely in some sport or competition, etc.; to outclass him easily.

To ring an anchor. To haul it up so that its ring is at the hawse-hole or cathead.

Ring posies or mottoes.

- (1) A E I (Greek for "Always").
- (2) For ever and for aye.
- (3) In thee, my choice, I do rejoice.
- (4) Let love increase.
- (5) May God above Increase our love.
- (6) Not two but one Till life is gone.
- (7) My heart and I, Until I die.
- (8) When this you see, Then think of me.
- (9) Love is heaven, and heaven is love.
- (10) Wedlock, 'tis said, In heaven is made.

Ring and the Book. The. A long poem (20,934 lines), by Robert Browning, telling twelve times over, from different points of view, the story of a cause célèbre of Italian history (1698). Guido Franceschini, a Florentine nobleman of shattered fortune, marries Pompilia, an heiress, to repair his state. Pompilia is a supposititious child of Pietro, supplied by his wife, Violante, to prevent certain property going to an heir not his own. The bride reveals to Guido this fact, and the first trial occurs to settle the said property. The count treats his bride so brutally that she quits his roof under the protection of Caponsacchi, a young priest, and takes refuge in Rome. Guido follows and has them arrested; a trial ensues, a separation is permitted. Pompilia is sent to a convent and Caponsacchi is suspended for three years. Pompilia's health gives way, and as the birth of a child is expected, she is permitted to leave the convent and live with her putative parents. She pleads for a divorce, but, pending the suit, the child is born. The count, hearing thereof, murders Pietro, Violante, and Pompilia; but, being taken red-handed, is executed.

A ring of bells. A set of bells (from three to twelve) for change ringing, tuned to the diatonic scale.

It has the true ring—has intrinsic merit; bears the mark of real talent. A metaphor taken from the custom of judging genuine money by its "ring" or sound.

Ring off! The expression commonly used on the telephone when one has a wrong connexion or it is desired that the conversation should cease.

Ringling the changes. Properly, producing continual changes on a set of bells without repetition, changes being variations—according to certain rules—from the regular striking order.

Figuratively the phrase has two meanings: (1) to try every way of doing a thing, to "run a thing to death," work it for all it's worth, etc., as in—

I have likewise seen an Hymn in Hexameters to the Virgin Mary which filled a whole Book tho' it consisted but of the eight following Words:

Tot, tibi, sunt, Virgo, dotes, quot, sidera, Caelo.
The Poet rung the changes upon these eight several Words and by that Means made his Verses almost as numerous as the Virtues and the Stars which they celebrated.—ADDISON: Spectator, No. ix.

(2) to swindle one over a transaction by bamboozling him in changing money. For example: A man goes to a tavern and asks for a glass of beer (8d.); he lays a ten-shilling note on the bar and receives nine shillings and fourpence in change. "Oh!" says the man, "give me the note back, I have such a lot of change." He offers ten shillings in silver as he is handed the note, but just before the barmaid takes it he puts the lot together and says, "There, let's have a quid instead of the note and silver." This is done, and, of course, the barmaid loses ten shillings by the transaction.

Riot. In Common Law there are five elements necessary to make a tumult, or disturbance of the peace, a riot, viz.:—

(1) A number of persons, three at least; (2) common purpose; (3) execution or conception of the common purpose; (4) an intent to help one another by force if necessary against any person who may oppose them in the execution of their common purpose; (5) force or violence not merely used in demolishing, but displayed in such a manner as to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage.

If there are twelve persons or more present and they continue riotously and tumultuously together for one hour after the proclamation in the king's name ordering them to disperse has been read by a justice of the peace or other authorized person, the rioters are guilty of felony and can be punished by penal servitude for life (formerly it was a capital offence). This proclamation is popularly known as "reading the Riot Act," for it is the opening section of the Riot Act of 1714 that is read on such occasions.

To run riot. To act without restraint or control; to act in a very disorderly way. The phrase was originally used of hounds which had lost the scent.

Rip. He is a sad rip. A sad rake or debauchee; seems to be a perversion of rep, rep-robate, as in demirep.

Some forlorn, worn-out old rips, broken-kneed and broken-winded.—DU MAURIER: Peter Ibbetson, Pt. vi, p. 376.

Let her rip. Let it (an engine, etc.) go as fast as it can.

Rip Van Winkle. See WINKLE.

Ripon. A cathedral city in Yorkshire. True as Ripon steel. Ripon used to be famous for its steel spurs, which were the best in the world. The spikes of a Ripon spur would strike through a shilling-piece without turning the point.

Ripping. Excellent, tip-top.

Rise. On the rise. Going up in price; becoming more valuable, especially of stocks and shares.

To get a rise. Colloquial for to have an increase in salary.

To take a rise out of one. To raise a laugh at his expense, to make him a butt. Hotten says this is a metaphor from fly-fishing; the fish rise to the fly, and are caught.

Rising in the Air. See LEVITATION.

Risorgimento (ri sôr ji men' tō). The name given to the Italian movement for national freedom in the 19th century. It first took active form in 1848, the year of European revolutions. At that time the peninsula was divided into nine states, all—save Piedmont and the Papal States—under the direct or indirect influence of Austria. Only Piedmont (the Kingdom of Sardinia) remained unmoved by this revolution, but by the genius of Cavour this kingdom obtained the moral leadership of all Italian patriots and twelve years later, under her protection, Garibaldi delivered Sicily and Naples while the Piedmontese armies came down from the north. Only the city of Rome remained to the Popes and when, in 1870, Italian troops entered the city, the Kingdom of Italy under Victor Emmanuel II became a fact.

Rivals. Originally "persons dwelling on opposite sides of a river" (Lat. rivalis, a riverman). Cælius says there was no more fruitful source of contention than river-right, both with beasts and men, not only for the benefit of its waters, but also because rivers are natural boundaries.

Rivers. The following are miles in length:

About 3,500, the Nile, the longest river in Africa.

About 2,400, the Volga, the longest river in Europe.

About 3,200, the Yang-tze-Kiang, the longest river in Asia.

About 3,900, the Lower Mississippi and the Missouri. The Mississippi itself, the longest river in North America, is 2,553 miles from mouth to source.

About 4,700, the Amazon, the longest river in South America and in the world.

About 228, the Thames, the longest river in Great Britain.

Riviera, The. The name given to the Mediterranean coasts of France and Italy for a distance of about 300 miles, with its centre at Genoa. From west to east the principal resorts are: Hyères, Cannes, Nice, Monte Carlo, Mentone, San Remo, Bordighera, Rapallo, Savona, Spezzia.

Roach. Sound as a roach. An old saying; a translation of the French Sain comme une gardon.

To roach is to trim a horse's mane to within an inch or so of the hide. The word is also applied in this sense to a style of cutting a man's hair.

Road. All roads lead to Rome. All efforts of thought converge in a common centre. As, from the centre of the ancient world, roads radiated to every part of the Empire, so any road, if followed to its source, must lead to the great capital city, Rome.

Gentlemen of the road or knights of the road. Highwaymen.

In the mountain districts of North America a highwayman used to be called a road agent, and the term is still applied to bandits who hold up trains, motor-cars, etc.

On the road. Progressing towards; as, On the road to recovery; said also of actors when "on tour," and of commercial travellers.

Road hog. See HOG.

The rule of the road—

The rule of the road is a paradox quite,

In riding or driving along;

If you go to the left you are sure to go right,

If you go to the right you go wrong.

This is the rule in Great Britain, Austria, Hungary, Portugal, Sweden, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia; also in certain cities, e.g. Rome. In other European countries and in America traffic keeps to the right.

To take to the road. To turn highwayman or become a tramp.

Roadhouse. An inn, hotel, etc., by the roadside, usually at some distance outside a town, where parties can go out by car for meals, dancing, etc.

Roads or Roadstead, as "Yarmouth Roads," a place where ships can safely ride at anchor. Road, A.S. rad, comes from ridan, to ride.

Roan. A reddish-brown. This word used to be derived from Rouen, the town, because this was an Old French spelling of it (un cheval rouen); but there can be no connexion, as the Italian was rovano or roano, and its etymology is unknown. Rouen may have given its name to roan, the soft sheepskin leather.

Roan Barbary. The famous charger of Richard II, which ate from his royal hand.

Oh, how it yearned my heart when I beheld
In London streets, that coronation day,
When Bolingbroke rode on roan Barbary,
That horse that thou so often hast bestrid,
That horse that I so carefully have dressed,

Richard II, v, 5.

Roar. Roarer. A broken-winded horse is so called from the noise it makes in breathing.

He drives a roaring trade. He does a great business.

Roaring boys. The riotous blades of Ben Jonson's time, whose delight it was to annoy quiet folk. At one time their pranks in London were carried to an alarming extent.

And bid them think on Jones amidst this glee,
In hope to get such roaring boys as he.

Legend of Captain Jones (1659)

Dekker and Middleton wrote a play (1611) on Moll Cutpurse (q.v.) which they called The Roaring Girl.

Roaring Meg. See MEG.

The Roaring Forties. See FORTY.

The roaring game. So the Scots call the game of curling.

Roast. To roast a person is to banter him unmercifully; also, to give him a dressing-down. Shakespeare, in Hamlet, speaks of roasting "in wrath and fire."

To rule the roast. To have the chief direction; to be paramount.

The phrase was common in the 15th century, and it is possible that roast was originally roost, the reference being to a cock, who decides which hen is to roost nearest to him; but it is unlikely; in Thomas Heywood's History of Women (about 1630) we read of "her that ruled the roast in the kitchen."

John, Duke of Burgoyne, ruled the roast, and governed both King Charles . . . and his whole realm.

—HALL: Union (1548).

Ah, I do domineer, and rule the roast.

CHAPMAN: Gentleman Usher, V, i (1606).

Geate you nowe up into your pulpitte like bragginge cocks on the rowst, flappe your winges and crowe out aloude.—Bp. JEWELL (d. 1571).

Rob. To rob Peter to pay Paul. To take away from one person in order to give to another; or merely to shift a debt—to pay it off by incurring another one. Fable has it that the phrase alludes to the fact that on December 17th, 1550, the abbey church of St. Peter, Westminster, was advanced to the dignity of a cathedral by letters patent; but ten years later it was joined to the diocese of London again, and many of its estates appropriated to the repairs of St. Paul's Cathedral. But it was a common saying long before this date, and had been used by Wyclif about 1380:—

How should God approve that you rob Peter, and give this robbery to Paul in the name of Christ?—Select Works, III, 174.

The hint of the President, Viglius, to the Duke of Alva when he was seeking to impose ruinous taxation in the Netherlands (1569) was that—it was not desirable to rob St. Peter's altar in order to build one to St. Paul.

Rob Roy (Robert the Red). A nickname given to Robert M'Gregor (1671-1734), a noted Scottish outlaw and freebooter, on account of his red hair. He assumed the name of Campbell about 1716, and was protected by the Duke of Argyle. He may be termed the Robin Hood of Scotland.

Rather beneath the middle size than above it, his limbs were formed upon the very strongest model that is consistent with agility. . . . Two points in his person interfered with the rules of symmetry; his shoulders were so broad . . . as to give him the air of being too square in respect to his stature; and his arms, though round, sinewy, and strong, were so very long as to be rather a deformity.—SCOTT: Rob Roy, ch. xxiii.

Robert. The personal name is sometimes applied to the "man in blue," the policeman. The allusion is to Sir Robert Peel—cp. PEELER, and BOBBY.

Highwaymen and bandits are called Robert's men from Robin Hood.

King Robert of Sicily. A metrical romance taken from the Story of the Emperor Jovinian in the Gesta Romanorum, and borrowed from the Talmud. It finds a place in the Arabian Nights, the Turkish Tutinameh, the Sanskrit Panchatantra, and has been réchauffé by Longfellow.

Robert the Devil or Le Diable. Robert, third Duke of Normandy (1028-35), father of William the Conqueror. He supported the English athelings against Canute, and made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem; many legends grew up around him, and he got his name for his daring and cruelty. The Norman tradition is that his wandering ghost will not be allowed to rest till the Day of Judgment. He is also called Robert the Magnificent.

Meyerbeer's opera Roberto il Diavolo (1831) is founded on this story. The duke is depicted as a libertine, and the opera shows the struggle in Robert between the virtue inherited from his mother, and the vice imparted by his father.

Robert François Damiens (1715-57), who attempted to assassinate Louis XV, was also called "Robert le Diable."

Robin. A diminutive of Robert.

Robin Goodfellow. A "drudging fiend," and merry domestic fairy, famous for mischievous pranks and practical jokes; also known as "Puck," the son of Oberon, and the fairies' jester. The story is that at night-time he will sometimes do little services for the family over which he presides. The Scots call this domestic spirit a brownie; the Germans, Kobold or Knecht Ruprecht. The Scandinavians called it Nisse God-dreng.

Either I mistake your shape and making quite,
Or else you are that shrewd and knavish sprite
Called Robin Goodfellow. . . .

Those that Hob-goblin call you, and sweet Puck,
You do their work, and they shall have good luck.
Midsummer Night's Dream, ii, 1.

Robin Gray, Auld. Words by Lady Anne Lindsay, daughter of the Earl of Balcarres, and afterwards Lady Barnard, in 1772, written to an old Scotch tune called "The bridegroom grat when the sun gaed down." Auld Robin Gray was the herdsman of her father. When Lady Anne had written a part, she called her younger sister for advice. She said, "I am writing a ballad of virtuous distress in humble life. I have oppressed my heroine with sundry troubles: for example, I have sent her Jamie to sea, broken her father's arm, made her mother sick, given her Auld Robin Gray for a lover, and want a fifth sorrow; can you help me to one?" "Steal the cow, sister Anne," said the little Elizabeth; so the cow was stolen awa', and the song completed.

Lady Anne later wrote a sequel in which Auld Robin Gray was good enough to die, whereupon Jeannie married Jamie.

Robin Hood. This traditionary outlaw and hero of English ballads is mentioned by the Scottish historian Fordun, who died about 1386, and also by Langland in the Vision of Piers Plowman, Bk. v, 402 (q.v.), but which of these is the earlier is uncertain. It is doubtful whether he ever lived—the truth probably being that the stories associated with his name crystallized gradually round the personality of some popular local hero of the early 13th century—but the legends are that he was born in 1160 at Locksley, Notts, or, alternatively, that he was the outlawed Earl of Huntingdon, Robert Fitzooth, in disguise. Fitz- being omitted leaves Ooth, and converting th into d it became "Ood."

Another suggestion (Ten Brink) is that in the Robin Hood legends we have a late reminder of the old Scandinavian mythology of our ancestors. About the 12th century Woden was given the name "Robin" (the Fr. form of Ruprecht, corresponding to Henoderahnt), and the tales of outlawry may be a later form of the legend of the Wild Huntsman, connected with Woden.

According to Stow, he was an outlaw in the reign of Richard I (12th century). He entertained one hundred tall men, all good archers, with the spoil he took, but "he suffered no woman to be oppressed, violated, or otherwise molested; poore men's goods he spared, abundantlie relieving them with that which by theft he got from abbeyes and houses of rich earles."

Robin Hood's companions in Sherwood Forest and Barnsdale, Yorks, were Little John, Friar Tuck, Will Scarlet, Allen-a-dale, George-a-Greene, and Maid Marion. According to one tradition, Robin Hood and Little John were two heroes defeated with Simon de Montfort at the battle of Evesham, in 1265. Fuller, in his Worthies, considers the outlaw an historical character, but Thierry says he simply represents the remnant of the old Saxon race, which lived in perpetual defiance of the Norman oppressors from the time of Hereward.

The traditions about Fulk FitzWarine, great-grandson of Warine of Metz, so greatly resemble those connected with "Robin Hood," that some suppose them to be both one. FitzWarine quarrelled with John, and when John was king he banished Fulk, who became a bold forester.

The first published collection of ballads about the hero was the Lytel Geste of Robin Hood, printed by Wynkyn de Worde about 1490.

The stories about him formed the basis of early dramatic representations and were later amalgamated with the morris dances (q.v.) and May-day revels.

A Robin Hood wind. A cold thaw-wind. Tradition runs that Robin Hood used to say he could bear any cold except that which a thaw-wind brought with it.

Bow and arrow of Robin Hood. The traditional bow and arrow of Robin Hood are religiously preserved at Kirklees Hall, Yorkshire, the seat of Sir George Armytage; and the site of his grave is pointed out in the park.

Death of Robin Hood. He was bled to death treacherously by a nun, instigated to the foul deed by his kinsman, the prior of Kirklees, near Halifax.

Epitaph of Robin Hood.

Hear, underneath his latil stean,
Laiz Robert earl of Huntington;
Nea arcir ver az hie sae geud,
An pipl kauld him Robin Heud.
Sich utlaz az he an hiz men
VII England nivr si agen.

Obit. 24, Kalend Dikembris, 1247.

Notwithstanding this epitaph other traditions assert that Robin Hood lived into the reign of Edward III, and died in 1325. One of the ballads relates how Robin Hood took service under Edward II.

Many talk of Robin Hood who never shot with his bow. Many brag of deeds in which they took no part. Many talk of Robin Hood, and wish their hearers to suppose they took part in his adventures, but they never put a shaft to one of his bows; nor could they have bent it even if they had tried.

They cry out with an open mouth, as if they out-shot Robin Hood, that Plato banished them (i.e., the Poets) out of his Commonwealth.—SIDNEY: Apologie for Poetrie.

Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne. Robin Hood and Little John, having had a tiff, part company, when Little John falls into the hands of the sheriff of Nottingham, who binds him to a tree. Meanwhile, Robin Hood meets with Guy of Gisborne, sworn to slay the "bold forester." The two bowmen struggle together, but Guy is slain, and Robin Hood rides till he comes to the tree where Little John is bound. The Sheriff mistakes him for Guy of Gisborne, and gives him charge of the prisoner. Robin cuts the cord, hands Guy's bow to Little John, and the two soon put to flight the sheriff and his men. (Percy: Reliques.)

Robin Hood's larder. See OAK.

To go round Robin Hood's barn. To arrive at the right conclusion by very roundabout methods.

To sell Robin Hood's pennyworth is to sell things at half their value. As Robin Hood stole his wares, he sold them, under their intrinsic value, for just what he could get.

Robin Redbreast. The tradition is that when our Lord was on His way to Calvary, a robin picked a thorn out of His crown, and the blood which issued from the wound falling on the bird dyed its breast with red.

Another fable is that the robin covers dead bodies with leaves; this is referred to in Webster's White Devil, v, 1 (1612):—

Call for the robin-red-breast and the wren,
Since o'er shady groves they hover,
And with leaves and flowers do cover
The friendless bodies of unburied men.

And in the ballad The Babes in the Wood—

No burial this pretty pair
From any man receives,
Till Robin Redbreast piously
Did cover them with leaves.

Cp. RUDDOCK.

Robin Redbreasts. Bow Street runners were so called from their red waistcoats.

A round robin. See ROUND.

Robin and Makyne. An ancient Scottish pastoral. Robin is a shepherd for whom Makyne sighs. She goes to him and tells her love, but Robin turns a deaf ear, and the damsel goes home to weep. After a time the tables are turned, and Robin goes to Makyne to plead for her heart and hand; but the damsel replies—

The man that will not when he may
Sall have nocht when he wald.

PERCY: Reliques, etc., series ii.

Robinson Crusoe. Defoe's novel (1719) is founded on the adventures of Alexander Selkirk (1676-1723), a buccaneer who, at his own request, was marooned, in 1704, on the uninhabited island of Juan Fernandez, off the coast of Chile. He remained there for over four years, being finally rescued by Captain Woodes Rogers in 1709.

Though Robinson Crusoe's adventures are based on those of Selkirk, whom it is unlikely that Defoe ever met, the actual island he describes was not Juan Fernandez but more probably Tobago, from the mention of Trinidad in the distance, and the descriptions of tropical plants. Defoe himself had never been to the West Indies.

Robot (rō' bot). An automaton with semi-human powers and intelligence. From this the term is often extended to mean a person who works automatically without employing initiative. The name comes from the mechanical creatures in Karel Capek's play R.U.R. (Rossum's Universal Robots) which was successfully produced in London in 1923.

Robot Bomb, or Pilotless Plane, is the official name of the "Flying Bombs," "Buzz Bombs," or "Doodlebugs" launched against England by the Germans in June 1944. They were officially known in Germany as V1, or Vergeltungswaffe Ein (Reprisal Weapon No. 1).

Roc (rok). A fabulous white bird of enormous size, and such strength that it can "truss elephants in its talons," and carry them to its mountain nest, where it devours them. (Arabian Nights; The Third Calender, and Sinbad the Sailor.)

Roche, or Roque, St. (rosh, rok). Patron of those afflicted with the plague, because "he worked miracles on the plague-stricken, while he was himself smitten with the same judgment." He is depicted in a pilgrim's habit, lifting his dress to display a plague-spot on his thigh, which an angel is touching that he may cure it. Sometimes he is accompanied by a dog bringing bread in his mouth, in allusion to the legend that a hound brought him bread daily while he was perishing of pestilence in a forest.

His feast day, August 16th, was formerly celebrated in England as a general harvest-home, and styled "the great August festival."

St. Roch et son chien. Inseparables, Darby and Joan.

Roche (rōsh). Sir Boyle Roche's bird. Sir Boyle Roche (1743-1807) was an Irish M.P., noted for his "bulls." On one occasion in the House, quoting from Jefferies's play, The Devil of a Wife, he said, "Mr. Speaker, it is impossible I could have been in two places at once, unless I were a bird."

You may make a remark on the ubiquitous nature of certain cards, which, like Sir Boyle Roche's bird, are in two places at once.—Drawing-room Magic.

Rochelle Salt. A tartrate of sodium or potassium, so called because it was discovered by an apothecary of Rochelle, named Seignette, in 1672. In France it is called sel de Seignette or sel des tombeaux.

Rochester, according to Bede, derives its name from "Hrof," a Saxon chieftain. (Hrofsceaster, Hrof's castle.)

Rock. "The Rock," par excellence, is Gibraltar (cp. ROCK ENGLISH, below). As applied to pigeons—as in Plymouth rock and blue rock—the word is short for rock-dove or rock-pigeon. "The Rock of Ages" (see below) is used of Jesus Christ as the unshakable and eternal foundation.

In U.S.A. thieves' slang a rock is a diamond or other precious stone.

In the sense of swinging backwards and forwards to rock is a term in jazz music meaning to work up an exciting rhythm.

A house built upon a rock. Typical of a person or a thing whose foundations are sure. The allusion is to Matt. vii, 24.

Captain Rock. A fictitious name assumed by the leader of the Irish insurgents in 1822.

On the rocks. "Stony broke," having no money; a phrase from seafaring; a ship that is on the rocks will very quickly go to pieces unless she can be got off.

People of the Rock. The inhabitants of Hejaz or Arabia Petræa.

Rock Day. The day after Twelfth-day, when, the Christmas holidays being over, women returned to their distaff, an old name for which was rock; the day is also called "St. Distaff's Day." Cp. POUGH MONDAY.

Rock English. The mixed patois of Spanish and English spoken by natives at Gibraltar—Rock Lizards. Similarly, Malta or Mediterranean fever, which is common at Gibraltar, is also called Rock fever.

Rock of Ages cleft for me. It is said that this well-known hymn was written by Augustus Montague Toplady (1740-78) while seated by a great cleft rock near Cheddar, Somerset. Another story, which may belong to the realm of fable, has it that the first verse was written on the ten of diamonds in the interval between two rubbers of whist at Bath. Hence a Toplady ring is a ring set with ten stones in the form of the pips on a ten of diamonds. The phrase itself, as applied to Christ, is considerably older, and is traced to the marginal note to Is. xxvi, 4, where the words "everlasting strength" are stated to be, in the Hebrew, "Rock of Ages." In one of his hymns Wesley had written (1788)—

Hell in vain against us rages;
Can it shock
Christ the Rock
Of eternal Ages?

Praise by all to Christ is given.

Southey also has—

These waters are the Well of Life, and lo!
The Rock of Ages there, from whence they flow.
Pilgrimage to Waterloo, Pt. II, ca. III.

That is the rock you'll split on. That is the danger, or the more or less hidden obstruction. Another seafaring phrase; there are rocks ahead in the path of the ship, and the helmsman must exercise the greatest caution.

The Ladies' Rock. A crag under the castle rock of Stirling, where ladies used to witness tournaments.

Rocking Stones. See LOGAN STONES.

Rockefeller Foundation (rok' e fel' er). This was established by John D. Rockefeller (1839-1937) in order "to promote the welfare of mankind throughout the world." From its grants have been made to educational and other societies, including the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and London. The capital is over £32,000,000. The Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research was founded in New York City in 1901. John D. Rockefeller built and endowed the buildings at a cost of £800,000.

Rockefeller Center is a collection of 14 separate buildings covering almost 12 acres in New York City. Radio City occupies 5 buildings in one section, and the whole Center, grouped round a 70-storey skyscraper, has a daily population of some 151,000. It was completed in 1940.

Rocket, To give someone a. To reprimand severely. An expression much used by the British in World War II.

Rococo (rô kô' kô). An 18th-century European decorative style, characterized by motifs taken from shells (rocaille). It is seen at its best in the furniture and architecture of France during the reign of Louis XV.

Rod. A rod in pickle. A scolding or punishment in store. Birch-rods used to be laid in brine to keep the twigs pliable.

Spare the rod and spoil the child. An old saying drawing attention to the folly of allowing childish faults to go unproved; founded on Prov. xiii, 24, "He that spareth his rod hateth his child: but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes."

Love is a boy, by poets styled,

Then spare the rod, and spoil the child.

BUTLER: Hudibras, II, i, 842.

To kiss the rod. To submit to punishment or misfortune meekly and without murmuring.

Rodeo (rô' de ô, or rô dâ' ô). A public exhibition of horsemanship, cattle rounding-up, etc., by cowboys.

Roderick or Rodrigo. A Spanish hero round whom many legends have collected. He was the thirty-fourth and last of the Visigothic kings, came to the throne in 710, and was routed, and probably slain, by the Moors under Tarik in 711. Southey took him as the hero of his Roderick, the last of the Goths (1814), where he appears as the son of Theodored, and grandson of King Chindasuintho. Witiza, the usurper, put out the eyes of Theodored, and murdered Favila, a younger brother of Roderick; but Roderick, having recovered his father's throne, put out the eyes of the usurper. The sons of Witiza, joining with Count Julian, invited the aid of Muza ibn Nozeir, the Arab chief, who sent Tarik into Spain with a large army. Roderick was routed at the battle of Guadalete, near Xeres de la Frontera (711); he himself disappeared from the battlefield, and the Spaniards transformed him into a hero who would come again to save his country. One legend relates that he was befriended by a shepherd who was rewarded with the royal chain and ring. Roderick passed the night in the cell of a hermit, who told him that by way of penance he must pass certain days in a tomb full of snakes, toads, and lizards. After three days the hermit went to see him, and he was unhurt, "because the Lord kept His anger against him." The hermit went home, passed the night in prayer, and went again to the tomb, when Rodrigo said, "They eat me now, they eat me now, I feel the adder's bite." So his sin was atoned for, and he died.

Roderigo (rod e ré' gô). A Venetian gentleman in Shakespeare's Othello. He was in love with Desdemona, and when the lady eloped with Othello, hated the "noble Moor." Iago took advantage of this temper for his own ends, told his dupe the Moor would change; therefore "put money in thy purse." The burden of his advice was always the same—"Put money in thy purse."

Rodomontade. Bluster, brag, or a blustering and bragging speech; from Rodomont, the brave but braggart leader of the Saracens in Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato.

Rodrigo. See RODERICK.

Roe, Richard. See DOE.

Rogation Days. The Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday before Ascension Day. Rogation is the Latin equivalent of the Greek word "Litany," and on the three Rogation days "the Litany of the Saints" is appointed to be sung by the clergy and people in public procession. ("Litany," Gr. litaneia, supplication. "Rogation," Lat. rogatio, same meaning.)

The Rogation Days used to be called Gang Days, from the custom of ganging round the country parishes to beat the bounds (see BOUNDS) at this time. Similarly, the weed milkwort is still called Rogation or Gangflower, from the custom of decorating the pole (carried on such occasions by the charity children) with these flowers.

Roger. The cook in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. "He cowde roste, sethe, broille, and frie, make mortreux, and wel bake a pye;" but Harry Bailly, the host, said to him—

Now telle on Roger, and loke it be good;

For many a Jakk of Dpyer hastow sold,
That hath be twyës hoot and twyës cold.

Prologue to Cook's Tale.

In World War II Roger was a simple code word of American origin used in wireless conversations to denote "message understood." Like many war terms it passed for a time into civilian speech.

Sir Roger de Coverley. The simple, good, and altogether delightful country squire created by Steele as the chief character in the club that was supposed to write for the Spectator. He was developed by Addison, and it is to the latter that we are indebted for this portrait of a simple English gentleman. He has left his name to a popular country dance which, he tells us, was invented by his great-grandfather. Coverley is intended for Cowley, near Oxford.

The Jolly Roger. The black flag with skull and cross-bones, the favourite ensign of pirates.

Rogero, Ruggiero, or Rizieri (ro jër' ô, ruj ër' o, ritz i ër' i) of Risa (in Orlando Furioso), was brother of Marphisa, and son of Rogero and Galacella. His mother was slain by Agolant and his sons, and he was nursed by a lioness. He was brought up by Atlantes, a magician, who gave him a shield of such dazzling splendour that everyone quailed who set eyes on it, but, holding it unknighly to carry a charmed shield, he threw it into a well. He deserted from the Moorish army to Charlemagne, and was baptized, and his marriage with Bradamant, Charlemagne's niece, and election to the crown of Bulgaria conclude the poem.

Who more courteous than Rogero?

CERVANTES: Don Quixote.

In Jerusalem Delivered Rogero is brother of Beomond, and son of Roberto Guiscardo, of the Norman race. He was one of the band of adventurers in the crusading army, and was slain by Tisaphernes (Bk. xx).

Rogue. One of the "canting" words used first in the 16th century to describe sturdy beggars and vagrants (perhaps from some outstanding member of the class named Roger). There is a good description of them in Harman's Caveat for Common Cursitors vulgarly called Vagabones, ch. iv. The expression rogues and vagabonds has since 1572 been applied in the Vagrancy Acts to all sorts of wandering, disorderly, or dissolute persons.

It is Ordered and Ordained by the Lords and Commons in this present Parliament assembled and by Authority of the same, That all Stage-players and Players of Interludes and Common Plays are hereby declared to be, and are and shall be taken to be Rogues and punishable within the Statutes of the Thirty ninth year of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth and the seventh year of the Reign of King James . . . whether they be wanderers or no.—Ordinance for Suppression of all Stage-Plays and Interludes, Feb. 11th, 1647.

Rogue in grain. See GRAIN.

Rogue elephant. A savage and destructive elephant that lives apart from the herd, always vicious and dangerous.

Rogue's badge. A race-horse or a hunter that becomes obstinate and refuses to do its work is known as a rogue, and the blinkers that it is made to wear are the rogue's badge.

Rogues' gallery. The collection of portraits of criminals kept by the police.

Rogues' Latin. The same as "thieves' Latin." See LATIN.

Rogues' March. The tune played when an undesirable soldier is drummed out of his regiment; hence, an ignominious dismissal.

Roi Panade (King of Slops). Louis XVIII was so nicknamed (1755, 1814-24).

Roland or (in Ital.) Orlando. The most famous of Charlemagne's paladins, slain at the battle of Roncesvalles (778), called "The Christian Theseus" and "the Achilles of the West." He was Count of Mans and Knight of Blaives, and son of Duke Milo of Aiglant, his mother being Bertha, the sister of Charlemagne. Fable has it that he was eight feet high, and had an open countenance, which invited confidence, but inspired respect; and he is represented as brave, loyal, and simple-minded. On the return of Charlemagne from Spain Roland, who commanded the rearguard, fell into the ambushade at Roncesvalles, in the Pyrenees, and perished with all the flower of the Frankish chivalry.

His achievements are recorded in the Chronicle attributed to Turpin (d. 794), Archbishop of Rheims, which was not written till the 11th or 12th century, and he is the hero of the Song of Roland (see below), Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato, and Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. In Pulci's Morgante Maggiore he is also a principal character, and converts the giant Morgante to Christianity.

In Orlando Furioso (i.e. "Orlando mad"), although married to Aldabella he fell in love with Angelica, daughter of the infidel king of Cathay; she married Medoro, a Moor, with whom she fled to India, whereupon Orlando went mad, or rather his wits were taken from him for three months by way of punishment, and deposited in the moon. Astolpho went to the moon in Elijah's chariot, and St. John gave him an urn containing the lost wits. On reaching earth again, Astolpho first bound the madman, then, holding the urn to his nose, Orlando was cured of both his madness and his love.

A Roland for an Oliver. A blow for a blow, tit for tat. The exploits of Roland and Oliver, another of the paladins of Charlemagne, are so similar that it is difficult to keep them distinct. What Roland did Oliver did, and what Oliver did Roland did. At length the two met in single combat, and fought for five consecutive days on an island in the Rhine, but neither gained the least advantage. Shakespeare alludes to the phrase: "England all Oliver's and Rolands bred" (1 Henry VI, i, 2); and Edward Hall, the historian, almost a century before Shakespeare, writes:—

But to have a Roland to resist an Oliver, he sent solempne ambassadors to the King of Engleterre, offering hym hys doughter in mariage.—Henry VI.

Childe Roland. Youngest brother of the "fair burd Helen" in the old Scottish ballad. Guided by Merlin, he undertook to bring his sister from Elf-land, whither the fairies had carried her, and succeeded in his perilous exploit.

Childe Roland to the dark tower came;
His word was still "Fie, foh, and fum,
I smell the blood of a Britishman."

King Lear, iii, 4.

Browning's poem, Child Roland to the Dark Tower Came, is not connected in any way (except by the first line) with the old ballad.

Like the blast of Roland's horn. Roland had a wonderful ivory horn, named "Olivant," that he won from the giant Jutmundus. When he was set upon by the Gascons at Roncevalles he sounded it to give Charlemagne notice of his danger. At the third blast it cracked in two, but it was so loud that birds fell dead and the whole Saracen army was panic-struck. Charlemagne heard the sound at St. Jean Pied de Port, and rushed to the rescue, but arrived too late.

Oh, for one blast of that dread horn
On Fontarabian echoes borne,
That to King Charles did come.

SCOTT: Marmion, vi, 33.

Roland's sword. Durindana, or Durandal, which was fabled to have once belonged to Hector, and which—like the horn—Roland won from the giant Jutmundus. It had in its hilt a thread from the Virgin Mary's cloak, a tooth of St. Peter, one of St. Denis's hairs, and a drop of St. Basil's blood. Legend relates that, to prevent Durandal falling into the hands of the Saracens, after he had received his death-wound he strove to break it on a rock; but as it was unbreakable he hurled it into a poisoned stream, where it remains for ever.

The Song (Chanson) of Roland. The 11th-century chanson de geste ascribed to the Norman trouvère Théroutel, or Turolus, which tells the story of the death of Roland and all the paladins at Roncevalles, and of Charlemagne's vengeance. When Charlemagne had been six years in Spain he sent Ganelon on an embassy to Marsillus, the pagan king of Saragossa. Ganelon, out of jealousy, betrayed to Marsillus the route which the Christian army designed to take on its way home, and the pagan king arrived at Roncevalles just as Roland was conducting through the pass a rear-guard of 20,000 men; he fought till 100,000 Saracens lay slain, and only 50 of his own men survived. At this juncture another army, consisting of 50,000 men, poured from the mountains. Roland now blew his enchanted horn, and blew so loudly that the veins of his neck started. Charlemagne heard the blast, but Ganelon persuaded him that it was only his nephew hunting the deer. Roland died of his wounds.

The Song runs to 4,000 lines, and it was probably parts of this—that as we are told by Wace in the Roman de Rou—the Norman minstrel sang to encourage William's soldiers at the battle of Hastings:—

Taillefer, the minstrel-knight, bestrode
A gallant steed, and swiftly rode
Before the Duke, and sang the song
Of Charlemagne, of Roland strong,
Of Oliver, and those beside Brave knights at Roncevaux that died.

Arthur S. Way's rendering.

To die like Roland. To die of starvation or thirst. One legend has it that Roland escaped the general slaughter in the defile of Roncevalles, and died of hunger and thirst in seeking to cross the Pyrenees. He was buried at Bayes, in the church of St. Raymond; but his body was removed afterwards to Roncevalles.

Rolandseck Tower, opposite the Drachenfels on the Rhine, 22 miles above Cologne. The legend is that when Roland went to the wars, a false report of his death was brought to his betrothed, who retired to a convent in the isle of Nonnewerth. When he returned home flushed with glory, and found that his lady-love had taken the veil, he built the castle which bears his name, and overlooks the nunnery, that he might at least see his heart-treasure, lost to him for ever.

Roll. The flying roll of Zechariah (v, 1-5). "Predictions of evils to come on a nation are like the flying roll of Zechariah." This roll (twenty cubits long and ten wide) was full of maledictions, threats, and calamities about to befall the Jews. The parchment being unrolled fluttered in the air.

A rolling stone. See STONE.

Rolling stock. All the wheeled equipment of a railway that is fitted to run on rails; the locomotives, passenger coaches, vans, goods trucks, etc.

Roller-Coaster. An open-air railway set in pleasure grounds, etc., running up and down steep inclines; an improvement on the old-fashioned switchback railway.

Rolls, The. The former building in Chancery Lane where the records in the custody of the Master of the Rolls were kept; now replaced by the Public Record Office. It included a court of justice and a chapel, and was originally built by Henry III as a Domus Conversorum (house for lay monks) for converted Jews. In the time of Edward III it was devoted to the purpose of storing records.

The Master of the Rolls. The head of the Public Record Office, an ex-officio Judge of the Court of Appeal and a member of the Judicial Committee, ranking next after the Lord Chief Justice. His jurisdiction was formerly exercised in Chancery as the deputy of the Lord Chancellor, and he also sat independently in the Rolls Chapel.

To be struck off the rolls. To be removed from the official list of qualified solicitors, and so prohibited from practising. This is done in cases of professional misconduct.

Rollrich or Rowldrich Stones (röl' rich), near Chipping Norton (Oxfordshire). A number of large stones in a circle, which tradition says are men turned to stone. The highest of them is called the King, who "would have been king of England if he could have caught sight of Long Compton," which may be seen a few steps farther on; five other large stones are called the knights, and the rest common soldiers.

Roly-poly. A crust with jam rolled up into a pudding; a little fat child. Roly is a thing rolled with the diminutive added. In some parts of Scotland the game of ninepins is called rouly pouly.

Romaic. Modern or Romanized Greek.

Roman. Pertaining to Rome, especially ancient Rome, or to the Roman Catholic Church. As a surname or distinctive title the adjective has been applied to Giulio Pippi, Giulio Romano (1492-1546), the Italian artist.

Adrian van Roomen (1581-1615), the famous mathematician, Adrianus Romanus.

Stephen Picart (1631-1721), the French engraver, le Romain.

Jean Dumont (1700-81), the French painter, le Romain.

Marcus Terentius Varro (116-27 B.C.) was called the Most Learned of the Romans, and Rienzi (1313-54), the Italian patriot and "last of the Tribunes," was known as Ultimus Romanorum, the Last of the Romans—an honorific title later applied to Horace Walpole, Charles James Fox, and others.

King of the Romans. The title usually assumed by the sovereign of the Holy Roman Empire previous to his actual coronation in the Holy City. Napoleon's son, afterwards the Duke of Reichstadt, was styled the King of Rome at his birth in 1811.

Roman architecture. A style of architecture, distinguished by its massive character and abundance of ornament, which combines the Greek orders with the use of the arch. It is largely a corruption of the Doric and Ionic.

Roman birds. Eagles; so called because the ensign of the Roman legion was an eagle.

Roman figures. See NUMERALS.

Roman roads in Britain. See ERMINE, FOSSE, ICKNIELD, WATLING.

ROBERT OF GLOUCESTER.

The most remarkable of the numerous Roman remains in England are probably—

The pharos, church, and trenches in Dover,

Chilham Castle, Richborough, and Reculver forts; the amphitheatres at Silchester (Berkshire), Dorchester, Nisconium (Salop), and Caerleon; Hadrian's wall (q.v.); the wall, baths, and Newport Gate of Lincoln; the earthworks at Verulam, near St. Albans; York (Eboracum), where Severus and Constantius Chlorus died, and Constantine the Great was born; and the ancient parts of Bath.

Roman type. Ordinary type, as distinguished from italic, clarendon, gothic or "black letter," etc.; so called because founded on that used in ancient Roman inscriptions and manuscripts.

The Holy Roman Empire. See HOLY.

The Last of the Romans. See above, also LAST.

The Roman Empire. The Empire established on the ruins of the Republic by Augustus in 27 B.C., and lasting till A.D. 395, when it was divided into the Western or Latin Empire, and the Eastern or Greek.

The Roman Empire was a power, and not a nation. . . . The name Roman, in the use of Procopius, when it does not refer geographically to the elder Rome means any man, of whatever race, who is a subject of the Roman Empire or who serves in the Roman armies. His nationality may not be only Greek, Macedonian, or Thracian, but Gothic, Persian, or Hunnish.—FREEMAN: Historical Essays, III, 246.

The Roman Republic was established about 509 B.C. after the overthrow of the last of the seven kings, Tarquinius Superbus, and survived till it was superseded in 27 B.C. by the Empire.

For a few months in 1848-49, after the flight of Pius IX, the people of Rome declared themselves a republic under the triumvirate of Mazzini, Saffi, and Armellini. It is one of the ironies of history that this Roman Republic was destroyed by the army of Republican France.

Roman de la Rose. See ROSE, ROMANCE OF THE.

Romance. Applied in linguistics to the languages, especially Old French, sprung from the Latin spoken in the European province of the Roman Empire; hence, as a noun, the word came to mean a mediæval tale in Old French or Provencal describing, usually in mixed prose and verse, the marvellous adventures of a hero of chivalry; the transition to the modern meanings—a work of fiction in which the scenes, incidents, etc., are more or less removed from common life and are surrounded by a halo of mystery—or the atmosphere of strangeness and imaginary adventure itself—is simple.

The mediæval romances fall into three main groups or cycles, viz., the Arthurian, the Charlemagne cycle, and the cycle of Alexander the Great. Nearly, but not quite, all the romances are connected with one or other of these.

Romance languages. Those languages which are the immediate offspring of Latin, as the Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, and French. Early French is emphatically so called; hence Bouillet says, "Le romain était universellement parlé en Gaule au dixième siècle."

Frankish speech is called Romance,
So say clerks and men of France.

ROBERT LE BRUN.

Romanesque (rō mán esk'). A simple and severe style of European architecture which preceded the Gothic; in England it was approximately synonymous with the Norman. The name comes from the fact that the style was the Christian adaptation of, or evolution from Roman architecture. It has two main characteristics—the use of the rounded as opposed to the pointed arch; and great strength, used as a safety measure to overcome an ignorance of stresses which were finally mastered by Gothic architects.

Romantic Revival, The. The literary movement that began in Germany in the last quarter of the 18th century having for its object a return from the Augustan or classical formalism of the time to the freer fancies and methods of romance. It was led by Schiller, Goethe, Novalis, and Tieck; spread to England, where it affected the work of Collins and Gray and received an impetus from the publication of Percy's Reliques and Macpherson's Ossian; and, immensely stimulated by the French Revolution, effected a transformation of English literature through the writings of Keats, Byron, Wordsworth, Shelley, Coleridge, Scott, etc. In France its chief exponents were Chénier, Lamartine, de Musset, and Victor Hugo.

Romany. A gipsy; or the gipsy language, the speech of the Roma or Zingali. The word is from Gipsy rom, a man, or husband.

A learned Slavonian . . . said of Rommany, that he found it interesting to be able to study a Hindu dialect in the heart of Europe.—LELAND: English Gipsies, ch. viii.

Romany rye. One who enters into the gipsy spirit, learns their language, lives with them as one of themselves, etc. Rye is gipsy for gentleman. George Borrow's book with this title (a sequel to Lavengro) was published in 1857.

Rome. The greatest city of the ancient world, according to legend founded (753 B.C.) by Romulus (q.v.) and named after him; but in all probability so called from Greek rhoma (strength), a suggestion confirmed by its other name Valentia, from valens (strong).

Oh, that all Rome had but one head, that I might strike it off at a blow! Caligula, the Roman emperor, is said to have uttered this sentiment.

Rome penny, Rome scot. The same as Peter's penny (q.v.).

Rome's best wealth is patriotism. So said Mettius Curtius, when he jumped into the chasm which the soothsayers gave out would never close till Rome threw therein "its best wealth."

Rome was not built in a day. Achievements of great pith and moment are not accomplished without patient perseverance and a considerable interval of time. It is an old saying, and is to be found in Heywood's Collection (1562).

'Tis ill sitting at Rome and striving with the Pope. Don't tread on a man's corns when you are living with him or are in close touch with him—especially if he's powerful.

When you go to Rome, do as Rome does. Conform to the manners and customs of those amongst whom you live; "Don't wear a brown hat in Friesland." St. Monica and her son St. Augustine said to St. Ambrose: "At Rome they fast on Saturday, but not so at Milan; which practice ought to be observed?" To which St. Ambrose replied, "When I am at Milan, I do as they do at Milan; but when I go to Rome, I do as Rome does!" (Epistle xxxvi). Cp. 2 Kings v, 18.

The saying is to be found in that great storehouse of proverbs, Porter's Two Angry Women of Abingdon (1599).

Romeo and Juliet (rō mē ō, joo' li et). Shakespeare's tragedy (first published 1597) is founded on the story of the lovers of Verona as told in Arthur Brooke's poem, The Tragical Historie of Romeus and Juliet, containing a rare example of love constancy; with the subtil counsels and practices of an old Fryer (1562), and a story in Painter's Palace of Pleasure (1576). Its earliest appearance in literature is in Masuccio's Novelle (Naples, 1476); next, as La Giulietta, by Luigi da Porta (1535); and then in Bandello's Novella (Lucca, 1554). It was the French translation of this latter by Pierre Belleforest that was followed by Brooke and Painter.

Girolamo della Corte's History of Verona to 1560 places the story in 1303, when a member of the Scala family (transformed by Shakespeare to Escalus) was ruling in Verona, and in Dante's Divina Commedia (about 1300-18) the Capulets and Montagues appear among the quarrelsome inhabitants of the town.

Romulus (rom'ūlūs). With his twin brother, Remus, the legendary and eponymous founder of Rome. They were sons of Mars and Rhea Silvia, who, because she was a vestal virgin, was condemned to death, while the sons were exposed. They were, however, suckled by a she-wolf, and eventually set about founding a city but quarrelled over the plans, and Remus was slain by his brother in anger. Romulus was later taken to the heavens by his father, Mars, in a fiery chariot, and was worshipped by the Romans under the name of Quirinus.

The Second Romulus. Camillus was so called because he saved Rome from the Gauls, 365 B.C.

The Third Romulus. Caius Marius, who saved Rome from the Teutons and Cimbri in 101 B.C.

We need no Romulus to account for Rome. We require no hypothetical person to account for a plain fact.

Roncesvalles (rons' val). A defile in the Pyrenees, famous for the disaster which here befell the rear of Charlemagne's army, on the return march from Saragossa (778). Ganelon betrayed Roland (q.v.) to Marsillus, king of the Saracens, and an ambuscade attacking the Franks killed every man of them, including Roland, Oliver, and all the paladins. See SONG OF ROLAND under ROLAND.

Roncesvalles is said to have left its name to rouncival peas, a large kind of garden pea. See ROUNCIVAL. In his Glossographia (1674) Blount has—

Rounceval Peas, a sort of great Peas, well known, and took name from Ronceval, a place at the foot of the Pyrenean Mountains from whence they first came to us.

But there is no confirmation of this.

Ronyon or Runnion (ron'yôn, rûn'yôn). A term of contempt to a woman. It is probably the French rogneux (scabby, mangy).

You hag, you baggage, you polecat, you ronyon! out, out!—Merry Wives of Windsor, iv, 2.
 "Aroint thee, witch!" the rump-fed ronyon cries.—Macbeth, i, 3.

Rood (connected with rod). The Cross of the Crucifixion; or a crucifix, especially the large one that was formerly set on the stone or timber rood-screen that divides the nave from the choir in churches. This is usually richly decorated with statues and carvings of saints, emblems, etc., and frequently is surmounted by a gallery called the rood-loft.

And then to see the rood-loft,
 Zo bravely zet with zaints.

PERCY: Ballad of Plain Truth, ii, 292.

By the rood; by the holy rood. Old expletives used by way of asseveration. When the Queen asks Hamlet if he has forgotten her, he answers, "No, by the rood, not so" (iii, 4).

Rood Day. Holy Rood Day (q.v.); September 14th (the Exaltation of the Cross), or May 3rd (the Invention of the Cross).

Roodselken. An old country name for vervain, or "the herb of the cross."

Hallowed by thou, vervain, as thou growest in the ground.

For in the Mount of Calvary thou wast found.
 Thou healedst Christ our Saviour, and staunchedst His bleeding wound;

In the name of Father, Son and Holy Ghost, I take thee from the ground.

FOLKARD: Plant Lore, p. 47.

Rook. A cheat. "To rook," to cheat; "to rook a pigeon," to fleece a greenhorn. Sometimes it simply means to win from another at a game of chance or skill.

Rook, the castle in chess, is through French and Spanish from Persian rukḥ, which is said to have meant a warrior.

Rookery. Any low, densely populated neighbourhood, especially one frequented by thieves and vagabonds. The allusion is to the way in which rooks build their nests clustered closely together. Colonies of seals, and places where seals or seabirds collect in the breeding season are also known as "rookeries."

Room. Your room is better than your company. Your absence is more to be wished than your presence. An old phrase; it occurs in Stanyhurst's Description of Ireland (1577), Greene's Quip for an Upstart Courtier (1592), etc.

Roost. A strong current or furious tide betwixt island groups, especially in the Orkneys and Shetlands.

To rule the roost. See ROAST.

Root. Root and branch. The whole of it without any exceptions or omissions; "lock, stock, and barrel." The Puritans of about 1640 who wanted to extirpate the episcopacy altogether were known as "Root-and-branch men," or "Rooters," and the term has since been applied to other political factions who are anxious to "go the whole hog."

To root (U.S.A.). To support a sporting team.

The root of the matter. Its true inwardness, its actual base and foundation. The phrase comes from Job xix, 28—

But ye should say, Why persecute we him, seeing the root of the matter is found in me?

To take or strike root. To become permanently or firmly established.

Rope. A taste of the rope's end. A flogging—especially among seamen.

Fought back to the ropes. Fought to the bitter end. A phrase from the prize-ring, the "ropes" forming the boundary of the "ring."

It is a battle that must be fought game, and right back to the ropes.—BOLDREWOOD: Robbery Under Arms, ch xxxiii.

Ropes of sand. See SAND.

She is on her high ropes. In a distant and haughty temper; "high and mighty." The allusion is to a rope-dancer, who looks down on the spectators.

The Rope-walk. Former barristers slang for an Old Bailey practice. Thus, "Gone into the rope-walk" means, he has taken up practice in the Old Bailey. The allusion is to the murder trials taking place there, a convicted murderer "getting the rope."

To come to the end of one's rope or tether. See TETHER.

To fight with a rope round one's neck. To fight with a certainty of losing your life unless you conquer.

You must send in a large force; . . . for, as he fights with a rope round his neck, he will struggle to the last.—KINGSTON: The Three Admirals, viii.

To give one rope enough. To permit a person to continue in wrongdoing till he reaps the consequences. "Give him rope enough and he'll hang himself" is a common saying of one addicted to evil courses.

To know the ropes. To be up to all the tricks and dodges; to know exactly what is the proper thing to do.

To rope one in. To get him to take part in some scheme, enterprise, etc. An expression from the western states of America, where horses and cattle are roped in with a lasso.

You carry a rope in your pocket (Fr.). Said of a person very lucky at cards, from the superstition that a bit of rope with which a man has been hanged, carried in the pocket, secures luck at cards.

Ropeable. In Australia a term now applied to a person who is in a bad temper. Originally it meant cattle so wild that they could be controlled only by roping.

Mistress Roper. A cant name given to the Marines by British sailors. The wit lies in the awkward way that marines handle the ship's ropes.

To marry Mistress Roper is to enlist in the Marines.

Ropey. A phrase widely used by the British armed forces in World War II to denote anything inferior or worn-out—synonymous, in this connexion, with "old-fashioned."

Roque, St. See ROCH.

Roquelaure (rōk' lōr). A cloak for men, reaching to the knees. It was worn in the 18th century, and is so named from Antoine-Gaston, Duke de Roquelaure (1656-1738), a Marshal of France.

"Your honour's roquelaure," replied the corporal, "has not once been had on since the night before your honour received your wound."—STERNE: Tristram Shandy; Story of Le Fevre.

Rory O'More. Slang for a door. See RHYMING SLANG.

Rosabelle. The favourite palfrey of Mary Queen of Scots.

Rosalia, or Rosalie, St. (rō zā' li a, roz' e lē). The patron saint of Palermo, in art depicted in a cave with a cross and skull, or else in the act of receiving a rosary or chaplet of roses from the Virgin. She lived in the 12th century, and is said to have been carried by angels to an inaccessible mountain, where she dwelt for many years in the cleft of a rock, a part of which she wore away with her knees in her devotions. A chapel has been built there, with a marble statue, to commemorate the event.

Rosalind (roz' à lind). The anagrammatic name under which Spenser introduces his early love, Rosa Daniel (sister of Samuel Daniel, the poet), into the Shepherd's Calendar, he himself figuring as "Colin Clout." She was the wife of John Florin, the lexicographer who is caricatured in Love's Labour's Lost as "Holofernes" (i.e. [Joh]an[es] Floreo).

In Shakespeare's As You Like It Rosalind is the daughter of the banished duke, brought up with Celia in the court of Frederick, the duke's brother, and usurper of his dominions. After sundry adventures, in the course of which she disguises herself as a youth and Celia as a peasant-girl, she obtains her father's consent to marry her lover, Orlando.

Rosamond, The Fair (roz' a münd). Higden, monk of Chester, writing about 1350, says: "She was the fayre daughter of Walter, Lord Clifford, concubine of Henry II, and poisoned by Queen Elianor, A.D. 1177. Henry made for her a house of wonderful working, so that no man or woman might come to her. This house was named Labryrinthus, and was wrought like unto a knot in a garden called a maze. But the queen came to her by a clue of thredde, and so dealt with her that she lived not long after. She was buried at Godstow, in an house of nunnes, with these verses upon her tombe:—
Hic jacet in tumba Rosa mundi, non Rosa munda;
Non redolet, sed olet, que redolere solet."

Here Rose the graced, not Rose the chaste, reposes;
The smell that rises is no smell of roses.

This "evidence," dating nearly 200 years after the supposed event, is all the substantiation we have for the popular legend about the labyrinth; and there is none for the stories that Rosamund Clifford was the mother of William Longsword and Geoffrey, Archbishop of York. A subterranean labyrinth in Blenheim Park, near Woodstock, is still pointed out as "Rosamund's Bower."

Jane Clifford was her name, as books aver

Fair Rosamund was but her nom de guerre.

DRYDEN: Epilogue to Henry II.

Rosary (rō' zār i). The bead-roll employed by Roman Catholics for keeping count of their repetitions of certain prayers; also, these prayers themselves. The rope of beads consists of three parts, each of which symbolizes five mysteries connected with Christ or His virgin mother. The word is said by some to be derived from the chaplet of beads, perfumed with roses, given by the Virgin to St. Dominic. (This cannot be correct, as it was in use A.D. 1100.) Others say the first chaplet of the kind was made of rosewood; others, again, maintain that it takes its name from the "Mystical Rose," one of the titles of the Virgin. The set is sometimes called "fifteens," from its containing 15 "doxologies," 15 "Our Fathers," and 10 times 15, or 150, "Hail Marys."

The "Devotion of the Rosary" takes different forms:—(1) the Greater Rosary, or recitation of the whole fifteen mysteries; (2) the Lesser Rosary, or recitation of one of the mysteries; and (3) the Living Rosary, or the recitation of the fifteen mysteries by fifteen different persons in combination.

Rosciad (ros' i ad). A satire by Charles Churchill, published in 1761; it canvasses the faults and merits of the metropolitan actors.

Roscius (ros' i us). A first-rate actor; so called from Quintus Roscius (d. about 62 B.C.), the Roman actor, unrivalled for his grace of action, melody of voice, conception of character, and delivery.

What scene of death hath Roscius now to act?
Henry VI, v. 6.

Another Roscius. So Camden terms Richard Burbage (d. 1619).

The British Roscius. Thomas Betterton (1635-1710), of whom Cibber says, "He alone was born to speak what only Shakespeare knew to write." The title was also accorded to Garrick.

The Roscius of France. Michel Boyron (1653-1729), generally called Baron.

The Young Roscius. William Henry West Betty (1791-1874). His first public appearance was in 1803 (as Oswyn, in Zara), and, after achieving astonishing success, he left the stage in 1824. It is said that in fifty-six nights he realized £34,000.

Rose. Mediæval legend asserts that the first roses appeared miraculously at Bethlehem as the result of the prayers of a "fayre Mayden" who had been falsely accused and was sentenced to death by burning. As Sir John Mandeville tells the tale (Travels, ch. vi), after her prayer she entered into the Fuyr; and anon was the Fuyr quenched and out; and the Brondes that weren brennyng, becomen red Roseres; and the Brondes that weren not kyndled, becomen white Roseres, fulle of Roses. And these weren the first Roseres and Roses, both white and rede, that evere any Man saughe. And thus was this Mayden saved be the Grace of God.

The Rose has been an emblem of England since the time of the Wars of the Roses (see below), when the Lancastrians adopted a red rose as their badge, and the Yorkists a white. When the parties were united in the person of Henry VII the united Tudor rose was taken as his device.

The Red Rose of Lancaster was, says Camden, the accepted badge of Edmund Plantagenet, second son of Henry III, and of the first Duke of Lancaster, surnamed Crouchback. It was also the cognizance of John of Gaunt, second Duke of Lancaster, in virtue of his wife, who was godchild of Edmund Crouchback, and his sole heir; and, in later times, of the Richmonds. Hence the rose in the mouth of one of the foxes which figure in the sign of the Holland Arms, Kensington. The daughter of the Duke of Richmond (Lady Caroline Lennox) ran away with Mr. Henry Fox, afterwards Baron Holland of Foxley; the Fox ran off with the Rose.

The White Rose was not first adopted by the Yorkists during the contest for the crown, as Shakespeare says. It was an hereditary cognizance of the House of York, and had been borne by them ever since the title was first created. It was adopted by the Jacobites as an emblem of the Pretender, because his adherents were obliged to abet him sub rosa (in secret). Cecily Nevill, wife of Richard, Duke of York, and mother of Edward IV and Richard III, was known as The White Rose of Raby. She was a daughter of Ralph, Earl of Westmoreland, and granddaughter of John of Gaunt, and was the youngest of twenty-one children.

In heraldry the Rose is also used as the mark of cadency for a seventh son.

In Christian symbolism the Rose, as being emblematic of a paragon or one without peer, is peculiarly appropriated to the Virgin Mary, one of whose titles is "The Mystical Rose." It is also the attribute of St. Dorothea, who carries roses in a basket; of St. Casilda, St. Elizabeth of Portugal, and St. Rose of Viterbo, who carry roses in either their hands or caps; of St. Therese of Lisieux, who scatters red roses; and of St. Rosalie, St. Angelus, St. Rose of Lima, St. Ascyllus, and St. Victoria, who wear crowns of roses.

In the language of flowers, different roses have a different signification. For example:—
The Burgundy Rose signifies simplicity and beauty.

The China Rose, grace or beauty ever fresh.

The Daily Rose, a smile.

The Dog Rose, pleasure mixed with pain.

A Faded Rose, beauty is fleeting.

The Japan Rose, beauty your sole attraction.

The Moss Rose, voluptuous love.

The Musk Rose, capricious beauty.

The Provence Rose, my heart is in flames.

The White Rose Bud, too young to love.

The White Rose full of buds, secrecy.

A wreath of Roses, beauty and virtue rewarded.

The Yellow Rose, infidelity.

Rose Alley Ambuscade, The. The attack on Dryden by masked ruffians, probably in the employ of Rochester and the Duchess of Portsmouth, on December 18th, 1679, in revenge for an anonymous Essay on Satire attacking the king, Rochester, and the Duchesses of Cleveland and Portsmouth, which was erroneously attributed to Dryden.

Rose Coffee-house, The. The tavern at the corner of Russell Street and Bow Street, Covent Garden, where Dryden presided over the genius of the town. Formerly known as "The Red Cow," it was subsequently "Will's."

Rose of Jericho, The. The popular name of Anastatica hierochuntina, a small branching plant native to the sandy deserts of Arabia, Egypt, and Syria. When it is dry, if it is exposed to moisture, the branches uncurl. Also called the rose of the Virgin, or Rosa Maria.

Rose Noble. A gold coin worth about 6s. 8d. current in the 15th and 16th centuries, so called because it was stamped with a rose. The value varied from time to time and place to place. Cp. NOBLE.

Rose, The Romance of the. An early French poem of over 20,000 lines; an elaborate allegory on the Art of Love beneath which can be seen a faithful picture of contemporary life. It was begun by Guillaume de Lorris in the latter half of the 13th century, and continued by Jean de Meung in the early part of the 14th. The poet is accosted by Dame Idleness, who conducts him to the Palace of Pleasure, where he meets Love, accompanied by Sweet-looks, Riches, Jollity, Courtesy, Liberality, and Youth, who spend their time in dancing, singing, and other amusements. By this retinue the poet is conducted to a bed of roses, where he singles out one and attempts to pluck it, when an arrow from Cupid's bow stretches him fainting on the ground, and he is carried far away from the flower of his choice. As soon as he recovers, he finds himself alone, and resolves to return to his rose. Welcome goes with him; but Danger, Shame-face, Fear, and Slander obstruct him at every turn. Reason advises him to abandon the pursuit, but this he will not do; whereupon Pity and Liberality aid him in reaching the rose of his choice, and Venus permits him to touch it with his lips. Meanwhile, Slander rouses up Jealousy, who seizes Welcome, whom he casts into a strong castle, and gives the key of the castle door to an old hag. Here the poet is left to mourn over his fate, and the original poem ends.

In the second part—which is much the longer—the same characters appear, but the spirit of the poem is altogether different, the author being interested in life as a whole instead of solely in love; and directing his satire especially against women.

A 15th-century English version is often published with Chaucer's works, and it is probable that the first 1,700 lines or so are by Chaucer.

Rose Sunday. The fourth Sunday in Lent, when the Pope blesses the "Golden Rose" (q.v.).

A bed of roses. See BED.

No rose without a thorn. There is always something to detract from pleasure—"every sweet has its sour," "there is a crook in every lot."

Sing Old Rose and burn the bellows. "Old Rose" was the title of a song now unknown; thus, Izaak Walton, in the Compleat Angler (1653) says, "Let's sing Old Rose." Burn the bellows may be a schoolboys' perversion of burn libellos. At breaking-up time the boys might say, "Let's sing Old Rose and burn our schoolbooks" (libellos). This does not accord ill with the meaning of the well-known catch—

Now we're met like jovial fellows,
Let us do as wise men tell us,
Sing Old Rose and burn the bellows.

Under the rose (Lat. sub rosa). In strict confidence. The origin of the phrase is wrapped in obscurity, but the story is that Cupid gave Harpocrates (the god of silence) a rose, to bribe him not to betray the amours of Venus. Hence the flower became the emblem of silence, and was sculptured on the ceilings of banquet-rooms, to remind the guests that what was spoken sub vino was not to be uttered sub divo. In 1526 it was placed over confessionals.

The Wars of the Roses. A civil contest that lasted thirty years, in which eighty princes of the blood, a large portion of the English nobility, and some 100,000 common soldiers were slain. It was a struggle for the crown between the houses of York (White rose) and Lancaster (Red), York (Edward IV and V and Richard III) deriving from Edmund of Langley, Duke of York, and youngest son of Edward III, and Lancaster (Henry IV, V, and VI) from John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, an elder brother of Edmund. The wars started in the reign of Henry VI with a Yorkist victory at St. Albans (1455) and ended with the defeat and death of the Yorkist Richard III at Bosworth (1485). His successor, Henry VII, was descended from John of Gaunt and married a descendant of Edmund of Langley, thus uniting the two houses.

Rosemary (rōz' mā ri) is Ros-marinus (sea-dew), and is said to be "useful in love-making." The reason is this: Both Venus, the love goddess, and Rosemary or sea-dew, were offspring of the sea; and as Love is Beauty's son, Rosemary is her nearest relative.

The sea his mother Venus came on;
And hence some reverend men approve
Of rosemary in making love.

BUTLER: Hudibras, Pt. ii, c. 1.

Rosemary, an emblem of remembrance. Thus Ophelia says, "There's rosemary, that's for remembrance." According to ancient tradition, this herb strengthens the memory. As Hungarian water, it was once very extensively taken to quiet the nerves. It was much used in weddings, and to wear rosemary in ancient times was as significant of a wedding as to wear a white favour. When the Nurse in Romeo and Juliet asks, "Doth not rosemary and Romeo begin both with a [i.e. one] letter?" she refers to these emblematical characteristics of the herb. In the language of flowers it means "Fidelity in love."

Rosemordris Circle. See MERRY MAIDENS.

Rosetta Stone, The (rō zet' ā). A stone found in 1799 by M. Boussard, a French officer of engineers, in an excavation made at Fort St. Julien, near Rosetta, in the Nile delta. It has an inscription in three different languages—the hieroglyphic, the demotic, and the Greek. It was erected 195 B.C. in honour of Ptolemy Epiphanes, because he remitted the dues of the sacerdotal body. The great value of this stone is that it furnished the key whereby the Egyptian hieroglyphics were deciphered.

Rosicrucians (roz i kroo' shāns). A secret society of mystics and alchemists that is first heard of in 1614 (when was published at Cassel the anonymous Fama fraternitatis des löblichen Ordens des Rosenkreuzes). But it was reputed to have been founded by a certain Christian Rosenkreutz in the second half of the 15th century. Nothing is known of him or of the early history of this society, if, indeed, it ever really existed except as a kind of parody. In Freemasonry there is still an order or degree named the Rosy Cross.

It has been suggested that the title is neither from the founder nor from "rose cross," but from ros crux, dew cross. Dew was considered the most powerful solvent of gold; and cross in alchemy is the symbol of light, because any figure of a cross contains the three letters L V X (light). "Lux" is the menstruum of the red dragon (i.e. corporeal light), and this gross light properly digested produces gold, and dew is the digester. Hence the Rosicrucians are those who used dew for digesting lux or light, with the object of finding the philosopher's stone.

As for the Rosycross philosophers,
Whom you will have to be but sorcerers,
What they pretend to is no more
Than Trismegistus did before,
Pythagoras old Zoroaster,
And Apollonius their master.

BUTLER: Hudibras, Pt. ii, 3.

Rosin Bible, The. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Rosinante. See ROZINANTE.

Ross (Celtic). A headland; as Roslin, Culross, Rossberg, Montrose, Roxburgh, Ardrrossan, etc.

Ross, from the Welsh rhos (a moor); found in Welsh and Cornish names, as Rossal, Rusholme, etc.

The Man of Ross. A name given to John Kyrle (1637-1724), a native of Whitehouse, in Gloucestershire. He resided the greater part of his life in the village of Ross, Herefordshire, and was famous for his benevolence and for supplying needy parishes with churches. The Kyrle Society (q.v.) was named in his honour.

Who taught that heaven-directed spire to rise?
"The Man of Ross," each lisping babe replies.

POPE: Moral Essays.

Rosse. A famous sword which the dwarf Alberich gave to Otwtit, King of Lombardy. It struck so fine a cut that it left no "gap," shone like glass, and was adorned with gold. This sword to thee I give: it is all bright of hue; Whatever it may cleave, no gap will there ensue, From Almari I brought it, and Rosse is its name; Wherever swords are drawn, 'twill put them all to shame.

The Heldenbuch.

Rostrum (ros' trūm). A pulpit, or stand for public speakers, in Latin; the beak of a ship. In Rome, the platform in the Forum from which orators addressed the public was ornamented with the rostra, or ship-prows, taken from the Antiates in 338 B.C.

Rota (rō' tā). A short-lived political club, founded in London in 1659 by James Harrington, author of Oceana (1656). Its objects were to introduce rotation in Government offices and voting by ballot. It met at the Turk's Head, in New Palace Yard, Westminster, and did not survive the Restoration. Its republican principles are outlined in Oceana.

Rota Romana. A Roman Catholic ecclesiastical court composed of auditors under the presidency of a dean, who hear appeals and adjudicate when a conflict of rights occurs. The name is said to allude to the wheel-like (Lat. rota, wheel) plan of the room in which the court used to sit.

Rotary Club. A movement among business men which takes for its motto "Service not Self." The idea originated with Paul Harris, a Chicago lawyer, in 1905. In 1911 it took root in Britain and there are now clubs in all the large towns. Membership in each club is restricted to one member each of any trade, calling, or profession; lectures are delivered by experts at the weekly meetings of the clubs.

Route. To learn by rote is to learn by means of repetition, i.e. by going over the same beaten track or route again and again. Rote is really the same word as route.

Take hackney'd jokes from Miller got by rote.

BYRON: English Bards, etc.

Rothschild. A family of Jewish financiers, deriving their name from the red shield by which their parent house was known in Frankfurt. The family was founded by Meyer Anselm Rothschild (1743-1812) who made a fortune during the French campaigns in Germany. On his death his five sons separated, extending the business throughout Europe. Nathan Meyer Rothschild (1777-1836) went to London in 1805 and is reputed to have made a fortune through advance knowledge of the defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo. His son Lionel (1808-79) was best known by his work for Jewish emancipation. Lionel's son Nathaniel Meyer (1840-1915) was made a baron in 1885. Through the network of their continental connexions the Rothschilds have exerted great influence in many directions.

Rotten Row. Said to be so called from O.Fr. route le roi or route du roi, because it formed part of the old royal route from the palace of the Plantagenet kings at Westminster to the royal forests. Camden derives the word from rotteran, to muster, as the place where soldiers mustered. Another derivation is Norman Ratten Row (roundabout way), being the way corpses were carried to avoid the public thoroughfares. Others suggest A.S. rot, pleasant, cheerful; or simply rotten, referring to the soft material with which the road was covered.

Roué (roo' ä). The profligate Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, first used this word in its modern sense (about 1720). It was his ambition to collect round him companions as worthless as himself, and he used facetiously to boast that there was not one of them who did not deserve to be broken on the wheel—that being the most ordinary punishment for malefactors at the time; hence these profligates went by the name of Orleans' roués or wheels. The most notorious roués were the Dukes of Richelieu, Broglie, Biron, and Brancas, together with Canillac and Noce; in England, the Dukes of Rochester and Buckingham.

Rouen (roo' on). Aller à Rouen. To go to ruin. The French are full of these puns, and our forefathers indulged in them also, as, You are on the highway to Needham (a market town in Suffolk), i.e. your courses will lead you to poverty.

The Bloody Feast of Rouen (1356). Charles the Dauphin gave a banquet to his private friends at Rouen, to which his brother-in-law Charles the Bad was invited. While the guests were at table King John the Good entered the room with a numerous escort, exclaiming, "Traitor, thou art not worthy to sit at table with my son!" Then, turning to his guards, he added, "Take him hence! By holy Paul, I will neither eat nor drink till his head be brought me!" Then, seizing an iron mace from one of the men at arms, he struck another of the guests between the shoulders, exclaiming, "Out, proud traitor! by the soul of my father, thou shalt not live!" Four of the guests were beheaded on the spot.

Rouge (roozh) (Fr., red). Rouge Croix. One of the pursuivants of the Heralds' College (q.v.). So called from the red cross of St. George, the patron saint of England.

Rouge Dragon. The pursuivant founded by Henry VII. The Red Dragon was the ensign of Cadwalader, the last Welsh king of the Britons, an ancestor of Henry VII, who employed it as the dexter supporter of his coat of arms.

Rouge et Noir (Fr., red and black). A game of chance; so called because of the red and black diamond-shaped compartments on the board. The dealer deals out to noir first till the sum of the pips exceeds thirty, then to rouge in the same manner. That packet which comes nearest to thirty-one is the winner of the stakes.

Rough. Rough-hewn. Shaped in the rough, not finished, unpolished, ill-mannered, raw; as a "rough-hewn seaman" (Bacon); a "rough-hewn discourse" (Howe).

There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough-hew them how we will.

Hamlet, v. 2.

Rough Music, called in Somersetshire skimmity-riding (cp. SKIMMINGTON), and by the Basques toberac. A ceremony which takes place after sunset, when the performers, to show their indignation against some man or woman who has outraged propriety, assemble before the house, and make an appalling din with bells, horns, tin pans, and other noisy instruments.

Riding rough-shod over one. Treating one without the least consideration. The shoes of a horse that is rough-shod has the nails projecting to prevent it slipping.

Rough and Ready. So General Zachary Taylor (1784-1850) twelfth president of the United States, was called.

There was a Colonel Rough in the battle of Waterloo; fable tells that the Duke of Wellington used to say "Rough and ready, colonel," and that the family adopted the words as their motto.

Rouncival (rown'si val). Large; of gigantic size. Certain large bones of extinct animals were at one time said to be the bones of the heroes who fell with Roland in Roncesvalles (q.v.). "Rounceval peas" are those large peas called "marrowfats," and a very large woman is called a rouncival.

Hereof, I take it, it comes that seeing a great woman we say she is a rouncival.—MANDEVILLE.

Round. There is an archaic verb to round (A.S. runian), meaning to whisper, or to communicate confidentially. Browning uses it more than once, e.g.—

First make a laughing-stock of me and mine,
Then round us in the ears from morn to night
(Because we show wry faces at your mirth)
That you are robbed, starved, beaten and what not!
The Ring and the Book, iv, 599.

Bunyan, in the Pilgrim's Progress, speaks of "that lesson which I will round you in the ear." Cp. also—

France . . . rounded in the ear with [by] . . . commodity [self-interest] hath resolved to [on] a most base . . . peace.—King John, ii, 1.

And ner the feend he drough as nought ne were,
Full prively, and rounded in his eere,
"Herke, my brother, herke, by thi faith . . ."

CHAUCER: Canterbury Tales, 7132.

A good round sum. A large sum of money.
Three Thousand ducats; 'tis a good round sum
Merchant of Venice, i. i.

A round peg in a square hole. See PEG.

A round robin. A petition or protest signed in a circular form, so that no name heads the list. The device is French, and the term seems to be a corruption of ronde (round) ruban (a ribbon). It was first adopted by the officers of government as a means of making known their grievances.

At a round pace or rate. Briskly, rapidly, smartly.

He cried again,
"To the wilds!" and Enid leading down the tracks . . .
Round was their pace at first, but slacken'd soon.
TENNYSON: Enid and Geraint, 28.

In round numbers. In whole numbers, without regarding the fractions. Thus we say the population of the British Isles in 1931 was forty-nine millions, in round numbers, and that of Greater London eight millions. The idea is that what is round is whole or perfect, and, of course, fractions, being broken numbers, cannot belong thereto.

Round dealing. Honest, straightforward dealing, without branching off into underhand tricks, or deviating from the straight path into the byways of finesse.

Round dealing is the honour of man's nature.—BACON.

Sellinger's Round. See SELLINGER.

Round-up. (Western U.S.A.) A corral on a large scale. Cattle were gathered together by riding round them and driving them in. Hence, a gathering-in of scattered objects or persons, e.g. criminals.

To get round one. To take advantage of him by cajoling or flattery; to have one's own way through deception.

To round on one. To turn on him; to turn informer against him.

To walk the Round. Lawyers used frequently to give interviews to their clients in the Round Church in the Temple; and "walking the Round" meant loitering about the church, in the hope of being hired for a witness.

Round Table, The. The Table fabled to have been made by Merlin at Carduel for Uther Pendragon. Uther gave it to King Leodegrance, of Camelard, who gave it to King Arthur when the latter married Guinever, his daughter. It was circular to prevent any jealousy on the score of precedence; it seated 150 knights, and a place was left in it for the San Graal. The first reference to it is in Wace's Roman de Brut (1155); these legendary details are from Malory's Morte d'Arthur, III, i and ii.

The table shown at Winchester was recognized as ancient in the time of Henry III, but its anterior history is unknown. It is of wedge-shaped oak planks, and is 17 ft. in diameter and 2½ in. thick. At the back are 12 mortice holes in which 12 legs probably used to fit. It was for the accommodation of twelve favourite knights. Henry VIII showed it to Francis I, telling him that it was the one used by the British king. The Round Table was not peculiar to the reign of King Arthur, but was common in all the ages of chivalry. Thus the King of Ireland, father of the fair Christabelle, says in the ballad

Is there never a knight of my round table
This matter will undergo? Sir Cauline.

In the eighth year of Edward I, Roger de Mortimer established a Round Table at Kenilworth for "the encouragement of military pastimes." At this foundation 100 knights and as many ladies were entertained at the founder's expense. About seventy years later, Edward III erected a splendid table at Windsor. It was 200 ft. in diameter, and the expense of entertaining the knights thereof amounted to £100 a week.

Knights of the Round Table. According to Malory (Morte d'Arthur, III, i, ii) there were 150 knights who had "sieges" at the table. King Leodegrance brought 100 when, at the wedding of his daughter Guinever, he gave the table to King Arthur; Merlin filled up twenty-eight of the vacant seats, and the king elected Gawaine and Tor; the remaining twenty were left for those who might prove worthy.

A list of the knights and a description of their armour is given in the Theatre of Honour by Andrew Fairne (1622). According to this list, the number was 151; but in Lancelot of the Lake (vol. ii, p. 81), they are said to have amounted to 250.

These knights went forth into all countries in quest of adventures, but their chief exploits occurred in quest of the San Graal (q.v.) or Holy Cup, brought to Britain by Joseph of Arimathea.

Sir Lancelot is meant for a model of fidelity, bravery, frailty in love, and repentance; Sir Galahad of chastity; Sir Gawain of courtesy; Sir Kay of a rude, boastful knight; and Sir Modred of treachery.

There is still a "Knights of the Round Table" Club, which claims to be the oldest social club in the world, having been founded in 1721. Garrick, Dickens, Toole, Sir Henry Irving, Tenniel, are among those who have been members.

A round table conference. A conference between political parties in which each has equal authority, and at which it is agreed that the questions in dispute shall be settled amicably and with the maximum amount of "give and take" on each side.

The expression came into prominence in connexion with a private conference in the house of Sir William Harcourt, January 14th, 1887, with the view of reuniting, if possible, the Liberal party, broken up by Gladstone's Irish policy.

Roundabout. A large revolving machine at fairs, circuses, etc., with wooden horses or the like, which go round and round ridden by passengers, to the strains of a mechanical brass band. From this arises the device at a cross-roads, whereby traffic circulates in one direction only, thus doing away with the need for holding up vehicles on one road while traffic from another crosses it.

What you lose on the swings you make up on the roundabouts. See SWING.

Roundheads. Puritans of the Civil War period; especially Cromwell's soldiers. So called because they wore their hair short, while the Royalists wore long hair covering their shoulders.

And ere their butter 'gan to coddle,
A bullet churned i' th' Roundhead's noddle.

Roundle, in heraldry, is a charge of a circular form. There are a number of varieties, distinguished by their colours or tinctures, as—a Bezant, tincture "or"; Plate, "argent"; Torteau, "gules"; Hurt, "azure"; Ogress or Pellet, "sable"; Pomey (because supposed to resemble an apple, Fr. pomme), "vert"; Golpe, "purpure"; Guze, "sanguine"; Orange, "tenney."

Roup, the name by which an auction is called in Scotland. It is a Scandinavian word, and is connected with the M.Swed. rópa, to shout.

Rouse. A good, hearty bumper; a drinking bout. See CAROUSE.

Rout. A common term in the 18th century for a large evening party or fashionable assemblage. Cp. DRUM; HURRICANE; etc.

Routes. In N.W. Europe Allied routes were signposted in World War II with simple emblems instead of place names, to enable drivers to reach a destination without the use of maps. The British roads, reaching from Caen to the Baltic, were easily recognizable, among them being "Hat," "Bottle," and "Diamond." These were chosen by Brig. Sir Henry Floyd and Lt.-Col. J. C. Cockburn for an exercise in Yorkshire in which 8 Corps practised the battle they were to fight six months later south of Caen; hence when the real thing took place the same signs were used, and the routes beginning there continued across Europe. The most famous American road was the Red Ball Route—a supply line for fast-moving traffic only, kept rolling 24 hours a day to maintain the impetus of Gen. Patton's sensational advance across France. The name came from an old American railway tradition of marking priority freight with a red ball.

Routiers, or Rutters (roo'tierz, rüt'erz). Mediæval adventurers who made war a trade and let themselves out to anyone who would pay them. So called because they were always on the route or moving from place to place.

Rove. The original meaning was to shoot with arrows at marks that were selected at hazard, the distance being unknown, with the object of practising judging distance. Hence—

To shoot at rovers. To shoot at random without any distinct aim.

Unbelievers are said by Clobery to "shoot at rovers."—Divine Glimpes, p. 4 (1659).

Running at rovers. Running wild; being without restraint.

Row (rou). A disturbance, noise, or tumult is late 18th-century slang; the origin of the word is unknown.

"I shall now and then kick up a row in the street."
—Loiterer, No. 12.

Rowdy. A ruffian brawler, a "rough," a riotous or turbulent fellow, whose delight is to make a row or disturbance. Hence rowdyism and rowdy-dowdy. The term was originally American (early 19th century) and denoted a wild and lawless backwoodsman.

Rowan, or Mountain Ash (rou'an, rō'an). Called in Westmorland the "Wiggintree." It was greatly venerated by the Druids, and was formerly known as the "Witchen" because it was supposed to ward off witches.

Their spells were vain. The hags returned

To their queen in sorrowful mood,

Crying that witches have no power

Where thrives the Rowan-tree wood.

Laidley Worm of Spindleston Heughs (a ballad).

Its scientific name is Pyrus aucuparia, and it is of the natural order Rosaceæ, while the common Ash is of the natural order Oleaceæ. The Mountain Ash is Icosandria, but the common Ash is Diandria; the former is Pentagynia, but the latter is Monogynia; yet the two trees resemble each other in many respects.

Rowland. See ROLAND.

Rowley (rō'li). Old Rowley. Charles II was so called from his favourite race-horse. A portion of the Newmarket racecourse is still called Rowley Mile, from the same horse.

The Rowley Poems. See FORGERIES.

Roxburghe Club, The (roks' brò). An association of bibliophiles founded in 1812 for the purpose of printing rare works or MSS. It was named after John, Duke of Roxburghe, a celebrated collector of ancient literature (1740-1804), and remains the most distinguished gathering of bibliophiles in the world. It was the forerunner of a number of similar printing clubs, as the Camden, Cheetham, Percy, Shakespeare, Surtees, and Wharton, in England; the Abbotsford, Bannatyne, Maitland, and Spalding, in Scotland; and the Celtic Society of Ireland.

Roy, Le, or la Reine, s'avisera (the king, or queen, will consider it). This is the royal veto, last put in force March 11th, 1707, when Queen Anne refused her assent to a Scottish Militia Bill.

During the agitation for Catholic emancipation, George III threatened a veto, but the matter was not brought to the test.

Royal. A standard size of writing papers measuring 19 × 24 in. In printings it is 20 × 25 in. or 20 × 25½ in.; hence a royal octavo book measures 10 × 6¼ in. (untrimmed).

Super Royal in printing papers measures (with slight variations)  $20 \times 27$  in., and in writing papers  $19 \times 27$  in.

Royal Academy. See ACADEMY.

Royal American Regiment. The original name of the King's Royal Rifle Corps, which was first raised under that title in Maryland and Pennsylvania, 1755.

Royal and Ancient. The name by which the game of golf has been known since early days. In 1834 the St. Andrews Golf Club (founded in 1754) took the name of Royal and Ancient Golf Club; except in U.S.A. this club is the recognized authority on golf throughout the world, governing the game, framing rules, and settling questions and disputes.

Royal Institution. An association founded in 1799 for the purpose of prosecuting scientific and literary research, to further experimental science, and give opportunities for the exchange of views and experiences. Under the patronage of the sovereign, it consists of a president and a number of professors, among whom have been numbered Humphry Davy, Faraday, Tyndall, Rayleigh, Sir James Dewar.

Royal Merchants. The wealthy Venetian merchants of the 13th century, such as the Sanudos, the Justiniani, the Grimaldi, and others, who erected principalities in divers places of the Archipelago. They and their descendants enjoyed almost royal rights in these districts for many centuries.

Glancing an eye of pity on his losses,
That have of late so huddled on his back,
Enough to press a royal merchant down.

Merchant of Venice, iv, 1.

Sir Thomas Gresham was called a "royal merchant"; and in 1767 Fletcher's comedy, The Beggar's Bush (1622) was produced as an opera with the title The Royal Merchant.

Royal Oak. See OAK-APPLE DAY.

Royal Society. The premier scientific society in Britain. It originated in London in 1645 when a number of learned enquirers met to discuss and experiment in various branches of science. The society was organized in 1660, meeting at Gresham College until 1710, when a move was made to Crane Court, Fleet Street. In 1780 the Society moved again to Somerset House, finally settling in its present home at Burlington House in 1857. Its fellowship, the F.R.S., is the greatest honour in the scientific and philosophical world.

Royal Titles. See RULERS, TITLES OF.

Royston (Herts) means king's town; so called in honour of King Stephen, who erected a cross there. (O.Fr. roy, king.)

A Royston horse and Cambridge Master of Arts will give way to no one. A Cambridgeshire proverb. Royston was famous for malt, which was sent to London on horseback. These heavy-laden beasts never moved out of the way. The Masters of Arts, being the great dons of Cambridge, had the wall conceded to them by the inhabitants out of courtesy.

Rozinante, Rocinante (roz i năn' ti). The wretched jade of a riding-horse belonging to Don Quixote (q.v.). Although it was nothing but skin and bone—and worn out at that—he regarded it as a priceless charger surpassing "the Bucephalus of Alexander and the Babieca of the Cid." The name, which is applied to similar hacks, is from Span. rocin, a jade, the ante (before) implying that once upon a time, perhaps, it had been a horse.

Rub. An impediment. The expression is taken from bowls, where "rub" means that something hinders the free movement of your bowl.

Without rub or interruption.—Swift.

Like a bowl that runneth in a smooth allie without anie rub.—Stanhurst, p. 10.

Don't rub it in! Yes, I know I've made a fool of myself, but you needn't go on emphasizing the fact!

Rub of the green. A golf term for any unsuspected misfortune to which the best played stroke may sometimes be subject.

Rubber. In whist, bridge, and some other games, a set of three games, the best two out of three, or the third game of the set. The origin of the term is uncertain, but it may be a transference from bowls, in which the collision of two balls is a rubber, because they rub against each other.

Those who play at bowls must look out for rubbers. There is always some risk in anything you undertake, and you've got to be prepared to meet it; you must take the rough with the smooth.

Rubberneck-wagon. An excursion or sight-seeing-bus in which the passengers stretch their necks to look at views or monuments.

Rubicon (roo' bi kon). To pass the Rubicon. To take some step from which it is not possible to recede. Thus, when the Austrians, in 1859, passed the Ticino, the act was a declaration of war against Sardinia; in 1866, when the Italians passed the Adige, it was a declaration of war against Austria; and in August 1914, when the Germans crossed the frontier into Belgium it was impossible to avoid the armed intervention of Great Britain.

The Rubicon was a small river separating ancient Italy from Cisalpine Gaul (the province allotted to Julius Cæsar). When, in 49 B.C., Cæsar crossed this stream he passed beyond the limits of his own province and became an invader of Italy, thus precipitating the Civil War.

Rubric (roo' briki) (Lat. rubrica, red ochre, or vermilion). An ordinance or law was by the Romans called a rubric, because it was written with vermilion, in contradistinction to prætorian edicts or rules of the court, which were posted on a white ground (Juvenal, xiv, 192).

Rubrica vetavit = the law has forbidden it.—(Persius, v, 99.)

The liturgical directions, titles, etc., in a Prayer Book are known as the Rubric because these were (and in many cases still are) printed in red. Milton has an allusion to the custom of printing the names of certain saints (cp. RED LETTER DAY) in red in the Prayer Book Calendar.

No date prefix'd

Directs me in the starry rubric set.

Paradise Regained, iv, 392.

Ruby. The ancients considered the ruby to be an antidote to poison, to preserve persons from plague, to banish grief, to repress the ill effects of luxuries, and to divert the mind from evil thoughts.

It has always been a very valuable stone, and even to-day a fine Burma ruby will cost more than a diamond of the same size.

Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above rubies.—Prov. xxxi, 10, cp. also Job xxviii, 18, and Prov. viii, 11.

Marco Polo said that the king of Ceylon had the finest ruby ever seen. "It is a span long, as thick as a man's arm, and without a flaw." Kublai Khan offered the value of a city for it, but the king would not part with it though all the treasures of the world were to be laid at his feet.

The perfect ruby. An alchemist's term for the elixir, or philosopher's stone.

He that once has the flower of the sun,
The perfect ruby, which we call elixir, . . .
Can confer honour, love, respect, long life,
Give safety, valour, yea, and victory,
To whom he will.

BEN JOHNSON: The Alchemist, ii, 1.

Rudder. Who won't be ruled by the rudder must be ruled by the rock. Who won't listen to reason must bear the consequences, like a ship that runs upon a rock if it will not answer the helm.

Ruddock. The redbreast, "sacred to the household gods"; see ROBIN REDBREAST. Shakespeare makes Arviragus say over Imogen—

Thou shalt not lack
The flower that's like thy face, pale primrose: nor
The azure harebell . . . the ruddock would
With charitable bill . . . bring thee all these.

Cymbeline, iv, 2.

Rudolphine Tables, The (roo dol' fin). Astronomical calculations begun by Tycho Brahe, continued by Kepler, and published in 1627. They were named after Kepler's patron, Kaiser Rudolph II.

Rue (roo), called "herb of grace" (q.v.), because it was employed for sprinkling holy water. See also DIFFERENCE. Ophelia says—

There's rue for you, and here's some for me! we may call it "herb of grace" o' Sundays.—Hamlet, iv, 5.

Ruff. An early forerunner of whist, very popular in the late 16th and early 17th centuries, later called slamm. The act of trumping at whist, etc., especially when one cannot follow suit, is still called "the ruff."

Ruffian Hall. That part of West Smithfield, later the horse-market, where in the 16th century "trials of skill were plaid by ordinary ruffianly people with sword and buckler" (Blount, p. 562).

The field commonly called West-Smith field, was for many years called Ruffians Hall, by reason it was the usual place of Frayes and common fighting, during the time that Sword-and-Bucklers were in use.—Howes' continuation of Stow's "Annals" (1631), p. 1024.

Rufus. (The Red.) William II of England (1056, 1087-1100).

Otho II of Germany; also called The Bloody (955, 973-83).

Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, son-in-law of Edward I. (Slain 1313.)

Ruggiero. See ROGERO.

Rule. Rule of thumb. See THUMB.

Rule of the road. See under ROAD.

Rule the roost. See ROAST.

Rule, or Regulus, St. A priest of Patræ in Achaia, who is said to have come to Scotland in the 4th century, bringing with him relics of St. Andrew, and to have founded the town and bishopric of St. Andrews. The name Killrule (Cella Regul.) perpetuates his memory.

Rule, Britannia. Words by James Thomson (1700-48), author of The Seasons; music by Dr. Arne (1740). It first appeared in a masque entitled Alfred, in which the name of David Mallett is associated with that of Thomson. There are, however, no grounds whatever for supposing that Mallett wrote a single line of the Ode. In the rising of 1745 "Rule Britannia" was sung by the Jacobites with modifications appropriate to their cause.

Rule nisi (nī' sī). A "rule" is an order from one of the superior courts, and a "rule nisi" (cp. Nisi) is such an order "to show cause." That is, the rule is to be held absolute unless the party to whom it applies can "show cause" why it should not be so.

Rulers, Titles of. Titles of sovereigns and other rulers may be divided into two classes, viz. (1) designations that correspond more or less to our King or Emperor (such as Bey, Mikado, Sultan), and (2) appellatives that were originally the proper name of some individual ruler (as Cæsar).

Akhoond. King and high priest of the Swat (N.W. Provinces, India).

Ameer, Amur. Ruler of Afghanistan, Sind, etc.

Archon. Chief of the nine magistrates of ancient Athens. The next in rank was called Basileus, and the third Polemarch (field marshal).

Beglerbeg. See BEY.

Begum. A queen, princess, or lady of high rank in India.

Bey—of Tunis. In Imperial Turkey, a bey was usually a superior military officer, though the title was often assumed by those who held no official position.

Brenn or Brenhin (war-chief) of the ancient Gauls. A dictator appointed by the Druids in times of danger.

Bretwalda (wielder of Britain). A title of some of the Anglo-Saxon kings who held supremacy over the rest; a king of the Heph-tarchy (q.v.).

Cacique. See CAZIQUE.

Caliph or Calif (successor). Successors of Mohammed in temporal and spiritual matters; after the first four successors of Mohammed the caliphate passed through various dynasties—Umayyad, Abbasid, Seljuk, Turkoman, etc. In 1538 the Sultan of Turkey, Selim I, declared himself Caliph and the title rested with the sultanate until 1922 when both sultanate and caliphate were suppressed.

Caudillo (Span., "leader"). The head of the Spanish State, Don Francisco Franco Baha-monde.

Cazique or Cacique. A native prince of the ancient Peruvians, Cubans, Mexicans, etc.

Chagan. The chief of the Avars.

Cham. See KHAN.

Cral. The despot of ancient Servia.

Czar. See TSAR.

Dey. Governor of Algiers, before it was annexed to France in 1830; also the 16th-century rulers of Tunis and Tripoli (Turk. dāi, uncle).

Diwan. The native chief of Pajampur, India.

Doge. The ruler of the old Venetian Republic (697-1797); also of that of Genoa (1339-1797).

Duce (Ital., "leader"). Head of the Fascist State of Italy, 1922-45, Benito Mussolini.

Duke. The ruler of a duchy; formerly in many European countries of sovereign rank. (Lat. Dux, a leader.)

Elector. A Prince of the Holy Roman Empire (of sovereign rank) entitled to take part in the election of the Emperor.

Emir. The independent chieftain of certain Arabian provinces, as Bokhara, Nejd, etc.; also given to Arab chiefs who claim descent from Mohammed.

Emperor. The paramount ruler of an empire, especially, in mediæval times, the Holy Roman Empire; from Lat. Imperator, one who commands.

Exarch. The title of a viceroy of the Byzantine Emperors, especially the Exarch of Ravenna, who was de facto governor of Italy.

Führer (Ger., "leader"). Prime Minister and President of the Nazi German State, 1934-45, Adolf Hitler.

Gaekwar. Formerly the title of the monarch of the Marhattas; now that of the native ruler of Baroda (his son being the Gaekwad). The word is Marathi for a cowherd.

Gauleiter (Ger., "region leader"). The ruler of a province under the Nazi regime, 1934-45.

Holkar. The title of the Maharajah of Indore.

Hospodar. The title borne by the princes of Moldavia and Wallachia before the union of those countries with Rumania (Slavic, lord, master).

Imperator. See EMPEROR.

Inca. The title of the sovereigns of Peru up to the conquest by Pizarro (1531).

Kabaka. The native ruler of the Buganda province of the Uganda Protectorate.

Kaiser. The German form of Lat. Cæsar (see below, also TSAR): the old title of the Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, and of the Emperors of Germany and of Austria.

Khan. The chief rulers of Tartar, Mongol, and Turkish tribes, as successors of Genghis Khan (d. 1227). The word means lord or prince.

Khedive. The title conferred in 1867 by the Sultan of Turkey on the viceroy or governor of Egypt. Cp. VALI.

King. The Anglo-Saxon cynning, literally "a man of good birth" (cyn, tribe, kin, or race, with the patronymic -ing).

Lama. The priest-ruler of Tibet. See LAMA.

Maharajah. (Hind., "the great king"). The title of many of the native rulers of Indian States.

Maharao. The title of the native rulers of Cutch, Kotah, and Sirohi, India.

Maharao Rajah. The native ruler of Bundi, India.

Maharawal. The native rulers of Banswara, Dungarpur, Jaisalmer, and Partabgarh, India.

Mikado. The popular title of the hereditary ruler of Japan—officially styled "Emperor." The name (like the Turkish Sublime Porte) means "The August Door." Cp. SHOGUN.

Mir. The native ruler of Khairpur, India.

Mogul or Great Mogul. The Emperors of Delhi, and rulers of the greater part of India from 1526 to 1857, of the Mongol line founded by Baber.

Mpret. The old title of the Albanian rulers (from Lat. imperator), revived in 1913 in favour of Prince William of Wied, whose Mpretship lasted only a few months.

Nawab. The native rulers of Bhopal, Tonk, Jaora, and some other Indian States.

Negus (properly Negus Negust, meaning "king of kings"). The native name of the sovereign of Abyssinia—officially styled "Emperor."

Nizam. The title of the native ruler of Hyderabad, Deccan, since 1713.

Padishah (Pers., protecting lord). A title of the former Sultan of Turkey, the Shah of Persia, and of the former Great Moguls.

Pendragon. The title assumed by the ancient British overlord.

Polemarch. See ARCHON.

Prince. Formerly in common use as the title of a reigning sovereign, as it still is in a few cases, such as the Prince of Monaco and Prince of Liechtenstein.

Rajah. Hindustani for king (cp. MAHARAJAH): specifically the title of the native rulers of Cochin, Ratlam, Tippera, Chamba, Faridkot, Mandi, Pudukota, Rajgarh, Rajpipla, Sailana, and Tehri (Garhwal). Cp. REX.

Rex (regem), the Latin equivalent of our "king," connected with regere, to rule, and with Sanskrit rajan (whence RAJAH), a king.

Sachem, Sagamore. Chieftains of certain tribes of North American Indians.

Satrap. The governor of a province in ancient Persia.

Shah (Pers., king). The supreme ruler of Persia and of some other Eastern countries. Cp. PADISHAH.

Sheik. An Arab chief, or head man of a tribe.

Shogun. The title of the virtual rulers of Japan (representing usurping families who kept the true Emperor in perpetual imprisonment) from about the close of the 12th century to the revolution of 1867-68. It means "leader of an army," and was originally the title of military governors. Also called the Tycoon.

Sindhia. The special title of the Maharajah of Gwalior.

Sirdar. The commander-in-chief of the Egyptian army and military governor of Egypt during the British occupation, 1882-1936.

Stadtholder. Originally a viceroy in a province of the Netherlands, but later the chief executive officer of the United Provinces.

Sultan (formerly also Soldan). The title of the rulers of certain Mohammedan States.

Tetrarch. The governor of the fourth part of a province in the ancient Roman Empire.

Thakur Sahib. The title of the native ruler of Gondal, India.

Tsar (from Lat. Cæsar; cp. KAISER). The popular title of the former Emperors of Russia (assumed in 1547 by Ivan the Terrible), but officially his only as King of Poland and a few other parts of his Empire. His wife was the Tsarina, his son the Tsarevich, and his daughter the Tsarevna.

Tycoon. An alternative title of the Japanese Shogun (q.v.). The word is from Chinese and means "great sovereign."

Vali. The title of the governors of Egypt prior to 1867, when the style Khedive (q.v.) was granted by the Sultan.

Voivode, or Vaivode. Properly (Russ.) "the leader of an army," the word was for a time assumed as a title by the Princes of Moldavia and Wallachia, later called Hospodars (q.v.).

Wali. A title of the native ruler, or Khan, of Kalat, India.

(2) The following names have been adopted in varying degrees as royal titles among the peoples mentioned:—

Abgarus (The Grand). So the kings of Edessa were styled.

Abimelech (my father the king). The chief ruler of the ancient Philistines.

Attabeg (father prince). Persia, 1118.

Augustus. The title of the reigning Emperor of Rome, when the heir presumptive was styled "Cæsar."

Cæsar. Proper name adopted by the Roman emperors. See KAISER; TSAR.

Candace. Proper name adopted by the queens of Ethiopia.

Cyrus (mighty). Ancient Persia.

Darius. Latin form of Darawesh (king). Ancient Persia.

Melech (king). Ancient Semitic tribes.

Pharaoh (light of the world). Ancient Egypt.

Ptolemy. Proper name adopted by Egypt after the death of Alexander.

Sophy or Sophi. A former title of the kings of Persia, from Çafi-ud-din, the founder of the ancient dynasty of the Çafi or Çafavi.

Ruminate. To think, to meditate upon some subject; properly, "to chew the cud" (Lat. rumino, from rumen, the throat).

To chew the cud of sweet and bitter fancy.—MILTON.

On a flowery bank he chews the cud.—DRYDEN.

Rump, The. The end of the backbone, with the buttocks. The term was applied contemptuously to the remnant of the Long Parliament that was left after Pride's Purge (q.v.) in 1648, and lasted till it was eventually ejected by Cromwell in April, 1653; also to the later remnant of the same Parliament that was restored in May, 1659, and dissolved by Monk in the following February. The "Rump" was composed of those members who most strenuously opposed Charles I and the Restoration.

The few,

Because they're wasted to the stumps,

Are represented best by rumps.

BUTLER: Hudibras, Pt. iii, 2.

Rump and dozen. A rump of beef and a dozen of claret; or a rump steak and a dozen oysters. A not uncommon wager among sportsmen of the late 18th and early 19th centuries.

Rumpelstilzchen (rûm pel stîlts' chen). A passionate little deformed dwarf of German folk-tale. A miller's daughter was enjoined by a king to spin straw into gold, and the dwarf did it for her, on condition that she would give him her first child. The maiden married the king, and grieved so bitterly when the child was born that the dwarf promised to relent if within three days she could find out his name. Two days were spent in vain guesses, but the third day one of the queen's servants heard a strange voice singing—

Little dreams my dainty dame

Rumpelstilzchen is my name.

The child was saved, and the dwarf killed himself with rage.

Run. A long run, a short run. We say of a drama, "It had a long run," meaning it attracted the people to the house, and was represented over and over again for many nights. The allusion is to a runner who continues his race for a long way. The drama ran on night after night without change.

He that runs may read. The Bible quotation in Hab. ii, 2, is, "Write the vision, and make it plain upon tables, that he may run that readeth it." Cowper says—

But truths, on which depends our main concern . . .
Shine by the side of every path we tread
With such a lustre, he that runs may read.

Tirocinium.

In the long run. In the final result. This allusion is to race-running: one may get the start for a time, but in the long run, or entire race, the result may be different. The hare got the start, but in the long run the patient perseverance of the tortoise won the race.

On the run. Moving from place to place and hiding from the authorities; said specially of rebels.

To be run in. To be arrested and taken to the lock-up.

To go with a run. To go swimmingly; "without a hitch." A seaman's phrase. A rope goes with a run when it is let go entirely, instead of being slackened gradually.

To have the run of the house. To have free access to it and liberty to partake of whatever comes to table.

To run down. To cease to go or act from lack of motive force, or a clock when the spring is fully unwound.

To run a man down. To depreciate him, or to abuse him to a third party.

To run a rig. See RIG.

To run amuck. See AMUCK.

To run into the ground. To pursue too far; to exhaust a topic.

To run to earth. To discover in a hiding-place; to get to the bottom of a matter.

To run through one's inheritance. To squander it at a rapid rate.

To run riot. See RIOT.

To run the show. To take charge of it, generally with ostentation; to make oneself responsible for its success.

Runner-up. The competitor or team that finishes in the second place, after the winner.

Runners. See REDBREASTS.

His shoes are made of running leather. He is given to roving. There may be a pun between roan and run.

Quite out of the running. Quite out of court, not worthy of consideration; like a horse which has been scratched for some race and so is not "in the running."

Running footmen. Men servants in the early part of the 18th century, when no great house was complete without some half-dozen of them. Their duty was to run beside the fat Flemish mares of the period, and advise the innkeeper of the coming guests. The pole which they carried was to help the cumbrous coach out of the numerous sloughs. It is said that the notorious "Old Q" was the last to employ running footmen.

Running Thursday. December 13th, 1688, two days after the flight of James II. A rumour ran that the French and Irish Papists had landed; a terrible panic ensued, and the people betook themselves to the country, running for their lives.

Running water. No enchantment can subsist in a living stream; if, therefore, a person can interpose a brook betwixt himself and the witches, sprites, or goblins chasing him, he is in perfect safety. Burns's tale of Tam o' Shanter turns upon this superstition.

Running the Hood. It is said that an old lady was passing over Haxey Hill, when the wind blew away her hood. Some boys began tossing it from one to the other, and the old lady so enjoyed the fun that she bequeathed thirteen acres of land, that thirteen candidates might be induced to renew the sport on the 6th of every January.

Runcible Spoon. The plate and cutlery trades have no knowledge of this utensil, which is mentioned in Edward Lear's Owl and the Pussy Cat:

They dined on mince and slices of quince
Which they ate with a runcible spoon.

Some who profess to know describe it as a kind of fork having three broad prongs, one of which has a sharp cutting edge.

Rune (roon). A letter or character of the earliest alphabet in use among the Gothic tribes of Northern Europe. Runes were employed for purposes of secrecy or for divination; and the word is also applied to ancient lore or poetry expressed in runes. Rune is related to A.S. rān, secret.

There were several sorts of runes employed by the Celts, as (1) the Evil Rune, when evil was to be invoked; (2) the Securable Rune, to secure from misadventure; (3) the Victorious Rune, to procure victory over enemies; (4) Medicinal Rune, for restoring to health the indisposed, or for averting danger, etc.

Runic Staff, or Wand. See CLOG ALMANAC.

Rupert. Prince Rupert's drops. Bubbles made by dropping molten glass into water. Their form is that of a tadpole, and if the smallest portion of the "tail" is nipped off, the whole flies into fine dust with explosive violence.

These toys were named after Prince Rupert (1619-82), grandson of James I and the leader of Royalist cavalry in the Civil Wars, who introduced them into England.

The first production of an author . . . is usually esteemed as a sort of Prince Rupert's drop, which is destroyed entirely if a person make on it but a single scratch.—Household Words.

Rupert of Debate. Edward Geoffrey, fourteenth Earl of Derby (1799-1869). It was when he was Mr. Stanley, and the opponent of Daniel O'Connell, that Lord Lytton so described him, in allusion to the brilliant Royalist cavalry leader, Prince Rupert.

The brilliant chief, irregularly great,
Frank, haughty, bold—the Rupert of Debate.
New Timon.

Ruptured Duck. The nickname in World War II for the American ex-service lapel button issued to all demobilized from the forces.

Ruritania (ru ri tā'nyā). An imaginary kingdom in a pre-World-War Europe where Anthony Hope placed the adventures of his hero in the novels The Prisoner of Zenda (1894) and Rupert of Hentzau (1898). The name is frequently applied to any small state where politics and intrigues of a melodramatic importance are the natural order of the day.

Rush. Friar Rush. A name given to the will-o'-the-wisp; also to a strolling demon who, it is said, once on a time got admittance into a monastery as a scullion, and played the monks divers pranks. See FRIAR'S LANTHORN.

It's a regular rush. A barefaced swindle, an exorbitant charge. Said when one is "rushed" into paying a good deal more for something than it is worth.

Not worth a rush. Worthless, not worth a straw. When floors used to be strewn with rushes, distinguished guests were given clean, fresh rushes, but those of inferior grade had either the rushes which had been already used by their superiors, or none at all.

Strangers have green rushes when daily guests are not worth a rush.—LYLY: Sappho and Phaon (1584).

Rush-bearing Sunday. A Sunday, generally near the time of the festival of the saint to whom the church is dedicated, when anciently it was customary to renew the rushes with which the church floor was strewn. The festival is still observed at Ambleside, Westmorland, on the last Sunday in July, the church being dedicated to St. Anne, whose day is July 26th. The present custom is to make the festival a flower Sunday, with rushes and flowers formed into fanciful devices. The preceding Saturday is a holiday, being the day when the old rushes were removed.

Russel. A common name given to a fox, from its russet colour.

Daun Russel, the fox, stert up at oones,
And by the garget hente Chaunteclere
And on his bak toward the wood him bere.
CHAUCER: The Nonnes Prestes Tale.

Russia Leather. A fine leather of a smooth texture, originally produced in Russia. It is the result of tanning and dyeing (usually of a red colour) by a particular process and the distinctive smell comes from the distillation of birch bark used in the manufacture.

Rustam, or Rustem. The Persian Hercules, the son of Zal, prince of Sedjistan, famous for his victory over the white dragon Asdeev. His combat for two days with Prince Isfendiar is a favourite subject with the Persian poets. Matthew Arnold's poem Sohrab and Rustam gives an account of Rustam fighting with and killing his son Sohrab.

Let Zāl and Rustum bluster as they will,
Or Hātum call to Supper—heed not you.
FITZGERALD: Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, x.

Rusty. He turns rusty. Like a rusty bolt, he sticks and will not move; he's obstinate.

Rye-house Plot. A conspiracy in 1683 for the assassination of Charles II and his brother James on their way from Newmarket, hatched at the Rye House Farm, in Hertfordshire. As the house in which the king was lodging accidentally caught fire, the royal party left eight days sooner than they had intended, and the plot miscarried. Lord William Russell and Algernon Sidney were among those executed for complicity.

Rymenhild. See KING HORN.

Ryot. A tenant in India who pays a usufruct for his occupation. The Scripture parable of the husbandmen refers to such a tenure; the lord sent for his rent, which was not money but fruits, and the husbandmen stoned those who were sent, refusing to pay their "lord." Ryots have an hereditary and perpetual right of occupancy so long as they pay the usufruct, but if they refuse or neglect payment may be turned away.

S

S. The nineteenth letter of the English alphabet (eighteenth of the ancient Roman), representing the Phœnician and Hebrew shin.

S in the nautical log-book signifies smooth (of the sea) or snowy (weather).

Collar of S.S. or Esses. See COLLAR.

'S. A euphemistic abbreviation of God's, formerly much in use in common oaths and expletives; as 'Sdeath (God's death), 'Sblood, 'Sdeins (God's dignes, i.e. dignity), 'Sfoot, etc. 'Sdeins, I know not what I should say to him, in the whole world! He values me at a crack'd three farthings, for aught I see.—BEN JONSON: Every Man in his Humour, ii, 1.

$. The typographical sign for the dollar. It is thought to be a variation of the 8 with which "pieces of eight" (q.v.) were stamped, and was in use in the United States before the adoption of the Federal currency in 1785. Another, perhaps fanciful, derivation is from the letters U.S.

S.J. (Societas Jesu). The Society of Jesus; denoting that the priest after whose name these letters are placed is a Jesuit.

S O S. The arbitrary code signal used by wireless operators on board ship to summon the assistance of any vessels within call; hence, an urgent appeal for help.

The letters have been held to stand for save our souls or save our ship, but they were adopted merely for convenience, being 3 dots, 3 dashes, and 3 dots, . . . — — — . . .

S.P.Q.R. Senatus Populusque Romanus (the Roman Senate and People). Letters inscribed on the standards, etc., of ancient Rome.

SS. (Ger.). Schutzstaffel. an armed force that originated as part of Hitler's bodyguard in 1923, with the predominant SA (Sturmabteilung). In 1929 Heinrich Himmler took over the SS and defining its duties as "to find out, to fight and to destroy all open and secret enemies of the Führer, the National Socialist Movement, and our racial resurrection," raised it to a position of dominating power and great numerical strength. During World War II SS Divisions fought with fanatical intensity.

S.T.P. Sanctæ Theologiæ Professor. Professor is the Latin equivalent of the scholastic Doctor. "D.D."—i.e. Doctor of Divinity—is the English equivalent of "S.T.P."

Sabæans, or Sabeans (sā bē' ānz). The ancient people of Yemen, in south-western Arabia; from Arabic Saba', or Sheba, which was supposed to be the capital.

Sabaism (sāb' ā izm). The worship of the stars, or the "host of heaven" (from Heb. Caba, host). The term is sometimes erroneously applied to the religion of the Sabians. See SABIANISM.

Sabaoth (sā bā' oth). The Bible phrase Lord God of Sabaoth means Lord God of Hosts, not of the Sabbath, Sabaoth being Hebrew for "armies" or "hosts." The epithet has been frequently misunderstood; see, for instance, the last stanza of Spenser's Faerie Queene (VII, viii, 2):—

All that moveth doth in change delight:

But thenceforth all shall rest eternally

With Him that is the God of Sabaoth hight:

O! that great Sabaoth God, grant me that Sabbath's sight!

Sabbath (sāb' āth) (Heb. shabath, to rest). Properly, the seventh day of the week, enjoined on the ancient Hebrews by the fourth Commandment (Exod. xx, 8-11) as a day of rest and worship; the Christian Sunday, "the Lord's Day," the first day of the week, is often, wrongly, alluded to as "the Sabbath."

A Sabbath Day's journey (Exod. xvi, 29; Acts i, 12), with the Jews was not to exceed the distance between the ark and the extreme end of the camp. This was 2,000 cubits, somewhat short of an English mile.

Up to the hill by Hebron, seat of giants old,
No journey of a Sabbath Day, and loaded so.

MILTON: Samson Agonistes.

Days set apart as Sabbaths. Sunday by Christians; Monday by the Greeks; Tuesday by the Persians; Wednesday by the Assyrians; Thursday by the Egyptians; Friday by the Mohammedans; Saturday by the Jews.

Witches Sabbath. See WITCH.

Sabbathians (sā bā' thi ānz). The disciples of Sabbathais Zwi, or Tsebhi of Smyrna (1626-76), perhaps the most remarkable "Messiah" of modern times. At the age of fifteen he had mastered the Talmud, and at eighteen the Cabbala. When in a Turkish prison he embraced Mohammedanism, and later formed a half-Mohammedan and half-Jewish sect of Cabalists.

Sabbatical Year (sà bāt' i kál). One year in seven, when all land with the ancient Jews was to lie fallow for twelve months. This law was founded on Exod. xxiii, 10, etc.; Lev. xxv, 2-7; Deut. xv, 1-11. In certain American and other universities the custom of allowing professors every seven years one full year during which he is free to study or travel without the obligation of teaching or lecturing.

Sabeans. See SABÆANS.

Sabellianism (sà bel' i àn izm). The tenets of the Sabellians, an obscure sect founded in the 3rd century by Sabellius, a Libyan priest. Little is known of their beliefs, but they were Unitarians and held that the Trinity merely expressed three relations or states of one and the same God. See PERSON (Confounding the Persons).

Sabines, The (sáb' inz). An ancient people of central Italy, living in the Apennines N. and NE. of Rome, and subjugated by the Romans about 290 B.C.

The Rape of the Sabine Women. The legend connected with the founding of Rome is that as Romulus had difficulty in providing his followers with wives he invited the men of the neighbouring tribes to a celebration of games. In the absence of the menfolk the Roman youths raided the Sabine territory and carried off all the women they could find. The incident has frequently been treated in art; Rubens' canvas depicting the scene (now in the National Gallery, London) is one of the best known examples.

Sable. The heraldic term for black, shown in engraving by horizontal lines crossing perpendicular ones. The fur of the animal of this name is, of course, brown; but it is probable that in the 15th century, when the heraldic term was first used, the fur was dyed black, as seal fur is to-day.

Sable fur was always much sought after, and very expensive.

By the Statute of Apparel (24 Henry VIII c. 13) it is ordained that none under the degree of an earl shall use sables. Bishop tells us that a thousand ducats were sometimes given for a "face of sables" (Blossoms, 1577). Ben Jonson says, "Would you not laugh to meet a great councillor of state in a flat cap, with trunk-hose . . . and yond haberdasher in a velvet gown trimmed with sables?" (Discoveries).

A suit of sables. A rich courtly dress.

So long? Nay, then, let the devil wear black, for I'll have a suit of sables.—Hamlet, iii, 2.

Sabotage (sáb' ó tazh). Wilful and malicious destruction of tools, plant, machinery, materials, etc., by discontented workmen or strikers. The term came into use after the great French railway strike in 1912, when the strikers cut the shoes (sabots) holding the railway lines.

Sabreur (sa brér'). Le beau sabreur, the handsome swordsman. This was the name given to Joachim Murat (1767-1815), King of Naples and brother-in-law of Napoleon. He was in command of the cavalry in many of Napoleon's greatest battles.

Sabrina (sa brí' ná). The Latin name of the river Severn, but in British legend the name of the daughter of Locrine and his concubine Estrildis. Locrine's queen, Guendolen, vowed vengeance against Estrildis and her daughter, gathered an army together, and overthrew her husband. Sabrina fled and jumped into the Severn; Nereus took pity on her, and made her goddess of the river, which is hence poetically called Sabrina.

There is a gentle nymph not far from hence,
That with moist curb sways the smooth Severn stream,
Sabrina is her name, a virgin pure.

MILTON: Comus, 840.

Saccharissa (sāk á ris' á). A name bestowed by Edmund Waller on Lady Dorothy Sidney (b. 1617), eldest daughter of the Earl of Leicester, who, in 1639, married Lord Spencer of Wormleighton, afterwards Earl of Sunderland. Aubrey says that Waller was passionately in love with the lady, but the poems themselves give the impression that the affair was merely a poetical pose.

Sacco Benedetto or San Benito (sāk' ō ben é det' ō, sán bè nē' tō) (Span., the blessed sack or cloak). The yellow linen robe with two crosses on it, and painted over with flames and devils, in which persons condemned by the Spanish Inquisition were arrayed when they went to the stake. See AUTO DA FÉ. In the case of those who expressed repentance for their errors, the flames were directed downwards. Penitents who had been taken before the Inquisition had to wear this badge for a stated period. Those worn by Jews, sorcerers, and renegades bore a St. Andrew's cross in red on back and front.

Sachem (sā' chem). A chief among some of the North American Indian tribes. Sagamore is a similar title.

Sack. A bag. According to tradition, it was the last word uttered before the tongues were confounded at Babel.

Sack was used of any loose upper garment hanging down the back from the shoulders; hence "sac-friars" or fratres saccati.

To get the sack, or To be sacked. To get discharged by one's employer. The phrase was current in France in the 17th century (On luy a donné son sac); and the probable explanation of the term is that mechanics carried their implements in a bag or sack, and when discharged received it back so that they might replace in it their tools, and seek a job elsewhere. The Sultan used to put into a sack, and throw into the Bosphorus, any one of his harem he wished out of the way; but there is no connexion between this and our saying.

A sack race. A village sport in which each runner is tied up to the neck in a sack. In some cases the candidates have to make short leaps, in other cases they are at liberty to run as well as the limits of the sack will allow them.

Sack. Any dry wine, as sherry sack, Madeira sack, Canary sack, and Palm sack. (From Fr. sec, dry.)

Sackerson (sāk' er sôn). The famous bear kept at Paris Garden (q.v.) in Shakespeare's time.

Sacrament. Originally "a military oath" (Lat. sacramentum) taken by the Roman soldiers not to desert their standard, turn their back on the enemy, or abandon their general. We also, in the sacrament of baptism, take a military oath "to fight manfully under the banner of Christ." The early Christians used the word to signify "a sacred mystery," and hence its application to baptism, the Eucharist, marriage, confirmation, etc.

The five sacraments are Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction. These are not counted "Sacraments of the Gospel." See Thirty-nine Articles, Article xxv.

The seven sacraments are Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction.

The two sacraments of the Protestant Churches are Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

Sacramentarians. Those who believe that no change takes place in the eucharistic elements after consecration, but that the bread and wine are simply emblems of the body and blood of Christ. The name is applied specially to a party of 16th-century German Reformers who separated from Luther.

Sacred. Applied to that which is consecrated (Lat. sacrare, to consecrate), or dedicated to, or set apart for, religious use.

The Sacred Band. A body of 300 Theban "Ironsides" who fought against Sparta in the 4th century B.C. They specially distinguished themselves at Leuctra (371), and the Band was annihilated at Chæronea (338).

The Sacred City. See HOLY CITY.

The Sacred College. The College of Cardinals (q.v.) at Rome.

The Sacred Heart. The "Feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus" owes its origin to a French nun of the 17th century, St. Mary Margaret Alacoque, of Burgundy, who practised devotion to the Saviour's heart in consequence of a vision. The devotion was sanctioned by Pope Clement XII in 1732, and extended to the whole Church by Pius IX in 1856. It is observed on the Friday after the octave of Corpus Christi.

The Sacred Isle, or Holy Island. An epithet used of Ireland because of its many saints, and of Guernsey for its many monks. The island referred to by Moore in his Irish Melodies is Scattery, to which St. Senanus retired, and vowed that no woman should set foot thereon.

Oh, haste and leave this sacred isle,
Unholy bark, ere morning smile.

St. Senanus and the Lady.

Enhallow (from the Norse Eynhalga, holy isle) is the name of a small island in the Orkney group, where cells of the Irish anchorite fathers are said still to exist.

See also HOLY ISLE.

Sacred Majesty, a title applied to the sovereigns of Great Britain in the 17th and 18th centuries.

B.D.—26

The Sacred War. In Greek history, one of the wars waged by the Amphictyonic League in defence of the temple and oracle of Delphi.

(1) Against the Cirmæans (594-587 B.C.).

(2) For the restoration of Delphi to the Phocians, from whom it had been taken (448-447 B.C.).

(3) Against Philip of Macedon (346 B.C.).

The Sacred Way. See VIA SACRA.

The Sacred Weed, Vervain (see Herba Sacra), or—humorously—tobacco.

Sacring Bell (sāk' ring). The bell rung in R.C. churches at the consecration of the Host, or at its elevation. Now called Sanctus Bell, from the words Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus, dominus, Deus Sabaoth, pronounced by the priest. From the obsolete verb to sacre, to consecrate, used especially of sovereigns and bishops.

He heard a little sacring bell ring to the elevation of a to-morrow mass.—REGINALD SCOTT: Discovery of Witchcraft (1584).

The sacring of the kings of France.—Temple.

Sacy's Bible. See BIBLES SPECIALLY NAMED.

Sad. He's a sad dog. A playful way of saying a man is a debauchee.

Sad bread (Lat. panis gravis). Heavy bread, bread that has not risen properly. Shakespeare calls it "distressful bread"—not the bread of distress, but the panis gravis or ill-made bread eaten by those who can't get better. In America unleavened cakes are known as sad cakes.

Sadism (sā' dizm). The unscientific term for the obtaining of sexual satisfaction through the infliction of pain or humiliation on another person or even an animal. The word is also applied to the morbid pleasure certain psychological states experience in being cruel or in watching acts of cruelty. The term comes from the Marquis de Sade (1740-1814), a French writer, of notorious ill behaviour and perversion, whose novels Justine (1791) and Les crimes de l'amour (1800) exhibited this psychological state of mind.

Saddle. A saddle of mutton. The two loins with the connecting vertebrae.

Boot and saddle. See BOOT.

Lose the horse and win the saddle. See LOSE.

Saddle-bag furniture. Chairs and so on upholstered in a cheap kind of carpeting, the design of which is based on that of the saddlebags carried by camels in the East.

Set the saddle on the right horse. Lay the blame on those who deserve it.

To be in the saddle. To be in a position of authority, in office; also to be ready for work and eager to get on with it.

To saddle with the responsibility. To put the responsibility on, to make responsible for.

Sadducees (sād' ū sēz). A Jewish party which existed about the time of Christ, and denied the existence of spirits and angels, and disbelieved in the resurrection of the dead; said to be so called from Sadoc or Zadok (see 2 Sam. viii, 17), who is thought to have been a priest or rabbi some three centuries before the birth of Christ. They were opposed to the Pharisees in that they did not accept the oral parts of the Law traditionally handed down from Moses, and as they did not believe in future punishments, they punished offences with the utmost severity.

Sadleirian Lectures (sād lēr' i ān). Lectures on Algebra delivered in the University of Cambridge and founded in accordance with the will of Lady Sadleir (d. 1706), wife of Sir Edwin Sadleir. The first lecture was delivered in Emmanuel, 1710. The lectures were discontinued in 1860 and a professorship of Pure Mathematics substituted for them.

Sadler's Wells (near Islington, London). There was a well at this place called Holy Well, once noted for "its extraordinary cures." The priests of Clerkenwell Priory used to boast of its virtues. At the Reformation it was stopped up, and was wholly forgotten till 1683, when a certain Sadler, in digging gravel for his garden, accidentally discovered it again. Hence the name. In 1765 a builder named Rosoman converted Sadler's garden into a theatre that became famous for burlettas, musical interludes and pantomimes. In 1772 the famous comedian Thomas King took over the management until he succeeded Sheridan at Drury Lane. Edmund Kean, Dibdin and many other great actors appeared at Sadler's Wells, and the great clown Grimaldi made his fame there. In 1844 Phelps took over the theatre and produced Shakespeare, but the boom in the West End theatres cast the Wells into the shade, though it enjoyed some popularity from 1875 until 1881 under the management of Mrs. Bateman. In 1931 Lilian Baylis (d. 1937), who for over thirty years had managed the Old Vic, opened Sadler's Wells for the production of ballet and opera and made it one of the leading houses in London.

Safety. Safety bicycle. See PENNYFARTHING.

Safety matches. In 1847 Schrotter, an Austrian chemist, discovered that red phosphorus gives off no fumes, and is virtually inert; but being mixed with chlorate of potash under slight pressure it explodes with violence. In 1855 Herr Böttger, of Sweden, put the one on the box and the other on the match; and later improvements have resulted in the match being tipped with a mixture of chlorate of potash, sulphide of antimony, bichromate of potassium and red lead, while on the box is a mixture of non-poisonous amorphous phosphorus and black oxide of manganese, so that the match must be rubbed on the box to bring the two together. Cp. PROMETHEANS; LUCIFERS.

Saffron. He hath slept in a bed of saffron (Lat. dormivit in sacco croci). He has a very light heart, in reference to the exhilarating effects of saffron.

With genial joy to warm his soul,
Helen mixed saffron in the bowl.

Saga (plural Sagas) (sa' gā). The Teutonic and Scandinavian mythological and historical traditions, chiefly compiled in the 12th and three following centuries. The most remarkable are those of Lodbrog, Hervara, Vilkinsa, Voluspa, Volsunga, Blomsturvalla, Ynglinga,

Olaf Tryggva-Sonar, with those of Jomsvikingia and of Knytinga (which contain the legendary history of Norway and Denmark), those of Sturlinga and Eryrbiggia (which contain the legendary history of Iceland), and the collections, the Heims-Kringla and New Edda, due to Snorro-Sturleson. Cp. EDDA.

Sagamore. See SACHEM.

Sages, The Seven. See WISE MEN.

Sagittarius (sāji tār' i ūs) (Lat., the archer) One of the old constellations, the ninth sign of the Zodiac, which the sun enters about November 22nd. It represents the centaur Chiron, who at death was converted into the constellation.

Sagittary (sāj' i tā ri). The name given in the mediæval romances to the centaur, a mythical monster half horse and half man, whose eyes sparked like fire and struck dead like lightning, fabled to have been introduced into the Trojan armies.

The dreadful Sagittary
Appals our numbers.

Troilus and Cressida, v. 5.

The "Sagittary" referred to in Othello i. 1:—
Lead to the Sagittary the raised search,
And there will I be with him,

was probably an inn, but may have been the Arsenal.

Sahib (sab, sa' ib) (Urdu, friend). A form of address used by Hindus to Europeans, about equivalent to our "Sir" in "Yes, sir," "No, sir." Also, an Englishman or European, a woman being Mem-sahib. The word is also used colloquially to describe a cultured, refined man.

Sail. Sailing under false colours. Pretending to be what you are not with the object of personal advantage. The allusion is to pirate vessels, which hoist any colours to elude detection.

To sail before the wind, close to the wind, etc. See WIND.

To set sail. To start a voyage.

To strike sail. See STRIKE.

You may hoist sail. Be off. Maria saucily says to Viola, dressed in man's apparel—
Will you hoist sail, sir? Here lies your way.—
Twelfth Night, i. 5.

Sailor King, The. William IV of England (1765, 1830-37), who entered the navy as midshipman in 1779, and was made Lord High Admiral in 1827.

Saint. Individual saints who have a place in this Dictionary of Phrase and Fable will be found entered under their names. For symbols of saints see SYMBOLS.

Alexander III (1159-81) was the first Pope to restrict the right of canonization (i.e. the making of a saint) to the Holy See; before his time it was performed by a synod of bishops and merely ratified by the Pope. It was not till the 4th century that persons other than martyrs were canonized, and none was inscribed on the Roll of the Saints until 608, when Boniface IV dedicated the Pantheon to St. Mary of the Martyrs. The first saint to be made direct by a Pope was St. Swidborg, canonized in 752 by Stephen II at the request of Pepin. St. Alban, the English protomartyr, was canonized in 749 by Hadrian I, to please the Mercian King, Offa.

Popes who have been canonized. From the time of St. Peter to the end of the 4th century all the Popes (with a few minor and doubtful exceptions) are popularly entitled "Saint"; since then the following are the chief of those bearing the title:—

Innocent I (402-17).
 Leo the Great (440-61).
 John I (523-26).
 Gregory the Great (590-604).
 Deusdedit I (615-19).
 Martin I (649-54).
 Leo II (682-84).
 Sergius I (687-701).
 Zacharias (741-52).
 Paul I (757-67).
 Leo III (795-816).
 Paschal I (817-24).
 Nicholas the Great (858-67).
 Leo IX (1049-54).
 Gregory VII, Hildebrand (1073-85).
 Celestine V (1294).
 Pius V (1566-72).

Among the kings and royalties so called are—

Edward the Martyr (961, 975-78).
 Edward the Confessor (1004, 1042-66).
 Eric IX of Sweden (? 1155-61).
 Ethelred I, king of Wessex (? 866-871).
 Ferdinand III of Castile and Leon (1200, 1217-52).

Irene (d. 1124), the Empress; daughter of the king of Hungary and consort of John Comnenus, Byzantine Emperor.

Lawrence Justiniani, Patriarch of Venice (1390, 1451-55).

Louis IX of France (1215, 1226-70).
 Margaret (d. 1093), queen of Scotland, wife of William III.

Olaus II of Norway, brother of Harald III, called "St. Olaf the Double Beard" (984, 1026-30).

Stephen I of Hungary (979, 997-1038).
 Theodora (d. 867), Empress; consort of the Byzantine Emperor, Theophilus.

Wenceslaus (910, 928-936), king of Bohemia. It is only rarely that persons are canonized now; Joan of Arc was canonized in 1909; in 1935 Pius XI canonized Sir Thomas More (1478-1535) and John Fisher (1459-1535), Bishop of Rochester, who had suffered for the Faith under Henry VIII.

The City of Saints. See CITY.

The Island of Saints. So Ireland was called in the Middle Ages.

The Latter-day Saints. The Mormons (q.v.).

St. Befana. There is no saint of this name, which is a corruption of Epiphany. See BEFANA.

St. Bernard Passes. Two Alpine passes into Italy, the Great St. Bernard from Switzerland, the Little St. Bernard from France. On the former is the famous hospice founded by St. Bernard of Menthon (923-1008, canonized, 1681), served by the Augustinian Canons. From earliest times they have succoured pilgrims and others crossing the Pass, for this purpose breeding the large and handsome St. Bernard Dog, trained to track and aid travellers lost in the snow. In May, 1800, Napoleon made his famous passage of the Alps across the Great St. Bernard Pass with 30,000 men. A military feat as the road did not then exist, the only track being a bridle-path.

St. Cloud. A palace where many important events in French history took place, formerly stood some mile and a half west of Paris, on the Seine. It was built on the site of an older chateau in 1658 by Louis XIV, and given to his brother the Duke of Orleans. Louis XVI bought it from that family and gave it to Marie Antoinette; it was later a favourite residence of Napoleon and Napoleon III. It was badly damaged during the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, and on the fall of the Empire was demolished by the Communards in 1871.

St. Cyr, or St.-Cyr-l'Ecole. The famous French military academy, about 14 miles south-west of Paris. The building was formerly occupied by the girls' school founded by Mme de Maintenon, where Racine's Esther and Athalie were first acted. The girls' school was suppressed at the Revolution, and in 1808 Napoleon moved the military school thither from Fontainebleau. The building was destroyed by the R.A.F. in World War II.

St. Elmo, or St. Elmo's Fire. The corpusant (Port. corpo santo, sacred body), or compositant, an electrical luminosity often seen on the masts and rigging of ships on dark, stormy nights. There is no saint of this name, and the suggestions are that "Elmo" is a corruption of St. Anselm (of Lucca), St. Erasmus (the patron saint of Neapolitan sailors), or of Helena, sister of Castor and Pollux (q.v.), by which twin-name the St. Elmo's Fire is also known.

St. Francis's Distemper. Impenitency; being moneyless. Those of the Order of St. Francis were not allowed to carry any money about them.

I saw another case of gentlemen of St. Francis's distemper.—RABELAIS: Pantagruel, v, 21.

St. Germain's, The Court of. The intriguing circle of exiled English nobles and others that surrounded James II after his deposition, when he had settled at the chateau of St. Germain-en-Laye (on the Seine, about 8 miles NNW. of Paris), a former residence of François I, Louis XIV, and others.

St. Giles's. See GILES.

St. James's, The Court of. See under JAMES.

St. John Lateran. See LATERAN.

St. Johnstone's Tippet. A halter; so called from Johnstone the hangman.

St. Leger Sweepstakes. A horse-race for three-year-olds, run at Doncaster early in September. It was instituted in 1776 by Colonel Anthony St. Leger, of Park Hill, near Doncaster, but was not called the "St. Leger" till two years afterwards.

St. Martin's le Grand. The familiar name for the central offices of the General Post Office, because from 1825 its headquarters have been on and about the site of the ancient church and monastery of this name (dating from pre-Conquest times) at the south-west corner of Aldersgate Street, London.

St. Martin's Summer. See SUMMER.

St. Monday. A facetious name sometimes given to Monday because many workmen and others who like an extended "week-end" make it a holiday (holy day!). There is a story in the Journal of the Folk-lore Society recording that—

While Cromwell's army lay encamped at Perth, one of his zealous partisans, named Monday, died, and Cromwell offered a reward for the best lines on his death. A shoemaker of Perth brought the following:—

Blessed be the Sabbath Day,

And cursed be worldly feif;

Tuesday will begin the week,

Since Monday's hanged himself, which so pleased Cromwell that he not only gave the promised reward but made also a decree that shoemakers should be allowed to make Monday a standing holiday.

St. Patrick's Purgatory. See PATRICK.

St. Petersburg. The former name of the capital of the old Russian Empire, so called in honour of Peter the Great, who founded it in 1703. Soon after the outbreak of World War I it was changed by Imperial rescript to Petrograd, this being the Russian, while the other is a German, equivalent of Peter's Town. In 1924 the name of the place was changed again, to Leningrad, in honour of Lenin (1870-1924) the virtual founder of the U.S.S.R. Leningrad withstood one of the greatest sieges of World War II, from 1941 until 1944.

St. Simonism. The social and political system of Count de St. Simon (1760-1825), the founder of French Socialism, who proposed the institution of a European parliament to arbitrate in all matters affecting Europe, and the establishment of a social hierarchy based on capacity and labour. Fable says that he was led to his "social system" by the apparition of Charlemagne, which appeared to him one night in the Luxembourg, where he was suffering a temporary imprisonment.

St. Stephen's. The Houses of Parliament are so called, because, at one time, the Commons used to sit in St. Stephen's Chapel.

St. Stephen's Loaves. Stones; the allusion, of course, is to the stoning of St. Stephen (Acts vii, 54-60).

Having said this, he took up one of St. Stephen's loaves, and was going to hit him with it.—RABELAIS: Pantagruel, v, 8.

Sake. A form of the obsolete word sac (A.S. sacu, a dispute or lawsuit), meaning some official right or privilege, such as that of holding a manorial court.

The common phrases For God's sake, for conscience' sake, for goodness' sake, etc., mean "out of consideration for" God, conscience, etc.

For old sake's sake. For the sake of old acquaintance, past times.

For one's name's sake. Out of regard for one's character or good name.

Sakes! or Sakes alive! Expressions of surprise, admiration, etc., commoner in the United States than in England.

Saker (sā' ker). A piece of light artillery, used, especially on board ship, in the 16th and 17th centuries. The word is borrowed from the saker hawk (falcon).

The cannon, blunderbuss, and saker,

He was the inventor of and maker.

BUTLER: Hudibras, i, 2.

Sakuntala (sā kun' ta la). The heroine of Kalidasa's great Sanskrit drama, Sakuntala. She was the daughter of a sage, Viswamita, and Menakā, a water-nymph, and was brought up by a hermit. One day King Dushyanta came to the hermitage during a hunt, and persuaded her to marry him; and later, giving her a ring, returned to his throne. A son was born, and Sakuntala set out with him to find his father. On the way, while bathing, she lost the ring, and the king did not recognize her owing to enchantment. Subsequently it was found by a fisherman in a fish he had caught (cp. KENTIGERN), the king recognized his wife, she was publicly proclaimed his queen, and Bhārata, his son and heir, became the founder of the glorious race of the Bhāratas.

Sakya-Muni (sak' ya mū' ni). One of the names of Gautama Siddhartha, the Buddha (q.v.), founder of Buddhism.

Salaam (sā lam'). An Oriental salutation of a ceremonious nature, often with a profound obeisance. In Arabic the word means "peace."

Salad. A pen'orth of salad oil. A strapping; a castigation. It is a joke on All Fool's Day to send one to the saddler's for a "pen'orth of salad oil." The pun is between "salad oil," as above, and the French avoir de la salade, "to be flogged." The French salader and salade are derived from the salle or saddle on which schoolboys were at one time birched. A block for the purpose is still kept as a curiosity in some of our public schools.

Salad days. Days of inexperience, when persons are very green.

My salad days.

When I was green in judgment.

Antony and Cleopatra, i, 5.

Salamander (sāl' à măn der) (Gr. salamandra, a kind of lizard). The name is now given to a family of amphibious urodela (newts, etc.), but anciently to a mythical lizard-like monster that was supposed to be able to live in fire, which, however, it quenched by the chill of its body. Pliny tells us he tried the experiment once, but the creature was soon burnt to a powder (Nat. Hist. x, 67; xxix, 4). It was adopted by Paracelsus as the name of the elemental being inhabiting fire (gnomes being those of the earth, sylphs of the air, and undines of the water), and was hence taken over by the Rosicrucian system, from which source Pope introduced salamanders into his Rape of the Lock.

When the Fair in all their Pride expire,

To their first Elements the Souls retire:

The Sprites of fiery Termagants in Flame

Mount up, and take a Salamander's name.

Rape of the Lock, i, 57.

François I of France adopted as his badge a lizard in the midst of flames, with the legend Nutrisco et extinguo (I nourish and extinguish). The Italian motto from which this legend was borrowed was Nutrisco il buono e spengo il reo (I nourish the good and extinguish the bad). Fire purifies good metal, but consumes rubbish.

Falstaff calls Bardolph's nose "a burning lamp," "a salamander," and the drink that made such "a fiery meteor" he calls "fire." I have maintained that salamander of yours with fire any time this two-and-thirty years.—1 Henry IV, iv, 3.

Salamander's wool. Asbestos, a fibrous mineral, affirmed by the Tartars to be made "of the root of a tree." It is sometimes called "mountain flax," and is not combustible.

Salary. Originally "salt rations" (Lat. salarium, salp, salt). The ancient Romans served out rations of salt and other necessities to their soldiers and civil servants. The rations altogether were called by the general name of salt, and when money was substituted for the rations the stipend went by the same name.

Sales Resistance. The negative attitude of a possible buyer which hinders or prevents the sale of a commodity.

Salic (säl' ik). Pertaining to the Salian Franks, a tribe of Franks who, in the 4th century A.D., established themselves on the banks of the Sala (now known as the Yssel), and became the ancestors of the Merovingian kings of France.

Which Salique, as I said, 'twixt Elbe and Sala,
Is at this day in Germany called Meisen.

Henry V, i, 2.

Salic Code. A Frankish law-book, written in Latin, extant during the Merovingian and Carolingian periods.

The Salic Law. A law derived from the Salic Code limiting succession to the throne, land, etc., to heirs male to the exclusion of females, chiefly because certain military duties were connected with the holding of lands. In the early 14th century it became the fundamental law of the French monarchy, and the claim of Edward III to the French throne, based on his interpretation of the law, resulted in the Hundred Years War. It was also through the operation of the Salic Law that the Crowns of Hanover and England were separated when Queen Victoria came to the throne in 1837. The revocation of the Salic Law in Spain by Ferdinand VII, in order that his daughter Isabella should succeed him on the throne, tore the country into two factions, the Isabelitas and the Carlists who fought for the claims of Ferdinand's brother Don Carlos. The Carlist war raged from 1830 to 1840 and again from 1872 to 1876.

Saliens, The. In ancient Rome, a college of twelve priests of Mars traditionally instituted by Numa. The tale is that a shield (see ANGLE) fell from heaven, and the nymph Egeria predicted that wherever it was preserved the people would be the dominant people of the earth. To prevent its being surreptitiously taken away, Numa had eleven others made exactly like it, and appointed twelve priests as guardians. Every year these young patricians promenaded the city, singing and dancing, and they finished the day with a most sumptuous banquet, inasmuch that saliarum cena became proverbial for a most sumptuous feast. The word "saliens" means dancing.

Nunc est bibendum.

... nunc Saliaribus

Ornare pulvinar Deorum

Tempus erat dapibus.

HORACE: 1 Odes, xxxvii, 2-4.

Salisbury Crags. These rocky hills, near Arthur's Seat just outside Edinburgh, are so called from the Earl of Salisbury who accompanied Edward III on an expedition against the Scots.

Sallee-man, or Sallee rover. A pirate-ship; so called from Sallee, a seaport on the west coast of Morocco, the inhabitants of which were formerly notorious for their piracy.

Sally Lunn. A tea-cake; so called from a woman pastrycook of that name in Bath, who used to cry them about in a basket at the close of the 18th century. Dalmer, the baker, bought her recipe, and made a song about the buns.

Salmacis (säl' mã sis). A fountain of Caria, which rendered effeminate all those who bathed therein. It was in this fountain that Hermaphroditus changed his sex. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, iv, 285, and xvi, 319.)

Salmagundi (säl' mã gũn' di). A mixture of minced veal, chicken, or turkey, anchovies or pickled herrings, and onions, all chopped together and served with lemon-juice and oil. The word appeared in the 17th century; its origin is unknown, but fable has it that it was the name of one of the ladies attached to the suite of Mary de Medicis, wife of Henri IV of France, who either invented or popularized the dish.

In 1807 Washington Irving published a humorous periodical with this as the title.

Salop. See SHROPSHIRE.

Salt. Flavour, smack. The salt of youth is that vigour and strong passion which then predominates.

Though we are justices, and doctors, and churchmen, Master Page, we have some salt of our youth in us.—Merry Wives of Windsor, ii, 3.

Shakespeare uses the term on several occasions for strong amorous passion. Thus Iago refers to it as "hot as monkeys, salt as wolves in pride" (Othello, iii, 3). The Duke calls Angelo's base passion his "salt imagination," because he supposed his victim to be Isabella, and not his betrothed wife whom the Duke forced him to marry (Measure for Measure, v, 1.)

A sailor of large experience is often called an old salt, the reason is obvious—he has been well salted by the sea.

Spilling salt was held to be an unlucky omen by the Romans, and the superstition remains to this day, though, with us, the evil may be averted if he who spills the salt throw a pinch of it over the left shoulder with the right hand. In Leonardo da Vinci's famous picture of the Lord's Supper, Judas Iscariot is known by the salt-cellar knocked over accidentally by his arm. Salt was used in sacrifice by the Jews, as well as by the Greeks and Romans; and it is still used in baptism by Roman Catholics. It was an emblem of purity and the sanctifying influence of a holy life on others. Hence our Lord tells his disciples they are "the salt of the earth" (Matt. v, 13). Spilling the salt after it was placed on the head of the victim was a bad omen, hence the superstition.

It is still not uncommon to put salt into a coffin; for it is said that Satan hates salt, because it is the symbol of incorruption and immortality; and in Scotland it was long customary to throw a handful of salt on the top of the mash when brewing, to keep the witches from it. Salt really has some effect in moderating the fermentation and fining the liquor.

A covenant of salt (Numb. xviii, 19). A covenant which could not be broken. As salt was a symbol of incorruption, it, of course, symbolized perpetuity.

The Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom . . . to David . . . by a covenant of salt.—2 Chron. xiii, 5.

Attic salt. See ATTIC.

He won't earn salt for his porridge. He will never earn a penny.

If the salt have lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted? (Matt. v, 13.) If men fall from grace, how shall they be restored? The reference is to rock salt, which loses its saltiness if exposed to the hot sun.

Not worth your salt. Not worth your wages. The reference is to the salary (q.v.) composed of rations of salt and other necessities served out by the Romans to their soldiers, etc.

Put some salt on his tail. Catch or apprehend him. The phrase is based on the direction given to small children to lay salt on a bird's tail if they want to catch it.

The salt of the earth. Properly, the elect; the perfect, or those approaching perfection (see Matt. v, 13).

To eat a man's salt. To partake of his hospitality. Among the Arabs to eat a man's salt was a sacred bond between the host and guest. No one who has eaten of another's salt should speak ill of him or do him an ill turn.

Why dost thou shun the salt? that sacred pledge,
Which, once partaken, blunts the sabre's edge,
Makes even contending tribes in peace unite,
And hated hosts seem brethren to the sight!

BYRON: The Corsair, ii, iv.

To salt a mine. To introduce pieces of ore, etc., into the workings so as to delude prospective purchasers or shareholders into the idea that a worthless mine is in reality a profitable investment.

To salt an account, invoice, etc. To put the extreme value upon each article, and even something more, to give it piquancy and raise its market value.

To sit above the salt—in a place of distinction. Formerly the family saler (salt cellar) was of massive silver, and placed in the middle of the table. Persons of distinction sat above the "saler"—i.e. between it and the head of the table; dependents and inferior guests sat below.

True to his salt. Faithful to his employers. Here salt means salary (q.v.).

With a grain of salt (Lat. Cum grano salis). With great reservations or limitation; allowing it merely a grain of truth. As salt is sparingly used in condiments, so is truth in remarks to which this phrase is applied.

To row a man up Salt River. (U.S.A.). To discomfit or defeat him, especially in a political sense.

Salt Hill. The mound at Eton where the Eton scholars used to collect money for the Captain at the Montem (q.v.). All the money collected was called salt (cp. SALARY).

Salt lick. A place [where salt is found naturally and in a position available to animals which resort thither to lick it from the rocks, etc.

Salute, Salutation. According to tradition, on the triumphant return of Maximilian to Germany, after his second campaign, the town of Augsburg ordered 100 rounds of cannon to be discharged. The officer on service, fearing to have fallen short of the number, caused an extra round to be added. The town of Nuremberg ordered a like salute, and the custom became established.

Salute in the British navy, between two ships of equal rank, is made by firing an equal number of guns. If the vessels are of unequal rank, the superior fires the fewer rounds.

Royal salute, in the British navy, consists (1) in firing twenty-one great guns, (2) in the officers lowering their sword-points, and (3) in dipping the colours.

In the Army a Royal Salute is 101 guns fired at intervals of 10 seconds.

Discharging guns as a salute. To show that no fear exists, and therefore no guns will be required. This is like "burying the hatchet" (q.v.).

Lowering swords. To express a willingness to put yourself unarmed in the power of the person saluted, from a full persuasion of his friendly feeling.

Presenting arms—i.e. offering to give them up, from the full persuasion of the peaceful and friendly disposition of the person so honoured.

During the British occupation of India the native rulers were all entitled by law to certain salutes, these ranged from 21 guns in the cases of the Maharajahs of Baroda, Gwalior, and Mysore, and the Nizam of Hyderabad, down to 19, 17, 15, 13, and 11 guns to rulers of lesser States.

Shaking hands. A relic of the ancient custom of adversaries, in treating of a truce, taking hold of the weapon-hand to ensure against treachery.

Lady's curtsy. A relic of the ancient custom of women going on the knee to men of rank and power, originally to beg mercy, afterwards to acknowledge superiority.

Taking off the hat. A relic of the ancient custom of taking off the helmet when no danger is nigh. A man takes off his hat to show that he dares stand unarmed in your presence.

Salvation Army. A religious organization founded by William Booth, a Methodist minister. Its origin was the East End Revival Society, which became the Christian Mission in 1865. Booth selected the name Salvation Army in 1877 and organized it on semi-military lines, himself being called "General," having under him "Colonels," "Adjutants," "Corporals," etc. The motto adopted was "Through Blood and Fire," and the activities of the Army were turned to the relief, moral, spiritual and physical, of the poorest and least educated of the population. The work has spread to every part of the world and immense good has been done by the selfless devotion of its rank and file.

Salve. Latin "hail," "welcome." The word is often woven on door-mats.

Salve, Regina! An antiphonal hymn to the Virgin Mary sung in Roman Catholic churches from Trinity Sunday to Advent, after lauds and compline. So called from the opening words. Salve, regina mater misericordiae! (Hail holy Queen, Mother of Mercy).

Sam. To stand Sam. To pay the reckoning. The phrase is said to have arisen from the letters U.S. on the knapsacks of American soldiers. The government of "Uncle Sam" has to pay, or "stand Sam" for all; hence also the phrase Nunky pays for all.

Uncle Sam. The personification of the Government, or the people, of the United States—a facetious adaptation of the initials U.S. (Uncle Sam) placed on government property. The expression arose about 1812 and quickly became popular.

Upon my Sam (or Sammy)! A humorous form of asseveration; also, 'pon my sacred Sam!

Sam Browne belt. The leather belt with straps over the shoulders and originally with a sword-frog, compulsory for officers and warrant officers in the British Army up to 1939, when it was declared optional. This belt was invented by General Sir Sam Browne, V.C. (1824-1901) a veteran of the Indian Mutiny. Its pattern has been adopted by almost every military power in the world.

Samaj. See BRAHMO SOMAJ.

Samanides (sām'a nīdz). A dynasty of ten kings in western Persia (about 872 to 1004), founded by Ismail al Samani.

Samaritan. A good Samaritan. A philanthropist, one who attends upon the poor to aid them and give them relief (Luke x, 30-37).

Sambo. A pet name given to one of Negro race; properly applied to the male offspring of a Negro and mulatto. (Span. zambo, bow-legged; Lat. scambus.)

Samian (sā' mi ān). The Samian letter. The letter  $\chi$ , the Letter of Pythagoras (q.v.), employed by him as the emblem of the straight and narrow path of virtue, which is one, but, if once deviated from, the farther the lines are extended the wider becomes the breach.

When reason doubtful, like the Samian letter,
Points him two ways, the narrower the better.

POPE: Dunciad, iv.

The Samian Poet. Simonides the satirist, born at Samos (about 556 B.C.).

The Samian Sage, or The Samian. Pythagoras born at Samos (6th cent. B.C.).

'Tis enough,
In this late age, adventurous to have touched
Light on the numbers of the Samian sage.

THOMSON.

Samite (sām' it). A rich silk fabric with a warp of six threads, generally interwoven with gold, held in high esteem in the Middle Ages. So called after the Gr. hexamiton, hex, six, mitos, a thread. Cp. DIMITY.

Sampford Ghost, The. A kind of exaggerated "Cock Lane ghost" (q.v.) or Poltergeist, which haunted Sampford Peverell, Devon, for about three years in the first decade of the 19th century. Besides the usual knockings, the inmates were beaten; in one instance a powerful "unattached arm" flung a folio Greek Testament from a bed into the middle of a room. The Rev. Charles Caleb Colton (credited as the author of these freaks) offered £100 to anyone who could explain the matter except on supernatural grounds. No one, however, claimed the reward. Colton died 1832.

Sampo. See KALEVALA.

Sampson. A dominie Sampson. A humble pedantic scholar, awkward, irascible, and very old-fashioned. A character in Scott's Guy Mannering.

Samson. Any man of unusual strength; so called from the ancient Hebrew hero (Judges xiii-xvi). The name has been specially applied to Thomas Topham (d. 1753), the "British Samson," son of a London carpenter. He lifted three hogshead of water (1,836 lb.) in the presence of thousands of spectators at Cold-bath Fields, May 28th, 1741, and eventually committed suicide; and to Richard Joy, the "Kentish Samson," who died 1742, at the age of 67. His tombstone is in St. Peter's churchyard, Isle of Thanet.

Samurai (sām' ū rī). The military class of old Japan. In early feudal times the term was applied to all who bore arms (it means "guard") but eventually it corresponded roughly to the mediæval squires as distinguished from the "daimio" or nobles. On the abolition of the feudal system in 1871 the samurai were forbidden to wear swords, and in 1878 the designation was changed to that of "shizoku," or gentry.

San Benito. See SACCO BENEDETTO.

Sance-bell. Same as "Sanctus bell." See SACRING-BELL.

Sancho Panza (sān' chō pān zā). The squire of Don Quixote (q.v.), in Cervantes's romance, who became governor of Barataria; a short, pot-bellied rustic, full of common sense, but without a grain of "spirituality." He rode upon an ass, Dapple, and was famous for his proverbs. Panza, in Spanish, means paunch.

A Sancho Panza. A rough and ready, sharp and humorous justice of the peace. In allusion to Sancho, as judge in the isle of Barataria.

Sancho Panza's wife, is called Teresa. Pt. ii, i, 5; Maria, Pt. ii, iv, 7; Juana, Pt. i, 7; and Joan, Pt. i, 21.

Sanchoniathon (sang ko ni' à thon). The Fragments of Sanchoniathon are the literary remains of a supposed ancient Phœnician philosopher (alleged to have lived before the Trojan War), which are incorporated in the Phœnician History by Philo of Byblos (1st and 2nd cents. A.D.), which History was drawn upon by Eusebius (about 320 A.D.), the "Father of Church History." The name is Greek and seems to mean "the whole law of Chon"; whether this is the correct interpretation or whether Sanchoniathon is intended to be a personal name, it is probable that there was no such collection or author, and that the name was invented by Philo to give an air of authority and antiquity to his own teachings.

Sanctions. The word employed in International Law to describe the action taken by one or more states to force another state to carry out its legal or treaty obligations.

Sanctum Sanctorum (sǎng' tùm sǎng tór' ùm) (Lat., Holy of Holies). A private room into which no one uninvited enters; properly the Holy of Holies in the Jewish Temple, a small chamber into which none but the high priest might enter, and that only on the Great Day of Atonement.

Sancy Diamond, The. A famous historical diamond (53½ carats) said to have belonged at one time to Charles the Bold of Burgundy, and named after the French ambassador in Constantinople, Nicholas de Harlay, Sieur de Sancy, who, about 1575, bought it for 70,000 francs. Later it was owned by Henri III and Henri IV of France, then by Queen Elizabeth I; James II carried it with him in his flight to France in 1688, when it was sold to Louis XIV for £25,000. Louis XV wore it at his coronation, but during the Revolution it was disposed of to Prince Paul Demidoff for £80,000. In 1865 the Demidoff family sold it to Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy; it was in the market again in 1889, and rumour has it that it was subsequently acquired by the Tsar of Russia. Its present whereabouts is unknown.

Sand. A rope of sand. Something nominally effective and strong, but in reality worthless and untrustworthy.

The sand-man is about. A playful remark addressed to children who are tired and "sleepy-eyed." Cp. DUSTMAN.

The sands are running out. Time is getting short; there will be little opportunity for doing what you have to do unless you take advantage of now. Often used in reference to one who evidently has not much longer to live. The allusion is to the hour-glass.

Alas! dread lord, you see the case wherein I stand, and how little sand is left to run in my poor glass.—
Reynard the Fox, iv.

To plough or to number the sands. To undertake an endless or impossible task.

Alas! poor duke, the task he undertakes
Is numbering sands and drinking oceans dry.

Richard II, ii, 2.

Sand-blind. Dim-sighted; not exactly blind, but with eyes of very little use. Sand- is here a corruption of the obsolete prefix sam-, meaning "half." English used to have sam- dead, sam-ripe, etc., and sam-sodden still survives in some dialects. In the Merchant of Venice Launcelot Gobbo connects it with sand, the gritty earth.

This is my true-begotten father, who, being more than sand-blind, high-gravel blind, knows me not.—
Merchant of Venice, ii, 2.

Sandabar or Sindibad (sǎnd' a bâr, sind' i bâd). Names given to a mediæval collection of tales that are very much the same as those in the Greek Syntipas the Philosopher and the Arabic Romance of the Seven Viziers (known in Western Europe as The Seven Sages (Wise Masters), and derived from the Fables of Bidpai (q.v.). These names do not, in all probability, stand for the author or compiler, but result from Hebrew mistranslations of the Arabic equivalent of Bidpai or Pilpay.

Sandal. A man without sandals. A prodigal; so called by the ancient Jews, because the seller gave his sandals to the buyer as a ratification of his bargain (Ruth iv, 7).

He wears the sandals of Theramenes. Said of a trimmer, an opportunist. Theramenes (put to death 404 B.C.) was one of the Athenian oligarchy, and was nicknamed cothurnus (i.e. a sandal or boot which might be worn on either foot), because no dependence could be placed on him. He blew hot and cold with the same breath.

Sandemanians or Glassites (sǎnd é mân' i ânz). A religious party expelled from the Church of Scotland for maintaining that national churches, being "kingdoms of this world," are unlawful. Called Glassites from John Glas (1695-1773), the founder (1728), and called Sandemanians from Robert Sandeman (1718-71), a disciple of his, who published a series of letters on the subject in 1755. Members are admitted by a "holy kiss," and abstain from all animal food which has not been drained of blood; they believe in the community of property, and hold weekly communions.

Sandford and Merton. The schoolboy heroes of Thomas Day's old-fashioned children's tale of this name (published in three parts, 1783-89). "Master" Tommy Merton is rich, selfish, untruthful, and generally objectionable; Harry Sandford, the farmer's son, is depicted as being the reverse in every respect.

Sandwich. A piece of meat between two slices of bread; so called from the fourth Earl of Sandwich (1718-92—the noted "Jemmy Twitche"), who passed whole days in gambling, bidding the waiter bring him for refreshment a piece of meat between two pieces of bread, which he ate without stopping from play. This contrivance was not first hit upon by the earl in the reign of George III, for the Romans were very fond of "sandwiches," called by them offula.

Sandwichman. A perambulating advertisement-displayer, with an advertisement-board before and behind.

Sang-de-beuf (sǎng de berf) (Fr., bullock's blood). The deep red with which ancient Chinese porcelain is often coloured.

Sang-froid (Fr., cold blood). Freedom from excitement or agitation. One does a thing

"with perfect sang-froid" when one does it coolly and collectedly, without unnecessary display.

... cross-legg'd, with great sang-froid
Among the scorching ruins he sat smoking
Tobacco on a little carpet.

BYRON: Don Juan, VIII, cxxi.

Sanger's Circus. This is one of the oldest—and at one time the best known—of the circuses on the road. It was formed from nothing by "Lord" George Sanger (1827-1911) who in 1871 purchased Astley's amphitheatre and menagerie, and about the same time leased the Agricultural Hall, Islington. He carried his big circus or sent subsidiary ones throughout the provinces and into Scotland, and "Sanger's Circus" became an established institution.

Sangrado, Dr. (săn gra' dō). A name often applied to an ignorant or "fossilized" medical practitioner, from the humbug in Le Sage's Gil Blas (1715), a tall, meagre, pale man, of very solemn appearance, who weighed every word he uttered, and gave an emphasis to his sage dicta. "His reasoning was geometrical, and his opinions angular." He prescribed warm water and bleeding for every ailment, for his great theory was that "It is a gross error to suppose that blood is necessary for life."

Sangrail or Sangreal (săng' grāl). The Holy Grail, see GRAIL. Popular etymology used to explain the word as meaning the real blood of Christ, sang-real, or the wine used in the last supper; and a tradition sprang up that part of this wine-blood was preserved by Joseph of Arimathea, in the Saint, or Holy, Grail.

Sanguine (săng' gwin) (Lat. sanguis, sanguinis, blood). The term used in heraldry for the deep red or purplish colour usually known as murrey (from the mulberry). In engravings it is indicated by lines of vert and purple crossed, that is, diagonals from left to right. This is a word with a curious history. Its actual meaning is bloody, or of the colour of blood; hence it came to be applied to one who was ruddy, whose cheeks were red with good health and well-being. From this it was easy to extend the meaning to one who was full of vitality, vivacious, confident and hopeful.

Sanhedrin (săn' i drin) (Gr. syn, together; hedra, a seat; i.e. a sitting together). The supreme council of the ancient Jews, consisting of seventy priests and elders, and a president who, under the Romans, was the high priest. It took its rise soon after the exile from the municipal council of Jerusalem, and was in existence till about A.D. 425, when Theodosius the Younger forbade the Jews to build synagogues. All questions of the "Law" were dogmatically settled by the Sanhedrin, and those who refused obedience were excommunicated.

In Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel (q.v.), the Sanhedrim stands for the English Parliament.

The Sanhedrim long time as chief he ruled,
Their reason guided, and their passion cooled.

San Marino (săn mă rê' nō). The smallest republic in the world. Surrounded by Italian territory it lies 12 m. SW. of Rimini, and consists of only 38 sq. miles. In 1631 the Pope formally acknowledged its independence which was recognized by Italy in 1862.

Sans. (Fr., without).

Sans Culottes (Fr., without knee-breeches). A name given during the French Revolution to the extremists of the working-classes. Hence Sansculottism, the principles, etc., of "red republicans."

Sans Culottides. The five complementary days added to the twelve months of the Revolutionary Calendar, each month being made to consist of thirty days. The days were named in honour of the sans culottes, and made idle days or holidays.

Sans Gêne, Madame. The nickname of the wife of Lefebvre, Duke of Dantzic (1755-1820), one of Napoleon's marshals. She was originally a washer-woman, and followed her husband—then in the ranks—as a vivandière. She was kind and pleasant, but her rough-and-ready ways and ignorance of etiquette soon made her the butt of the court, and earned her the nickname, which means "without constraint" or "free and easy."

Sans peur et sans reproche (Fr., without fear and without reproach). Pierre du Terrail, Chevalier de Bayard (1476-1524) was called Le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche.

Sans Souci (Fr.). Free and easy, void of care. It is the name given by him to the palace built by Frederick the Great near Potsdam (1747).

The Philosopher of Sans-Souci. Frederick the Great (1712, 1740-86).

Enfans Sans Souci. The mediæval French Tradesmen's company of actors, as opposed to the Lawyers', the "Basochians" (q.v.). It was organized in the reign of Charles VIII, for the performance of short comedies, in which public characters and the manners of the day were turned into ridicule; Maitre Pathelin (see MOUTONS), an immense favourite with the Parisians, was one of their pieces. The manager of the "Care-for-Nothings" (sans souci) was called "The Prince of Fools."

Santa Casa (Ital., the holy house). The reputed house in which the Virgin Mary lived at Nazareth, miraculously translated to Dalmatia, and finally to Italy. See LORETTO.

Santa Claus. A contraction of Santa Nikolaus (i.e. St. Nicolas), the patron saint in Germany of children. His feast-day is December 6th, and the vigil is still held in some places, but for the most part his name is now associated with Christmas. The old custom used to be for someone, on December 5th, to assume the costume of a bishop and distribute small gifts to "good children." The present custom, introduced in England from Germany about 1840, is to put toys and other little presents into a stocking late on Christmas Eve, when the children are asleep, and when they wake on Christmas morn they find in the stocking at the bedside the gift sent by Santa Claus. See NICHOLAS.

Santos Dumont. Alberto Santos Dumont (1873-1932) was a Brazilian balloonist who, in 1901, won the Deutsch prize for flying from St. Cloud to the Eiffel Tower in a dirigible balloon of his own design and construction. In 1903 he had a number of these dirigibles in his airship station at Neuilly. In 1905 he began to construct heavier-than-air machines and four years later produced his "demoiselle" monoplane which proved to be the forerunner of the aeroplanes of to-day.

Sappho (săf' ô). Mlle de Scudéry (1607-1701), the French novelist and poet, went by this name among her own circle.

Sappho (săf' ô). The Greek poetess of Lesbos, known as "the Tenth Muse." She lived about 600 B.C., and is fabled to have thrown herself into the sea from the Leucadian promontory in consequence of her advances having been rejected by the beautiful youth Phaon.

Pope used the name in his Moral Essays (II) for Lady Mary Wortley Montagu (cp. ATOSSA). See also SAPHO, above.

The Sappho of Toulouse. Clémence Isaure (about 1450-1500), a wealthy lady of Toulouse, who instituted in 1490 the "Jeux Floraux," and left funds to defray their annual expenses. She composed an Ode to Spring.

Sapphics. A four-lined verse-form of classical lyric poetry, named after the Greek poetess Sappho, who employed it, the fourth line being an Adonic. There must be a cæsure at the fifth foot of each of the first three lines, which run thus:—

— — — | — — — | — || — — — | — — — | — — —

The Adonic is —

— — — | — — — or — — —

The first and third stanzas of the famous Ode of Horace, Integer vixit (i, 22), may be translated thus, preserving the metre:—

He of sound life, who ne'er with sinners wendeth,
Needs no Moorish bow, such as malice bendeth,
Nor with poisoned darts life from harm defendeth,
Fuscus believe me.

Once I, unarmed, was in a forest roaming,
Singing love lays, when i' the secret gloaming
Rushed a huge wolf, which though in fury foaming,
Did not aggrieve me. E.C.B.

Probably the best example of Sapphics in English is Canning's Needy Knife-grinder.

Saracen (săr' â sen). Ducange derives the word from Sarah (Abraham's wife); Hottinger from the Arabic saraca (to steal); Forster from sahra (a desert); but probably it is the Arabic sharakayoun or sharkeyn (the eastern people), as opposed to Magharibe (the western people—i.e. of Morocco). In mediæval romance the term was applied to Moslems generally; but among the Romans it denoted any of the nomadic tribes that raided the Syrian borders of the Empire.

Saragossa (săr â gos' â). The Maid of Saragossa. Augustina, a young Spanish girl (d. 1857) noted for her bravery in the defence of Saragossa against the French, 1808. She was only twenty-two when, her lover being shot, she mounted the battery in his place.

Saratoga Trunk (săr â tō' gâ). A huge trunk, such as used to be taken by fashionable ladies to the watering place of that name in New York State.

Sarcenet. See SARSENET.

Sarcode. See PROTOPLASM.

Sarcophagus (sar kof' â gus) (Gr. sarx, flesh, phagein, to eat). A stone coffin; so called because it was made of stone which, according to Pliny, consumed the flesh in a few weeks. The stone was sometimes called lapis Assius, because it was found at Assos of Lycia.

Sardanapalus (sar dâ năp' â lus). The Greek name of Asurbanipal (mentioned in Ezra iv, 10, as Asenappar), king of Assyria in the 7th century B.C. Byron, in his poetic drama of this name (1821), makes him a voluptuous tyrant whose effeminacy led Arbaces, the Mede, to conspire against him. Myrra, his favourite concubine, roused him to appear at the head of his armies. He won three successive battles, but was then defeated, and was induced by Myrra to place himself on a funeral pile. She set fire to it, and, jumping into the flames, perished with her master.

The name is applied to any luxurious, extravagant, self-willed tyrant.

Sardonic Smile, Laughter. A smile of contempt; bitter, mocking laughter; so used by Homer.

The Sardonic or Sardinian laugh. A laugh caused, it was supposed, by a plant growing in Sardinia, of which they who ate died laughing.—TRENCH: Words, lecture iv, p. 176.

The Herba Sardonica (so called from Sardis, in Asia Minor) is so arid that it produces a convulsive movement of the nerves of the face, resembling a painful grin.

'Tis envy's safest, surest rule
To hide her rage in ridicule;
The vulgar eye the best beguiles
When all her snakes are decked with smiles,
Sardonic smiles by rancour raised.

SWIFT: Pheasant and Lark.

Sardonix (săr' don iks). A precious stone composed of white chalcedony alternating with layers of sard, which is an orange-brown variety of cornelian. Pliny says it is called sard from Sardis, in Asia Minor, where it is found, and onyx, the nail, because its colour resembles that of the skin under the nail (Nat. Hist. xxxvii, 6).

Sarsen Stones (săr' sen). The sandstone boulders of Wiltshire and Berkshire are so called. The early Christian Saxons used the word Saresyn (i.e. Saracen, q.v.) as a synonym of pagan or heathen, and as these stones were popularly associated with Druid worship, they were called Saresyn (or heathen) stones. Robert Ricart says of Duke Rollo, "He was a Saresyn come out of Denmark into France."

Sarsenet (săr' sen et). A very fine, soft, silk material, so called from its Saracenic or Oriental origin. The word is sometimes used adjectivally of soft and gentle speech.

Sartor Resartus (săr' tor re săr' tus) (The Tailor Patched). A philosophical satire by Thomas Carlyle, first published in Fraser's Magazine, 1833-4.

Diogenes Teufelsdröckh is Carlyle himself, and Entepfehl is his native village of Ecclefechan.

The Rose Goddess, according to Froude, is Margaret Gordon, but Strachey says it is Blumine, i.e. Kitty Kirkpatrick, daughter of Colonel Achilles Kirkpatrick. The Rose Garden is Strachey's garden at Shooter's Hill, and the Duenna is Mrs. Strachey.

The Zahdarms are Mr. and Mrs. Buller, and Toughgut is Charles Buller.

Philistine is the Rev. Edward Irving.

SAS. Special Air Service. British volunteer troops raised in World War II to drop by parachute behind the enemy's lines in uniform (as distinct from spies or agents in civilian clothes) to damage specific targets or enemy communications in general. They were evolved from the Long Range Desert Patrol (q.v.).

Sassanides (sās ān' i dēz). A powerful Persian dynasty, ruling from about A.D. 225-641; so named because Ardeshir, the founder, was son of Sassan, a lineal descendant of Xerxes.

Sassenach (sās' nāk). The common form of Sassunach, Gaelic for English or an Englishman. It represents the Teutonic ethnic name, Saxon.

Satan (sā' tăn), in Hebrew, means adversary or enemy.

To whom the Arch-enemy
(And hence in heaven called Satan).

MILTON: Paradise Lost, Bk. i, 81, 82.

In the Bible the term is usually applied to a human adversary or opposer, and only in three cases (Zech. iii, Job i, 2, and 1 Chron. xxi, 1) does it denote an evil spirit.

The name is often used of a person of whom one is expressing abhorrence. Thus, the Clown says to Malvolio—

Fie, thou dishonest Satan! I call thee by the most modest terms; for I am one of those gentle ones that will use the devil himself with courtesy.—Twelfth Night, iv, 2.

The Satanic School. So Southey called Byron, Shelley, and those of their followers who set at defiance the generally received notions of religion. See the Preface to his Vision of Judgment.

Satire (săt' ir). Scaliger's derivation of this word from satyr is untenable. It is from satura (full of variety), satura lanx, a hotchpotch or olla podrida. The term originally denoted a medley of hotchpotch in verse; now it is applied to compositions in verse or prose in which folly, vice, or individuals are held up to ridicule. See Dryden's Dedication prefixed to his Satires.

Father of satire. Archilochus of Paros, 7th century B.C.

Father of French satire. Mathurin Regnier (1573-1613).

Father of Roman satire. Lucilius (175-103 B.C.).

Lucilius was the man who, bravely bold,
To Roman vices did the mirror hold;
Protected humble goodness from reproach,
Showed worth on foot, and rascals in a coach.

DRYDEN: Art of Poetry, c, ii.

Saturday. The seventh day of the week; called by the Anglo-Saxons Sæter-dæg, after the Latin Saturni dies, the day of Saturn. See BLACK SATURDAY.

Saturn (săt' ūrn). A Roman deity, identified with the Greek Kronos (time) (q.v.). He devoured all his children except Jupiter (air), Neptune (water), and Pluto (the grave). These Time cannot consume. The reign of Saturn was celebrated by the poets as a "Golden Age." According to the old alchemists and astrologers, Saturn typified lead, and was a very evil planet to be born under. "The children of the sayd Saturne shall be great jangleleres and chyderys . . . and they will never forgyve tyll they be revenged on theyr quarell." (Compost of Ptholomeus.)

Saturn's tree. An alchemist's name for the Tree of Diana, or Philosopher's Tree (q.v.).

Saturnalia. A time of unrestrained disorder and misrule. With the Romans it was the festival of Saturn, and was celebrated the 17th, 18th, and 19th of December. During its continuance no public business could be transacted, the law courts were closed, the schools kept holiday, no war could be commenced, and no malefactor punished. Under the empire the festival was extended to seven days.

Saturnian. Pertaining to Saturn; with reference to the "Golden Age," to the god's sluggishness, or to the baleful influence attributed to him by the astrologers.

Then rose the seed of Chaos and of Night

To blot out order and extinguish light.

Of dull and venal a new world to mould,

And bring Saturnian days of lead and gold.

PORP: Dunciad, iv, 13.

Lead to indicate dullness, and gold to indicate venality.

Saturnian verses. A rude metre in use among the Romans before the introduction of Greek metres. Also a peculiar metre, consisting of three iambics and a syllable over, joined to three trochees, as:—

The queen was in the par-Jour . . .

The maids were in the garden . . .

The Fescennine and Saturnian were the same, for as they were called Saturnian from their antiqueness, when Saturn reigned in Italy, they were called Fescennine from Fescennina [sic] where they were first practised.—DRYDEN: Dedication of Juvenal.

Saturnine. Grave, phlegmatic, gloomy, dull and glowering. Astrologers affirm that such is the disposition of those who are born under the influence of the leaden planet Saturn.

Satyr (săt' ir). One of a body of forest gods or demons who, in classical mythology, were the attendants of Bacchus. Like the fauns (q.v.) they are represented as having the legs and hind-quarters of a goat, budding horns, and goat-like ears, and they were very lascivious.

Hence, the term is applied to a brutish or lustful man; and the psychological condition among males characterized by excessive venereal desire is known as satyriasis.

Sauce means "salted food" (Lat. salsus), for giving a relish to meat, as pickled roots, herbs, and so on.

In familiar phrase it means "cheek," impertinence, the kind of remarks one may expect from a saucebox—an impudent youngster.

The sauce was better than the fish. The accessories were better than the main part.

To serve the same sauce. To retaliate; to give as good as you take; to serve in the same manner.

After him another came unto her, and served her with the same sauce; then a third.—LYLY: The Man in the Moon (1609).

To sauce. To season, intermix.

Folly sauced with discretion.—Troilus and Cressida, i, 2.

Also, to give cheek or impertinence to.

Don't sauce me in the wicious pride of your youth.—DICKENS: Our Mutual Friend, I, vii.

Saucy. Cheeky, impertinent (see SAUCE); also rakish, irresistible, that care-for-nobody, jaunty, daring behaviour which has won for many of our regiments and ships the term as a compliment.

How many saucy airs we meet,

From Temple Bar to Aldgate Street!

GAY: The Barley-Mow and Dunghill.

In Scotland the adjective is applied to one who is fastidious or dainty in eating.

Saucer. Originally a dish for holding sauce, the Roman salsarium.

Saucer eyes. Big, round, glaring eyes.

Yet when a child (bless me!) I thought

That thou a pair of horns had'st got,

With eyes like saucers staring.

PETER PINDAR: Ode to the Devil.

Saucer oath. When a Chinese is put in the witness-box, he says: "If I do not speak the truth may my soul be cracked and broken like this saucer." So saying, he dashes the saucer on the ground. The Jewish marriage custom of breaking a wineglass is of a similar character.

Flying Saucers. Alleged mysterious celestial phenomena resembling revolving, partially luminous discs that shoot across the sky at a high velocity and a great height. No feasible explanation has been put forward for these objects, nor has any really authenticated proof been given of their existence.

Saul, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Oliver Cromwell.

They who, when Saul was dead, without a blow Made foolish Ishbosheth [Richard Cromwell] the crown forego. Pt. i, 57, 58.

Is Saul also among the prophets? Said (from 1 Sam. x, 12) of one who unexpectedly bears tribute to a party or doctrine that he has hitherto vigorously assailed. At the conversion of Saul, afterwards called Paul, the Jews said in substance, "Is it possible that Saul can be a convert?" (Acts ix, 21.)

Sauria (saw' rī à). This is the name formerly applied to the order of reptiles which includes the lizards and snakes, but modern zoologists usually divide this order into lacertilia (lizards) and ophidia (snakes) leaving the term Sauria for certain extinct reptiles.

Sauve qui peut (sōv kē pér) (Fr., save himself who can). One of the first uses of the phrase is by Boileau (1636-1711). The phrase thus became to mean a rout. Thackeray writes of "that general saue qui peut among the Tory party."

Savanna. A Spanish word, deriving from the Carib, for the natural grass land in tropical countries. In Venezuela savannas are known as "llanos," as "campos" in Brazil, as "downs" in Australia, and as "park lands" in S. Africa.

Savannah was the first ship fitted with steam power to cross the Atlantic. She was built at Savannah, Georgia. Actually the greater part of the voyage to Liverpool, which took place in 1819, was done under sail; she crossed the Atlantic in 25 days.

Save. To save appearances. To do something to obviate or prevent exposure or embarrassment.

To save one's bacon, skin, face. See these words.

Save the mark! See MARK.

Savoir-faire (sāv' wa fār) (Fr.). Ready wit; skill in getting out of a scrape; hence Vivre de son savoir-faire, to live by one's wits.

Savoy, The. A precinct off the Strand, London, noted for the palace built there by Peter of Savoy, who came to England about 1245 to visit his niece Eleanor, wife of Henry III. At his death the palace became the property of the queen, who gave it to her second son, Edmund Lancaster, whence it was attached to the Duchy of Lancaster. When the Black Prince brought Jean le Bon, King of France, captive to London (1356), he lodged him in the Savoy Palace, and there he died in 1364. The rebels under Wat Tyler burnt down the old palace in 1381; but it was rebuilt in 1505 by Henry VII, and converted into a hospital for the poor, under the name of St. John's Hospital, which was used by Charles II for wounded soldiers and sailors.

Here, in 1552, was established the first flint-glass manufactory in England.

The Chapel Royal of the Savoy (first made a Chapel Royal by George III in 1773) was built about 1510 on the ruins of John of Gaunt's earlier chapel. This, largely rebuilt, is the only one of the old buildings remaining, the rest of the site being occupied by the Savoy Hotel and Savoy Theatre.

In Savoy Hill were the first studios of the British Broadcasting Company, with the designation of 2LO. It was opened in 1922 and remained headquarters after the Company had become the British Broadcasting Corporation, until 1932.

Savoy Operas. The comic operas with words by W. S. Gilbert (1836-1911) and music by Arthur Sullivan (1842-1900), produced by R. D'Oyly Carte. Nearly all of them first appeared at the Savoy Theatre, which Carte built specially for these productions. The players performing in the operas were known as "Savoyards." The Gilbert and Sullivan operas are the following:—

Thespis, 1871, at the Royalty.

Trial by Jury, 1872, at the Royalty.

The Sorcerer, 1877, Opera Comique.

H.M.S. Pinafore, 1878, Opera Comique.

The Pirates of Penzance, 1880, Opera Comique.

Patience, 1881, Opera Comique, then transferred to the Savoy, where all the following appeared.

Iolanthe, 1882.

Princess Ida, 1884.

The Mikado, 1885.

Ruddigore, 1887.

The Yeomen of the Guard, 1888.

The Gondoliers, 1889.

Utopia Limited, 1893.

The Grand Duke, 1896.

Saw. In Christian art an attribute of St. Simon and St. James the Less, in allusion to the tradition of their being sawn to death in martyrdom.

Sawny or Sandy. A Scotchman; a contraction of "Alexander."

Saxifrage (săks' i frāj). A member of a genus of small plants (Saxifraga) probably so called because they grow in the clefts of rocks (Lat. saxum, a rock, frangere, to break). Pliny, and later writers following him, held that the name was due to the supposed fact that the plant had a medicinal value in the breaking up and dispersal of stone in the bladder.

Saxons. A Teutonic people who ravaged the coasts of the North Sea and the English Channel at the end of the 3rd century and settled in districts of south-eastern England. Essex, Sussex, Middlesex, and Wessex are names that commemorate their colonization.

Saxon Castles. The principal ones remaining in England are:—

Alnwick Castle, given to Ivo de Vesey by the Conqueror.

Bamborough Castle (Northumberland), the palace of the kings of Northumberland, and built by King Ida, who began to reign 559.

Carisbrooke Castle, enlarged by Fitz-Osborne just after the Norman Conquest.

Conisborough Castle (Yorks).

Goodrich Castle (Herefordshire).

Kenilworth Castle. Kennil-worth means "the farm of Cynechild" (a woman).

Richmond Castle (Yorks), belonging to the Saxon earl Edwin, given by the Conqueror to his nephew Alan, Earl of Bretagne; a ruin for three centuries. The keep remains.

Rochester Castle, given to Odo, natural brother of the Conqueror.

Saxon Characteristics (architectural).

(1) The quoining consists of a long stone set at the corner, and a short one lying on it and bonding into the wall.

(2) The use of large heavy blocks of stone in some parts, while the rest is built of Roman bricks.

(3) An arch with straight sides to the upper part instead of curves.

(4) The absence of buttresses.

(5) The use in windows of rude balusters.

(6) A rude round staircase west of the tower, for the purpose of access to the upper floors.

(7) Rude carvings in imitation of Roman work. (Rickman.)

Saxon Shore. The coast of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire, where were castles and garrisons, under the charge of a count or military officer, called Comes Littoris Saxonici per Britanniam.

Brannodunum (Barncaster) was on the Norfolk coast.

Gariannonum (Burgh) was on the Suffolk coast

Othona (Ithanchester) was on the Essex coast.

Regulbium (Reculver), Rutupia (Richborough),

Dubris (Dover), P. Lemanis (Lyme), were on the Kentish coast.

Anderida (Hastings or Pevensey), Portus Adurni (Worthing), were on the Sussex coast.

Say. To take the say. To taste meat or wine before it is presented, in order to prove that it is not poisoned. Say is short for assay, a test; the phrase was common in the reign of Queen Elizabeth I.

Sbirri (sbir' ē) (Ital. sing. sbirro). The Italian police, especially the force which existed in the Papal States. They were notorious as spies, informers, and agents provocateurs.

Had I been silent, not a sbirro but

Had kept me in his eye, as meditating

A silent, solitary, deep revenge.

BYRON: Marino Falieri, II, ii.

Scaevola (skē' vō lā) (Lat., left-handed). So Caus Mucius, a legendary hero of ancient Rome. Purposing to kill Lars Porsena, who was besieging Rome, he entered that king's camp, but by mistake slew Porsena's secretary, and was captured. Taken before the king he deliberately held his hand over the sacrificial fire at which he was to be burnt till it was burnt off, to show the Etruscan that he would not shrink from torture. This fortitude was so remarkable that Porsena at once ordered his release and made peace with the Romans.

Scales. From time immemorial the scales have been one of the principal attributes of Justice, it being impossible to out-weigh even a little Right with any quantity of Wrong.

... first the right he put into one scale,

And then the Giant strove with puissance strong

To fill the other scale with so much wrong.

But all the wrongs that he therein could lay,

Might not it peise.

SPENSER: Faerie Queene, V, ii, 46.

Call these foul offenders to their answers;

And poise the cause in justice' equal scales,

Whose beam stands sure, whose rightful cause prevails.

2 Henry VI, ii, i.

According to the Koran, at the Judgment Day everyone will be weighed in the scales of the archangel Gabriel. The good deeds will be put in the scale called "Light," and the evil ones in the scale called "Darkness"; after which they will have to cross the bridge Al Sirāt, not wider than the edge of a scimitar. The faithful will pass over in safety, but the rest will fall into the dreary realms of Jehennam.

To hold the scales even or true. To judge impartially.

Kind Providence attends with gracious aid . . .

And weighs the nations in an even scale.

COWPER: Table Talk, 251.

To turn the scale. Just to outweigh the other side.

Thy presence turns the scale of doubtful fight,

Tremendous God of battles, Lord of Hosts!

WORDSWORTH: Ode (1815), 112.

Scallop Shell. The emblem of St. James of Compostella (and hence of pilgrims to his shrine), adopted, says Erasmus, because the shore of the adjacent sea abounds in them. Pilgrims used them for cup, spoon, and dish. On returning home, the pilgrim placed his scallop shell in his hat to command admiration, and adopted it in his coat-armour.

I will give thee a palmer's staff of ivory and a scallop-shell of beaten gold.—PEELE: Old Wives' Tale (1590).

Scalp Lock. A long lock of hair allowed to grow on the scalp by the men of certain North American Indian tribes as a challenge to their scalp-hunting enemies.

Scambling Days. See SKIMBLE-SKAMBLE.

Scammozzi's Rule (skā mō' ziz). The jointed two-foot rule used by builders, and said to have been invented by Vincenzio Scammozzi (1552-1616), the famous Italian architect.

Scamp. A deserter "from the field," ex campo; one who decamps without paying his debts.

Scandal (Gr. skandalon) means properly a pit-fall or snare laid for an enemy; hence a stumbling-block, and morally an aspersion.

In Matt. xiii, 41-2, we are told that the angels shall gather "all things that offend . . . and shall cast them into a furnace"; here the Greek word is skandalon, and scandals is given as an alternative in the margin; the Revised version renders the word "all things that cause stumbling." Cp. also 1 Cor. i, 23.

The Hill of Scandal. So Milton calls the Mount of Olives, because King Solomon built thereon "an high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab . . . and for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon" (1 Kings xi, 7).

His lustful orgies he [Chemosh] enlarged
Even to that hill of scandal by the grove
Of Moloch homicide, lust hard by hate,
Till good Josiah drove them thence to Hell.
Paradise Lost, I, 415.

Scandal broth. Tea. The reference is to the gossip held by some of the womenkind over their tea. Also called "Chatter-broth."

Scandalum Magnatum (skān' dā lum māg nā' tūm) (Lat., scandal of magnates). Words in derogation of the Crown, peers, judges, and other great officers of the realm, made a legal offence in the time of Richard II. What St. Paul calls "speaking evil of dignities"; popularly contracted to scamag.

Scanderbeg (skān' dēr beg). A name given by the Turks to George Castriota (1403-68), the patriot chief of Epirus. The word is a corruption of Iskander-beg, Prince Alexander.

Scanderbeg's sword must have Scanderbeg's arm. None but Ulysses can draw Ulysses' bow. Mohammed I wanted to see Scanderbeg's scimitar, but when presented no one could draw it; whereupon the Turkish emperor, deeming himself imposed upon, sent it back; Scanderbeg replied he had sent his majesty his sword, not the arm that drew it.

Scantling, a small quantity, is the French échantillon, a specimen or pattern.

A scantling of wit.—DRYDEN.

Scapegoat. Part of the ancient ritual among the Hebrews for the Day of Atonement laid down by Mosaic law (see Lev. xvi) was as follows: Two goats were brought to the altar of the tabernacle and the high priest cast lots, one for the Lord, and the other for Azazel (q.v.). The Lord's goat was sacrificed, the other was the scapegoat; and the high priest having, by confession, transferred his own sins and the sins of the people to it, it was taken to the wilderness and suffered to escape.

Similar rites are not uncommon among primitive peoples. The aborigines of Borneo, for instance, annually launch a small boat laden with all the sins and misfortunes of the nation, which they imagine will fall on the crew that first meets with it.

Scaphism (skā' fizm) (Gr. skaphe, anything scooped out). A mode of torture formerly practised in Persia. The victim was enclosed in the hollowed trunk of a tree, the head, hands, and legs projecting. These were anointed with honey to invite the wasps. In this situation the sufferer must linger in the burning sun for several days.

Scapin (ska' pin). The knavish and intriguing valet, who makes his master his tool, in Molière's Les Fourberies de Scapin, 1671.

Scapular. A garment made of two strips of cloth put on over the head so that one falls in front and one behind. It is usually the width of the shoulders and reaches to the ankles; it originated in the working frock of the Benedictines—a sort of overall—but it is now regarded as the distinctively monastic part of many religious habits. Another form of scapular is worn by lay people of various R.C. confraternities. It consists of two pieces of cloth about 3 in. by 2 in., joined by strings and worn back and front next the skin.

Scarab (scā' rāb). An ancient gem in the form of a dung-beetle, especially Scarabæus sacer. It originated in pre-dynastic Egypt as an amulet, being made of polished or glazed stone, metal, or glazed faience, and was perforated lengthwise for suspension. By the XIIIth Dynasty scarabs became used as seals, worn as pendants or mounted as signet rings.

Scaramouch (skār' ā mouch). The English form of Ital. Scaramuccia (through Fr. Scaramouche) a stock character in Old Italian farce, introduced into England soon after 1670. He was a braggart and fool, very valiant in words, but a poltroon, and was usually dressed in a black Spanish costume caricaturing the dons. The Neapolitan actor, Tiberio Fiorelli (1608-94), was surnamed Scaramouch Fiorelli. He came to England in 1673, and astonished John Bull with feats of agility.

Stout Scaramoucha with rush lance rode in,
And ran a tilt with centaur Arlequin.

DRYDEN: Epilogue to The Silent Woman.

Scarborough Warning. Blow first, warning after. In Scarborough robbers used to be dealt with in a very summary manner by a sort of Halifax gibbet-law, lynch-law, or an à la lanterne. Another origin is given of this phrase: It is said that Thomas Stafford, in 1557, seized the castle of Scarborough, not only without warning, but even before the townsfolk knew he was afoot.

This term Scarborough warning, grew, some say.

By hasty hanging for rank robbery there.

Who that was met but suspect in that way,

Straight he was trust up, whatever he were.

J. HEYWOOD.

Scarlet. The colour of certain official costumes, as those of judges and cardinals; hence, sometimes applied to these dignitaries. The scarlet coat worn by foxhunters is not technically scarlet, but pink (see PINK.)

Dyeing scarlet. Heavy drinking, which in time will dye the face scarlet.

They call drinking deep, dyeing scarlet. 1 Henry IV, ii, 4.

The Scarlet Lancers. The 16th Lancers, whose tunic is red.

Scarlet Letter. In the rigid Puritan regime of New England in the early days a scarlet "A," for "adulteress" used to be branded or sewn on a guilty woman's dress. The theme of Hawthorne's novel of this name (1850) is based on this custom.

Scarlet Pimpernel. An elusive intriguer. The phrase comes from the nickname of the hero of several novels by Baroness Orczy. In 1905 The Scarlet Pimpernel told the adventures of a royalist partizan in the French Revolution, who took the pimpernel as his emblem when he saved victims from the guillotine, and played other tricks on the Sansculottes.

Scarlet, Will. One of the companions of Robin Hood (q.v.).

The Scarlet Woman, or Scarlet Whore. The woman seen by St. John in his vision "arrayed in purple and scarlet colour," sitting "upon a scarlet coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns," "drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs," upon whose forehead was written "MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH" (Rev. xvii, 1-6).

St. John was probably referring to Rome, which, at the time he was writing, was "drunken with the blood of the saints"; some controversial Protestants have applied the words to the Church of Rome, and some Roman Catholics to the Protestant churches generally.

Scat Singing. A form of singing in jazz music in which meaningless syllables and sounds take the place of words, the voice being used rather as a musical instrument. It was invented by the greatest of all jazz musicians, Louis Armstrong, by accident as he was making a record of Heebie Jeebies, about 1926.

Scavenger's Daughter. An instrument of torture invented by Sir William Skevington, lieutenant of the Tower in the reign of Henry VIII. The machine compressed the body by bringing the head to the knees, and so forced blood out of the nose and ears.

Scent. We are not yet on the right scent. We have not yet got the right clue. The allusion is to dogs following game by the scent.

Sceptic (skep' tik) literally means one who thinks for himself, and does not receive on another's testimony (from Gr. skeptesthai, to examine). Pyrrho founded the philosophic sect called "Sceptics," and Epictetus combated their dogmas. In theology we apply the word to those who do not accept revelation.

Sceptre (sep' ter) (Gr., a staff). The gold and jewelled wand carried by a sovereign as emblem of royalty; hence, royal authority and dignity.

This hand was made to handle nought but gold:

I cannot give due action to my words,

Except a sword, or sceptre balance it.

A sceptre shall it have, have I a soul,

On which I'll toss the flower-de-luce of France.

2 Henry VI, v, 1.

The sceptre of the kings and emperors of Rome was of ivory, bound with gold and surmounted by a golden eagle; the British sceptre is of richly jewelled gold, and bears immediately beneath the cross and ball the great Cullinan diamond (q.v.).

Homer says that Agamemnon's sceptre was made by Vulcan, who gave it to the son of Saturn. It passed successively to Jupiter, Mercury, Pelops, Atreus, and Thyestes till it came to Agamemnon. It was looked on with great reverence, and several miracles were attributed to it.

Scheherazade (she hēr' à zād). The mouth-piece of the tales related in the Arabian Nights (q.v.), daughter of the grand vizier of the Indes. The Sultan Schahriah, having discovered the infidelity of his sultana, resolved to have a fresh wife every night and have her strangled at daybreak. Scheherazade entreated to become his wife, and so amused him with tales for a thousand and one nights that he revoked his cruel decree, bestowed his affection on her, and called her "the liberator of the sex."

Schellhorn's Bible. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Schiedam (skī dām'). Hollands gin, so called from Schiedam, a town where it is principally manufactured.

Schism, The Great. The term is usually applied to the ecclesiastical dispute which rent Europe into two parties in the 14th century. Three months after the election of Urban VI, in 1378, the fifteen electing cardinals declared that the election was invalid because it had been made under fear of violence from the Roman mob. Urban retorted by naming twenty-eight new cardinals; the others at once proceeded to elect a new pope, Clement VII, who went to reside at Avignon. Spain, Naples, France, Provence and Scotland adhered to Clement; England, Germany, Scandinavia, Flanders and Hungary stood by Urban. The Church was torn from top to bottom by the schism, both sides being in good faith and no one knowing to whom allegiance was due. This confusion lasted until 1417, when Martin V was elected at the Council of Constance.

Schlemihl, Peter (shlem' il). The man who sold his shadow to the devil, in Chamisso's tale so called (1814). The name is a synonym for any person who makes a desperate and silly bargain.

Scholasticism. The philosophy and doctrines of the "Schoolmen" (q.v.) of the Middle Ages (9th to 16th cents.) which were based on the logical works of Aristotle and the teachings of the Christian Fathers. It was an attempt to give a rational basis to Christianity, but the methods of the Scholastics degenerated into mere verbal subtleties, academic disputations, and quibblings, till, at the time of the Renaissance, the remnants were only fit to be swept away before the current of new learning that broke upon the world. Cp. DIALECTICS.

Schoolmaster. The schoolmaster is abroad. Education is spreading—and it will bear fruit. Lord Brougham said, in a speech (1828) on the general diffusion of education, and of intelligence arising therefrom, "Let the soldier be abroad, if he will; he can do nothing in this age. There is another personage abroad . . . the schoolmaster is abroad; and I trust to him, armed with his primer, against the soldier in full military array."

Schoolmistress, The. A quietly humorous poem in the Spenserian stanza by Shenstone (1742). The character is designed for a "portrait of Sarah Lloyd," the dame who first taught the poet himself.

Schoolmen. The Theologians of the Middle Ages, who lectured in the cloisters or cathedral schools founded by Charlemagne and his successors. They followed Aristotle and the Fathers (see SCHOLASTICISM), but attempted to reduce every subject to a system. They may be grouped under three periods—

First Period. PLATONISTS (from 9th to 12th cents.).

Pierre Abélard (1079-1142).

Flacius Albinus Alcuin (735-804).

John Scotus Erigena (d. 875).

Anselm (1030-1117). Doctor Scholasticus.

Berengarius of Tours (1000-88).

Gerbert of Aurillac (930-1003), afterwards Pope Sylvester II.

John of Salisbury (1115-80).

Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury (1005-89).

Pierre Lombard (1100-64). Master of the Sentences, sometimes called the founder of school divinity.

Roscelinus of Compiègne (about 1050-1122).

Second Period, or Golden Age of Scholasticism. ARISTOTELIANS (13th and 14th cents.).

Alain de Lille (d. 1203). The Universal Doctor.

Albertus Magnus (1206-80).

Thomas Aquinas (1224-74). The Angelic Doctor.

John Fidanza Bonaventure (1221-74). The Seraphic Doctor.

Alexander of Hales (d. 1245). The Irrefragable Doctor.

John Duns Scotus (1265-1308), The Subtle Doctor.

Third Period. NOMINALISM REVIVED (To the 16th cent.).

Thomas de Bradwardine, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1349), The Profound Doctor.

Jean Buridan (about 1295-1360).

William Durandus de Pourçain (d. about 1333). The Most Resolute Doctor.

Gregory of Rimini (d. 1358). The Authentic Doctor.

Robert Holcot (d. 1349), an English Dominican and divine.

Raymond Lully (1234-1315). The Illuminated Doctor.

William Occam (d. 1349), an English Franciscan. The Singular or Invincible Doctor.

François Suarez (1548-1617), the last of the schoolmen.

Schooner (skoo' ner). In the U.S.A., a large glass or mug for beer. Sometimes also called a "prairie schooner."

Prairie schooner was the name given to the large covered wagon in which American pioneer settlers moved west across the prairies in the mid-19th century.

Science. Literally "knowledge," the Lat. scientia from the pres. part. of scire, to know. The old, wide meaning of the word is shown in this from Shakespeare:—

Plutus himself,

That knows the tinct and multiplying medicine,
Hath not in nature's mystery more science
Than I have in this ring. All's Well, v, 3.

The Dismal Science. Economics; a name given to it by Carlyle:—

The social science—not a "gay science," but a rueful—which finds the secret of this Universe in "supply and demand" . . . what we might call, by way of eminence, the dismal science.—CARLYLE: On the Nigger Question (1849).

The Noble Science. Boxing, or fencing; the "noble art of self-defence."

The Seven Sciences. A mediæval term for the whole group of studies, viz. Grammar, Logic, and Rhetoric (the Trivium), with Arithmetic, Music, Geometry, and Astronomy (the Quadrivium).

Science Persecuted. Anaxagoras of Clazomænæ (d. about 430 B.C.) held opinions in natural science so far in advance of his age that he was accused of impiety, thrown into prison, and condemned to death. Pericles, with great difficulty, got his sentence commuted to fine and banishment.

Galileo (1564-1642) was imprisoned by the Inquisition for maintaining that the earth moved. To get his liberty he abjured the heresy, but as he went his way is said, on very flimsy authority, to have whispered, "E pur si muove" (but nevertheless it does move).

Roger Bacon (1214-94) was excommunicated and imprisoned for diabolical knowledge, chiefly on account of his chemical researches. Dr. Dee (q.v.) and Robert Grosseteste (d. 1253), Bishop of Lincoln, were treated in much the same way. Of the latter it is said that as he was accused of dealings in the black arts the Pope sent a letter to the King of England ordering that his bones should be disinterred and burnt to powder.

Averroes, the Arabian philosopher, who flourished in the 12th century, was denounced as a heretic and degraded solely on account of his great eminence in natural philosophy and medicine.

Andrew Crosse (1784-1855), the electrician, was accused of impiety and shunned as a "profane man" who wanted to arrogate to himself the creative power of God, because he asserted that he had seen certain animals of the genus Acarus, which had been developed by him out of inorganic matter.

Scio's Blind Old Bard (sī' ō). Homer. Scio is the modern name of Chios, in the Ægean Sea one of the "seven cities" that claimed the honour of being his birthplace.

Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, Salamis, Rhodes, Argos, Athens.

Your just right to call Homer your son you must settle between ye.

Scire facias (sī' re fā' si ās) (Lat., make him to know). A judicial writ enforcing the execution or the annulment of judgments, etc.; so called from its opening words. These writs were formerly the common procedure, but they are now rarely issued except for the revocation of royal charters.

Sciron (sī' ron). A robber of Greek legend, slain by Theseus. He infested the parts about Megara, and forced travellers over the rocks into the sea, where they were devoured by a sea monster.

Scissors. The Latin cisorium, from cædere, to cut. In English the word was for centuries spelt without the c; the sc-spelling appeared in the 16th century, and seems to be due to confusion with Lat. scissor, the noun from scindere, to split or rend. Scythe, formerly sithe, has suffered in the same way.

In Johnson's Dictionary the word is entered in the singular; but the singular form has never been in common use, except in compounds such as scissor-blade, scissor-tooth, etc. (cp. billiard-ball from billiards, trouser-button from trousers, etc.).

Scissors and paste. Compilation, as distinguished from original literary work. The allusion is obvious.

Scissors to grind. Work to do; purpose to serve. I have my own scissors to grind is a way of saying "I've got my own work to do, or my own troubles, and can't be bothered with yours."

Scogan's Jests (skō' gån). A popular jest-book in the 16th century, said by Andrew Boorde (who published it) to be the work of one John Scogan, reputed to have been court fool to Edward IV. He is referred to (anachronously) by Justice Shallow in 2 Henry IV, iii, 2, and must not be confused with Henry Scogan (d. 1407), the poet-disciple of Chaucer to whom Ben Jonson alludes:—

Scogan? What was he?

Oh, a fine gentleman, and a master of arts
Of Henry the Fourth's times, that made disguises
For the king's sons, and writ in ballad royal Daintily well.

The Fortunate Isles (1624).

Sconce (skons). A word with several meanings:—a wall bracket for holding one or more candles or lights; the small, detached fortified earthwork or fort; the head.

Scone (skōn). A parish about 2 miles north of Perth, the site of the castle where the ancient Scottish kings were crowned. It was from here that Edward I, in 1296, brought the great coronation stone on which the kings of Scotland used to be crowned, and which, ever since, has formed part of the Throne ("Edward the Confessor's Chair") in Westminster Abbey which British monarchs occupy at their coronation. It was stolen at Christmas, 1950, but was restored some months later and replaced in the Confessor's Chair in February, 1952.

More than one fable has attached itself to this stone. The monks gave out that it was the very "pillow" on which Jacob rested his head when he had the vision of angels ascending and descending between heaven and earth (Gen. xxviii, 11); and it was also said to be the original "Lia-faill" or "Tanist Stone" (q.v.), brought from Ireland by Fergus, son of Eric, who led the Dalriads to Argyshire, and removed thence by King Kenneth (in the 9th cent.) to Scone.

Scorched Earth. A phrase coined to describe the Chinese policy (as old as war) of retreating before the Japanese and burning the countryside as they went, in the war which began in 1937. It was a phrase much used in World War II.

Score. Twenty; a reckoning; to make a reckoning; so called from the custom of marking off "runs" or "lengths," in games by the score feat.

To pay off old scores. To settle accounts; used sometimes of money debts, but usually in the sense of revenging an injury, "getting even" with one.

Scorpio, Scorpion (skōr' pi ō). Scorpio is the eighth sign of the zodiac, which the sun enters about October 24th. Orion had boasted to Diana and Latona that he would kill every animal on the earth. These goddesses sent a scorpion which stung Orion to death. Jupiter later raised the scorpion to heaven.

Fable has it that scorpions—like the toad—carry with them an oil which is a remedy against their stings.

'Tis true, a scorpion's oil is said
To cure the wounds the venom made,
And weapons dressed with salve restore
And heal the hurts they gave before.

BUTLER: Hudibras, iii, 2.

This oil was extracted from the flesh and given to the sufferer as a medicine; it was also supposed to be "very useful to bring away the descending stone of the kidneys" (Boyle, 1663).

Another mediæval belief was that if a scorpion were surrounded by a circle of fire it would commit suicide by stinging itself with its own tail, Byron, in the Giaour, extracts a simile from the legend—

The mind that broods o'er guilty woes
Is like the Scorpion girt by fire; . . .
One sad and sole relief she knows,
The sting she nourish'd for her foes,
Whose venom never yet was vain
Gives but one pang, and cures all pain.

A lash or scourge of scorpions. A specially severe punishment, in allusion to the biblical passage:—

My father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.—1 Kings xii, 11.

In the Middle Ages a scourge of four or five thongs set with steel spikes and leaden weights was called a scorpion.

Scot. Payment, reckoning. The same word as shot (q.v.); we still speak of paying one's shot.

Scot and lot. A municipal levy on all according to their ability to pay. Scot is the tax, and lot the allotment or portion allotted. To pay scot and lot, therefore, is to pay the general assessment and also the personal tax allotted to you.

To go scot-free. To be let off payment; to escape punishment or reprimand, etc.

Scotch, Scots, Scottish. These three adjectives all mean the same thing—belonging to, native of, or characteristic of, Scotland, but their application varies, and of late years their use has become something of a shibboleth.

Scots and Scottish may be used as applicable and euphonious; Scotch describes nothing but whisky and A Scotch breakfast, a substantial breakfast of sundry sorts of good things to eat and drink. The Scots are famous for their breakfast-tables and teas, and no people in the world are more hospitable.

Broad Scotch (Braid Scots). The vernacular of the lowlands of Scotland; very different from the enunciation of Edinburgh and from the peculiarity of the Glasgow dialect.

A pound Scots was originally of the same value as an English pound, but after 1355 it gradually depreciated, until at the time of the Union of the Crowns (1603) it was but one-twelfth of the value of an English pound (1s. 8d.), which was divided into 20 Scots shillings each worth an English penny.

A Scots pint was about equivalent to three imperial pints of the present day.

The Scots Greys. The 2nd Dragoons, so called from the colour of their original facings of stone grey. They have also for many years been mounted on grey horses.

See also SCOTLAND.

Scotch. To make a scotch, i.e. a score or incision in, originally; but now the verb usually means to wound so that temporary disablement is caused, or to stamp out altogether. This application of the word arises from Macbeth, iii, 2, where Macbeth is made to say "We have scotch'd the snake, not killed it." Macbeth was not printed in Shakespeare's lifetime, and in the Folios the word appears as scorch'd; Theobald is responsible for the emendation (1726).

Out of all scotch and notch. Beyond all bounds; scotch was the line marked upon the ground in certain games, as Hopscotch.

The word scotch is also applied to a wedge placed before or behind a wheel, etc., to prevent its rolling.

Scotists (skō'tists). Followers of the 13th-century scholastic philosopher, Duns Scotus, who maintained the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception in opposition to Thomas Aquinas.

Scotists and Thomists now in peace remain.

Pope: Essay on Criticism.

Scotland. St. Andrew is the patron saint of this country, and tradition says that his remains were brought by Regulus, a Greek monk, to the coast of Fife in 368 (see RULE, St.).

The old royal arms of Scotland were:—Or, a lion rampant gules, armed and langued azure, within a double tressure flory-counterflory of fleurs-de-lys of the second (this was quartered with the royal arms of the United Kingdom in 1603). Supporters. Two unicorns argent, imperially crowned, armed, crined, and unguled or, gorged with open crowns, with chains affixed thereto, and reflexed over the back, of the last. Crest. Upon the imperial crown proper, a lion sejant affrontée gules, crowned or, holding in the dexter paw, a sword and in the sinister a sceptre, both proper. Mottoes. "Nemo me impune lacessit" (q.v.), and, over the crest, "In Defence."

In Scotland now the royal arms of Great Britain are used with certain alterations; the lion supporter is replaced by another unicorn (crowned), the Scottish crest takes the place of the English, and the collar of the Thistle encircles that of the Garter.

Scotland a fief of Edward I. Edward I founded his claim to the lordship of Scotland on four grounds, viz.—(1) the statement of certain ancient chroniclers that Scottish kings had occasionally paid homage to English sovereigns from time immemorial. (2) From charters of Scottish kings: as those of Edgar, son of Malcolm, William, and his son Alexander II. (3) From papal rescripts; as those of Honorius III, Gregory IX, and Clement IV. (4) From a passage in The Life and Miracles of St. John of Beverley (see Rymer's Fadera I, Pt. ii, p. 771), which relates how a miracle was performed in the reign of Athelstan, King of the West Saxons and Mercians, 925-940. The king was repelling a band of marauding Scots and had reached the Tyne when he found that they had retreated. At midnight the spirit of St. John of Beverley appeared to him and bade him cross the river at daybreak, for he "should discomfit the foe." Athelstan obeyed, and reduced the whole kingdom to subjection. On reaching Dunbar on his return march, he prayed that some sign might be vouchsafed to him to satisfy all ages that "God, by the intercession of St. John, had given him the kingdom of Scotland." Then, striking the basaltic rocks with his sword, the blade sank into the solid flint "as if it had been butter," cleaving it asunder for "an ell or more," and the cleft remains to the present hour. This was taken as a sign from heaven that Athelstan was rightful lord of Scotland, and if Athelstan was, argued Edward, so was he, his successor.

Scotland Yard. The headquarters of the Metropolitan Police, whence all public orders to the force proceed. The original Scotland Yard, occupied by the Police from 1829-90, was a short street near Trafalgar Square, so called from a palace on the spot, given by King Edgar (about 970) to Kenneth II of Scotland when he came to London to pay homage, and subsequently used by the Scottish kings when visiting England. New Scotland Yard, as it is officially called, is on the Thames Embankment near Westminster Bridge.

Scotus, Duns. See DUNCE.

Scourers. See SCOWERERS.

Scourge. A whip or lash; commonly applied to diseases that carry off great numbers, as the scourge of influenza, the scourge of pneumonia, etc., and to persons who seem to be the instruments of divine punishment. Raleigh, for instance, was called the Scourge of Spain, and Spenser, in his Sonnet upon Scanderbeg, calls him "The scourge of Turkes and plague of infidels."

The Scourge of God (Lat. flagellum Dei). Attila (d. 453), king of the Huns, so called by mediæval writers because of the widespread havoc and destruction caused by his armies.

The Scourge of Homer. The carping critic, Zoilus. See ZOILISM.

The Scourge of Princes. Pietro Aretino (1492-1556), the Italian satirist.

Scout. This word comes from the old French escoute, a spy or eavesdropper, akin to the modern French écouter, to listen. It is now applied to a man, aeroplane, warship, etc., sent to observe the enemy's movements or obtain information of importance; some armies have organized bodies of Scouts. The word has other uses. In the early days of the game the fielders at cricket were called scouts; college servants at Oxford are still known by that name; it is often used for Boy Scouts (q.v.).

Scowerers. A set of rakes in the period about 1670 to 1720, who, with the Nickers and Mohocks, committed great annoyances in London and other large towns.

Who has not heard the Scowerers' midnight fame?

Who has not trembled at the Mohocks' name?

Was there a watchman took his hourly rounds,

Safe from their blows and new-invented wounds?

GUY: Trivia, iii.

Scrape. Bread and scrape. Bread and butter, with the butter spread very thin.

I've got into a bad scrape—an awkward predicament, an embarrassing difficulty. We use rub, squeeze, pinch, to express the same idea. Thus Shakespeare says, "Ay, there's the rub"; "I am come to a pinch" (difficulty).

To scrape along. To get along in the world with difficulty, finding it hard to "make both ends meet."

To scrape an acquaintance with. To get on terms of familiarity with by currying favour and by methods of insinuation. The Gentleman's Magazine (N. S. xxxix, 230), says that Hadrian went one day to the public baths and saw an old soldier, well known to him, scraping himself with a potsherd for want of a flesh-brush. The emperor sent him a sum of money. Next day Hadrian found the bath crowded with soldiers scraping themselves with potsherds, and said, "Scrape on, gentlemen, but you'll not scrape acquaintance with me."

To scrape through. To pass an examination, etc., "by the skin of one's teeth," just to escape failure.

Scratch. There are two colloquial "sporting" uses of this word; a horse, or other entrant in a sporting event, is said to be scratched when its name is withdrawn (scratched out) from the list of competitors; the scratch man in a handicapped is he who starts from scratch; i.e. the line marked out (originally scratched) to show the starting place.

A scratch crew, eleven, etc. A team got together anyhow; not the regular team.

A scratch race. A race of horses, men, boys, etc., without restrictions as to age, weight, previous winnings, etc., who all start from scratch.

Old Scratch. Old Nick; the devil. From skratta, an old Scandinavian word for a goblin or monster (modern Icelandic skratti, a devil).

Scratch cradle. Another form of "cat's cradle" (q.v.).

To come up to the scratch. To be ready when wanted; to fulfil expectations. In prize-fighting a line was scratched on the ground, and the toe of the fighter must come up to the scratch.

Screw. Slang for wages, salary; probably because in some industry the weekly wage was handed out in a "screw of paper"; also a slang term for a prison warder.

An old screw. A miser who has amassed wealth by "putting on the screw" (see below), and who keeps his money tight, doling it out only in screws.

He has a screw loose. He is not quite compos mentis, he's a little mad. His mind is like a piece of machinery that needs adjusting—it won't work properly.

There's a screw loose somewhere. All is not right, there's something amiss. A figurative phrase from machinery, where one screw not tightened up may be the cause of a disaster.

His head is screwed on the right way. He is clear-headed and right-thinking; he knows what he's about.

To put on the screw. A phrase surviving from the days when the thumb screw was used as a form of torture to extract confessions or money. To press for payment, as a screw presses by gradually increasing pressure. Hence to apply the screw, to give the screw another turn, to take steps (or additional steps) to enforce one's demands.

To screw oneself up to it. To force oneself to face it, etc.; to get oneself into the right frame of mind for doing some unpleasant or difficult job.

Screw-ball. A colloquial American term for an erratic, eccentric, or unconventional person.

Screwed. Intoxicated. A playful synonym of tight.

The Screw Plot. The story is that when Queen Anne went to St. Paul's in 1708 to offer thanksgiving for the victory of Oudenarde, disaffected conspirators removed certain screw-bolts from the beams of the cathedral, that the roof might fall on the queen and her suite and kill them.

Some of your Machiavelian crew

From heavy roof of Paul

Most traitorously stole every screw,

To make that fabric fall;

And so to catch Her Majesty,

And all her friends beguile.

Plot upon Plot (about 1713).

Scribe, in the New Testament, means a doctor of the law. Thus, in Matt. xxii, 35, we read, "Then one of them which was a lawyer, asked Him . . . Which is the great commandment of the law?" Mark (xii, 28) says, "One of the scribes came . . . and asked Him, Which is the first commandment of all?" They were generally coupled with the Pharisees (q.v.) as being upholders of the ancient ceremonial tradition.

In the Old Testament the word is used more widely. Thus Seraiah is called the scribe (secretary) of David (2 Sam. viii, 17); "Shebna the scribe" (2 Kings xviii, 18) was secretary to Hezekiah; and Jonathan, Baruch, Gemariah, etc., who were princes, were called scribes. Ezra, however, called "a ready scribe in the law of Moses," accords with the New Testament usage of the word.

Scriblerus, Martinus (mar tī nūs skrib lēr' ūs). A merciless satire on the false taste in literature current in the time of Pope, for the most part written by Arbuthnot, and published in 1741. Cornelius Scriblerus, the father of Martin, was a pedant, who entertained all sorts of absurdities about the education of his son. Martin grew up a man of capacity; but though he had read everything, his judgment was vile and taste atrocious. Pope, Swift, and Arbuthnot founded a Scriblerus Club with the object of pillorying all literary incompetence.

Scrimmage. Originally, a skirmish, of which word this is a variant.

Prince Ouffar at this skrymage, for all his pryde,
Fled full and sought no guide.
MS. Lansdowne, 200, f. 10.

Scrummage was another form of scrimmage; as scrum it still survives on the Rugby football field.

Scrimshaw (skrim' shaw). The term applied to the carved or scratched work on shells, ivory, etc., often in colours. This used to be done by sailors during the long sea voyages by sail. The word is sometimes used as a verb to describe the accomplishment of some intricate job neatly.

Scriptores Decem (skrip tōr' ēz dē' sem). A collection of ten ancient chronicles on English history, edited by Sir Roger Twysden and John Selden (1652). The ten chroniclers are Simeon of Durham, John of Hexham, Richard of Hexham, Ailred of Rievall, Ralph de Diceto (Archdeacon of London), John Brompton of Jorval, Gervase of Canterbury, Thomas Stubbs, William Thorn of Canterbury, and Henry Knighton of Leicester.

A similar collection of five chronicles was published by Thomas Gale (1691) as Scriptores Quinque.

Scriptorium (skrip tōr' i ūm) (Lat., from scripsit, past part. of scribere, to write). A writing-room, especially the chamber set apart in the mediæval monasteries for the copying of MSS., etc. Sir James Murray (1837-1915) gave the name to the corrugated-iron outhouse in his garden at Mill Hill, in which he started the great New English Dictionary.

Scriptures, The, or Holy Scripture (Lat. scriptura, a writing). The Bible; hence applied allusively to the sacred writings of other creeds, as the Koran, the Scripture of the Mohammedans, the Vedas and Zendavesta, of the Hindus and Persians, etc.

Scripturists. Another name for the Caraites.

Scrounge. To purloin or annex something from nowhere particular or that has no obvious owner. A term much used in the army during World War I.

Scruple. The name of the weight (20 grains, or  $\frac{1}{8}$  oz.), and the term for doubt or hesitation (as in a scruple of conscience), both come from Lat. scrupulus, meaning a sharp little pebble, such as will cause great uneasiness if it gets into one's shoe. The second is the figurative use; with the name of the little weight compare that of the big one—stone.

Scullabogue Massacre (skül à bōg'). In the Irish rebellion of 1798 Scullabogue House, Wexford, was seized by the rebels and used for a prison. Some thirty or forty prisoners confined in it were brought out and shot in cold blood, when the news of a repulse of the rebels at New Ross arrived (June 5th, 1798). The barn at the back of the house was filled with prisoners and set on fire, and Taylor, in his history, written at the time and almost on the spot, puts the number of victims at 184.

Scunner. A Scottish term for a feeling of distaste amounting almost to loathing. To take a scunner at something is to conceive a violent dislike to it.

Scurry. A scratch race, or race without restrictions.

Hurry-scurry. A confused bustle through lack of time; in a confused bustle. A "ricochet" word.

Scutage (skū' tij). In feudal times a payment in commutation of personal military service. To most knights and others liable to be summoned to follow the king to war it would be more convenient to pay the tax than set out on some distant expedition; at the same time the money they paid was of use to the king to enable him to employ more reliable troops. It was levied in varying rates between 1156 and 1385.

Scuttle. To scuttle a ship is to bore a hole in it in order to make it sink. The word is from the Old French escoutilles, hatches, and was first applied to a hole in a roof with a door or lid, then to a hatchway in the deck of a ship with a lid, then to a hole in the bottom of a ship.

Scuttle, for coals, is the A.S. scutel, a dish; from Lat. scutella, diminutive of scutra, a dish or platter. In auctioneers' jargon a coal-scuttle is, quite unaccountably, called a perdonium.

To scuttle off, to make off hurriedly, was originally To scuddle off, scuddle being a frequentative of scud.

Scylla (sil' à). In Greek legend the name (1) of a daughter of King Nisus of Megara and (2) of a sea monster.

The daughter of Nisus promised to deliver Megara into the hands of her lover, Minos, and, to effect this, cut off a golden hair on her father's head, while he was asleep. Minos despised her for this treachery, and Scylla threw herself from a rock into the sea. At death she was changed into a lark, and Nisus into a hawk.

Think of Scylla's fate.

Changed to a bird, and sent to fly in air,
She dearly pays for Nisus' injured hair.

POPE: Rape of the Lock, iii.

The sea monster dwelt on the rock Scylla, opposite Charybdis (q.v.), on the Italian side of the Straits of Messina. Homer says that she had twelve feet, and six heads, each on a long neck and each armed with three rows of pointed teeth, and that she barked like a dog. He makes her a daughter of Crataeis; but later accounts say that she was a nymph who, because she was beloved by Glaucus (q.v.), was changed by the jealous Circe into a hideous monster.

Avoiding Scylla, he fell into Charybdis. See CHARYBDIS.

Between Scylla and Charybdis. Between two equal difficulties; between the devil and the deep sea.

To fall from Scylla into Charybdis—out of the frying-pan into the fire.

Scythian (sith' i än). Pertaining to the peoples or region of Scythia, the ancient name of a great part of European and Asiatic Russia.

Scythian defiance. When Darius approached Scythia, an ambassador was sent to his tent with a bird, a frog, a mouse, and five arrows, then left without uttering a word. Darius, wondering what was meant, was told by Gobrias it meant this: Either fly away like a bird, hide your head in a hole like a mouse, or swim across the river, or in five days you will be laid prostrate by the Scythian arrows.

The Scythian or Tartarian lamb. The Russian barometz, the creeping root-stock and frond-stalks of Cibotium barometz, a woolly fern, which, when inverted, was supposed to have some resemblance to a lamb. Mandeville in his Travels (ch. xxvi) gives a highly fanciful description of them.

'Sdeath, 'Sdeins. See 'S.

Sea. Any large expanse of water, more or less enclosed; hence the expression "molten sea," meaning the great brazen vessel which stood in Solomon's temple (2 Chron. iv, 5, and 1 Kings vii, 26); even the Nile, the Euphrates, and the Tigris are sometimes called seas by the prophets. The world of water is the Ocean.

At sea, or all at sea. Wide of the mark; quite wrong; like a person in the open ocean without compass or chart.

Half-seas over. See HALF.

The four seas. The seas surrounding Great Britain, on the north, south, east, and west.

The high seas. The open sea, the "main"; especially that part of the sea beyond "the three-mile limit," which forms a free highway to all nations.

The Old Man of the sea. A creature encountered by Sinbad the Sailor in his fifth voyage (Arabian Nights). This terrible Old Man got on Sinbad's back, and would neither dismount nor could be shaken off. At last Sinbad gave him some wine, which so intoxicated him that he relaxed his grip, and Sinbad made his escape. Hence the phrase is figuratively applied to bad habits, evil associates, etc., from which it is very difficult to free oneself.

The Seven Seas. See SEVEN.

Sea Deities. In classical myth, besides the fifty Nereids (q.v.), the Oceanides (daughters of Oceanus), the Sirens (q.v.), etc., there were a number of deities presiding over, or connected with, the sea. The chief of these are:—Amphitrite, wife of Poseidon, queen goddess of the sea.

Glaucus, a fisherman of Bœotia, afterwards a marine deity.

Ino, who threw herself from a rock into the sea, and was made a sea-goddess.

Neptune, king of the ocean.

Nereus and his wife Doris. Their palace was at the bottom of the Mediterranean; his hair was sea-weed.

Oceanus and his wife Tethys (daughter of Uranus and Ge). Oceanus was god of the Ocean, which formed a boundary round the world.

Portumnus (Gr.; Lat. Palemon), the protector of harbours.

Poseidon, the Greek Neptune.

Proteus, who assumed every variety of shape.

Thetis, a daughter of Nereus and mother of Achilles.

Triton, son of Poseidon.

Sea-girt Isle, The. England. So called because, as Shakespeare has it, it is "hedged in with the main, that water-walléd bulwark" (King John, ii, 1).

This precious stone set in the silver sea,

Which serves it in the office of a wall,

Or as a moat defensive to a house,

Against the envy of less happier lands.

Richard II, ii, 1.

Sea-green Incorruptible, The. So Carlyle called Robespierre in his French Revolution. He was of a sallow, unhealthy complexion.

Sea Island Cotton. The cotton grown on the coast of South Carolina.

Sea Lawyer. A sailor who knows all about his rights, and is always arguing, criticizing, raising objections to the orders of his superior officers, etc. In the Army such is known as a Barrack Room Lawyer.

Sea legs. He has got his sea legs. Is able to walk on deck when the ship is rolling; able to bear the motion of the ship without seasickness.

Sea serpent. A serpentine monster formerly supposed to inhabit the depths of the ocean. As stories of the "Great Sea Serpent" are usually received with incredulity, sailors are sometimes reluctant to report its appearance; but in spite of this there have been some circumstantial accounts and very vivid descriptions given by those who professed to have seen it. Pontoppidan in his Natural History of Norway (1755) speaks of sea serpents 600 ft. long.

See also LOCH NESS MONSTER.

Seabees. U.S. Naval Construction Battalions (C.B.s) in World War II. Their alleged motto was: "The difficult we do at once. The impossible takes a little longer."

Seal. The sire is called a bull, his females are cows, the offspring are called pups; the breeding-place is called a rookery, a group of young seals a pod, and a colony of seals a herd. The immature male is called a bachelor. A sealer is a seal-hunter, and seal-hunting is called sealing.

Sealed Orders. The term applied to orders delivered in a sealed package to naval or military commanders which they are not to read or consult before a certain time, or before reaching a certain locality, or except in certain specified conditions.

Seamy Side. The "wrong" or worst side; as the "seamy side of London," "the seamy side of life." In velvet, Brussels carpets, tapestry, etc., the "wrong" side shows the seams or threads of the pattern exhibited on the right side.

Seasons, The Four. Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter. Spring starts (officially) on March 21st, the Spring Equinox, when the sun enters Aries; Summer on June 22nd, the Summer Solstice, when the sun enters Cancer; Autumn on September 23rd, the Autumn Equinox, the sun entering Libra; and Winter on December 22nd, when the sun enters Capricornus.

The ancient Greeks characterized Spring by Mercury, Summer by Apollo, Autumn by Bacchus, and Winter by Hercules.

The London Season. The part of the year when the Court and fashionable society generally is in town—May, June, and July.

The silly season. See SILLY.

Season-ticket. A ticket giving the holder certain specified rights (in connexion with travelling, entrance to an exhibition, etc.) for a certain specified period.

Seat. To take a back seat. See BACK.

Sebastian, St. Patron saint of archers, because he was bound to a tree and shot at with arrows. As the arrows stuck in his body, thick as pins in a pincushion, he was also made patron saint of pin-makers. And as he was a centurion, he is patron saint of soldiers. His feast, coupled with that of St. Fabian, is kept on January 20th.

The English St. Sebastian. St. Edmund, the martyr-king of East Anglia (855-70) has been so called. He gave himself up to the Danes in the hope of saving his people, but they scourged him, bound him to a tree, shot arrows at him, and finally cut off his head, which, legend relates, was guarded by a wolf till it was duly interred. The monastery and cathedral of St. Edmundsbury (Bury St. Edmunds) were erected on the place of his burial. The place of his martyrdom was Hoxne, Suffolk.

Second. The next after the first (Lat. secundus).

In duelling the second is the representative of the principal; he carries the challenge, selects the ground, sees that the weapons are in order, and is responsible for all the arrangements.

A second of time is so called because the division of the minute into sixtieths is the second of the sexagesimal operations, the first being the division of the hour into minutes.

To second an officer (accent on the final syllable) is, in military phraseology, to remove him temporarily from his regimental or military duties so that he may take up some other appointment.

One's second self. His alter ego (q.v.); one whose tastes, opinions, habits, etc., correspond so entirely with one's own that there is practically no distinction.

Second Adventists. Those who believe that the Second Coming of Christ (cp. 1 Thess. iv, 15) will precede the Millennium; hence sometimes also called Premillennarians.

Second-hand. Not new or original: what has already been the property of another, as, "second-hand" books, clothes, opinions, etc.

Second nature. Said of a habit, way of looking at things, and so on, that has become so ingrained in one that it is next to impossible to shake it off.

Second pair back. The back room on the floor two flights of stairs above the ground floor; similarly the front room is called the second pair front.

Second sight. The power of seeing things invisible to others; the power of foreseeing future events.

Second wind. See WIND.

Secondary colours. See under COLOURS (Technical Terms).

Secret. An open secret. A piece of information generally known, but not formally announced.

Un secret de polichinelle. No secret at all. A secret known to all the world; an open secret. Polichinelle is the Punch of the old French puppet-shows, and his secrets are "stage whispers" told to all the audience.

Entre nous, c'est qu'on appelle

Le secret de polichinelle.

La Mascotte, ii, 12.

Secret Service. A general unofficial term applied to the organization which exists in every country, in peace or war, for the collection of information about enemies, potential enemies and disaffected persons; also for counter-espionage. Such organizations have many ramifications, some quite public, others secret. In Great Britain the best known is MI5, a branch of Military Intelligence in the War Office. In France such matters come under the Deuxième Bureau.

Secular. From Lat. secularis, pertaining to the saeculum, i.e. the age of generation; hence, pertaining to this world in contradistinction to the next.

Secularism. The name given about 1851 by George Jacob Holyoake (1807-1906) to an ethical system founded on natural morality, and opposed to the tenets of revealed religion and ecclesiasticism.

Secular clergy. The Roman Catholic parish clergy who live in daily contact with the world, in contradistinction to monks, etc., who live in monasteries. Hierarchically they take precedence of regular clergy, and bishops are usually chosen from seculars.

Secular games. In ancient Rome the public games lasting three days and three nights that took place only once in an age (saeculum), or period of 100 years.

They were instituted in obedience to the Sibylline verses, with the promise that "the empire should remain in safety so long as this admonition was observed," and while the kings reigned were held in the Campus Martius, in honour of Pluto and Proserpine,

Date, quæ precamur

Tempore sacro

Quo Sibyllini monuere versus.

HORACE: Carmen Seculare, A.U.C., 737.

Sedan Chair (se dän'). The covered seat so called, carried on poles by two bearers back and front, first appeared in Italy in the late 16th century, and was introduced into England by Sir S. Duncombe in 1634.

The name Sedan was first used in England; it was probably coined from Lat. sedere, to sit, though it is just possible that Johnson's suggestion, viz. that it is connected with the French town, Sedan, has something in it.

Sedan, the Man of. Napoleon III was so called, because he surrendered his sword to William, King of Prussia, after the battle of Sedan (September 2nd, 1870).

Sedulous. To play the sedulous ape to. To study the style of another, and model one's own on his as faithfully and meticulously as possible: said, usually with more or less contempt, of literary men. The phrase is taken from R. L. Stevenson, who, in his essay, A College Magazine (Memories and Portraits), said that he had—played the sedulous ape to Hazlitt, to Lamb, to Wordsworth, to Sir Thomas Browne, to Defoe, to Hawthorne, to Montaigne, to Baudelaire, and to Obermann. . . . That, like it or not, is the way to learn to write.

See. The seat or throne of a bishop (Lat. sedes, a seat). The term is applied to the place where the bishop's cathedral is located and from which he takes his title; and so is to be distinguished from diocese, the territory over which he has jurisdiction.

The Holy See. The Papacy, the papal jurisdiction and court.

Seel. To close the eyelids of a hawk by running a thread through them; to hoodwink. (Fr., ciller, cil, the eyelash).

She that so young could give out such a seeming,

To seal her father's eyes up, close as oak.

Othello, iii, 3.

Seian Horse, The (si' an). A possession which invariably brought ill luck with it. Hence the Latin proverb Ille homo habet equum Seianum. Cneius Seius had an Argive horse, of the breed of Diomed, of a bay colour and surpassing beauty, but it was fatal to its possessor. Seius was put to death by Mark Antony. Its next owner, Cornelius Dolabella, who bought it for 100,000 sesterces, was killed in Syria during the civil wars. Caius Cassius, who next took possession of it, perished after the battle of Philippi by the very sword which stabbed Cæsar. Antony had the horse next, and after the battle of Actium slew himself.

Like the gold of Tolosa and Hermione's necklace, the Seian or Sejan horse was a fatal possession.

Selah (sē' la). A Hebrew word occurring often in the Psalms (and three times in Habakkuk iii), indicating some musical or liturgical direction, such as a pause, a repetition, or the end of a section.

Select Man. In some of the New England States a member of a board of town officers who has been deputed to be responsible for the conduct of certain branches of local administration.

Selene (se lē' nē). The moon goddess of Greek mythology, daughter of Hyperion and Thea, and roughly corresponding to the Roman Diana (q.v.), the chaste huntress. Selene had fifty daughters by Endymion, and several by Zeus, one of whom was called "The Dew." Diana is represented with bow and arrow running after the stag; but Selene in a chariot drawn by two white horses, with wings on her shoulders, and a sceptre in her hand.

Seleucidæ (se lū' si dē). The dynasty of Seleucus Nicator, one of Alexander's generals (about 358-280 B.C.), who in 312 conquered Babylon and succeeded to a part of Alexander's vast empire. The monarchy consisted of Syria, a part of Asia Minor, and all the eastern provinces, and the line of the Selucids reigned till about 64 B.C.

Self. Used in combination for a variety of purposes, such as (1) to express direct or indirect reflexive action, as in self-command; (2) action performed independently, or without external agency, as in self-acting, self-fertilization; (3) action or relation to the self, as in self-conscious, self-suspicious; (4) uniformity, naturalness, etc., as in self-coloured, self-glazed.

A self-made man. One who has risen from poverty and obscurity to opulence and a position of importance by his own efforts. The phrase was originally American.

The Self-denying Ordinance. The bill passed by the Long Parliament in 1645 ordering that Members of either House should give up their military commands and civil appointments within forty days; the reason being the suspicion that the Civil War was being prolonged for personal ends.

Self-determination. The theory in political economy, that every nation, no matter how small or weak, has the right to decide upon its own form of government and to manage its own internal affairs. The phrase acquired its present significance during the attempts to resettle Europe after World War I; but difficulties arose (as in the case of Ireland) when it was discovered that an exact and comprehensive definition of the word Nation could not be agreed upon.

Seljuks (sel'jüks). A Perso-Turkish dynasty of eleven emperors over a large part of Asia, which lasted 138 years (1056-1194). It was founded by Toghrul Beg, a descendant of Seljuk, chief of a small tribe which gained possession of Bokara.

Selkirk, Alexander, was probably the original of Robinson Crusoe. Born in 1676, the son of a Fifehire shoemaker, he joined Dampier's expedition to the South Seas in 1703 and when off the island of Juan Fernandez asked to be set ashore in consequence of a quarrel with the captain. He remained on the island for 52 months and was eventually picked up by Captain Woodes Rogers, whose Cruising Voyage Round the World, in which he tells of Selkirk, is supposed to have given Defoe the idea of Robinson Crusoe. Selkirk died at sea, as mate of the Weymouth, in 1721.

Sell. Slang for a swindle, a hoax, a first-of-April trick; and the person hoaxed is said to be sold.

A selling race. One in which the horses that compete are sold after the race, the sale price being determined beforehand. The winner is generally sold by auction, and the owner gets both the selling price and the stakes. If at the auction a price is obtained above the ticketed price it is divided between the second best horse and the race fund. See HANDICAP.

Selling the pass. Betraying one's own side. The phrase was originally Irish, and is applied to those who turn king's evidence, or who impeach their comrades for money. The tradition is that a regiment was sent by Crotha, "lord of Atha," to hold a pass against the invading army of Trathal, "King of Cael." The pass was betrayed for money; the Firbolgs were subdued, and Trathal assumed the title of "King of Ireland."

To sell a person up. To dispose of his goods by order of the court because he cannot pay his debts, the proceeds going to his creditors.

Seller's Round. An old country dance, very popular in Elizabethan times, in which—the dancers take hands, go round twice and back again; then all set, turn, and repeat; then lead all forward, and back, and repeat; two singles and back, set and turn single and repeat; arms all and repeat.—JOHN PLAYFORD: The English Dancing Master (1651).

It is said to be so called either from Sir Thomas Sellynger, buried in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, about 1470, or from Sir Anthony St. Leger, Lord Deputy of Ireland (d. 1559).

Semantics (se män' tiks). The technical term for the study of the meanings of words rather than of their origins and derivations. As time passes the meanings and implications of words change, often imperceptibly; it is with these changes that semantics deals.

Semele (sem' ele). In Greek mythology, the daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia. By Zeus she was the mother of Dionysus, and was slain by lightning when he granted her request to appear before her as the God of Thunder.

Seminary. A college exclusively devoted to the training of candidates for the R.C. priesthood. The usual course is six years—two of philosophy and four of theology. Seminary priests is an historical and legal term to distinguish English priests ordained abroad from those ordained in England before the accession of Queen Elizabeth I. The latter are often called Marian priests, and they were treated more leniently by the penal laws. After 1585 it was high treason for a seminary priest even to be in England.

Semi-precious stones. Gems suitable for jewellery and for ornamenting other sorts of goldsmith's work; but not sufficiently beautiful, durable or rare to be ranked with such precious stones as diamonds, emeralds, rubies, and sapphires. Examples of semi-precious stones are amethysts, cairngorms, cornelian, lapis-lazuli, moonstones, and onyx.

Semiramis (se mir' á mis). In the Babylonian mythology, the mother of Ninus who was King of Assyria and founded Nineveh. She waged war against the Medes and the Chaldeans (c. 800 B.C.). After her death she became a legendary figure, identified with the Goddess Ishtar and her doves.

Semiramis of the North, The. Margaret of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway (1353-1412), and Catherine II of Russia (1729-96) have both been so called.

Semitic (se mī' ic). Pertaining to the descendants of Shem (see Gen. x), viz. the Hebrews, Arabs, Assyrians, Aramæans, etc., nowadays applied to the Jews.

The Semitic languages are the ancient Assyrian and Chaldee, Aramaic, Syriac, Arabic, Hebrew, Samaritan, Ethiopic, and old Phœnician. The great characteristic of this family of languages is that the roots of words consist of three consonants.

Senatus consultum (sen a' tus kon sūl' tum). A decree of the Senate of Ancient Rome. The term was sometimes applied to a decree of any senate, especially that of the First Empire in France.

Send, To. That sends me. Amateurs of jazz use this phrase, meaning: The music sends me out of myself, or into ecstasies.

Seneschal (sen' e shāl). The majordomo or steward of a great house in the Middle Ages. He had full authority over the retainers and servants, supervised all ceremonial affairs, administered justice in the name of his master, and was in every way a personage of considerable importance.

Se'nnight. A week; seven nights. Forr'night, fourteen nights. These words are relics of the ancient Celtic custom of beginning the day at sunset, a custom observed by the ancient Greeks, Babylonians, Persians, Syrians, and Jews, and by the modern representatives of these people. In Gen. i we find the evening precedes the morning; as, "The evening and the morning were the first day," etc.

Sense. Common sense. See COMMON.

Scared out of my seven senses. According to ancient teaching the soul of man, or his "inward holy body," is compounded of the seven properties which are under the influence of the seven planets. Fire animates, earth gives the sense of feeling, water gives speech, air gives taste, mist gives sight, flowers give hearing, the south wind gives smelling. Hence the seven senses are animation, feeling, speech, taste, sight, hearing, and smelling (see Ecclus. xviii, 5).

Sentences, Master of the. The Schoolman, Peter Lombard (d. 1160), an Italian theologian and bishop of Paris, author of The Four Books of Sentences (Sententiarum libri iv), a compilation from the Fathers of the leading arguments pro and con, bearing on the hair-splitting theological questions of the Middle Ages.

The mediæval graduates in theology, of the second order, whose duty it was to lecture on the Sentences, were called Sententiatory Bachelors.

Separation, The. The name given in the 17th century to the body of Independents and Protestant dissenters generally—called individually Separatists. Thus the Amsterdam parson, Tribulation Wholesome, says:

These chastisements are common to the saints,
And such rebukes, we of the Separation,
Must bear with willing shoulders, as the trials
Sent forth to tempt our frailties.

BEN JONSON: The Alchemist, iii, 2.

Sephardim (sef' ar' dim). The Jews of Spain and Portugal, so called from Sepharad, a district mentioned in Obad. 20, which was supposed by the rabbinical commentators to be intended for Spain. As Jews were evidently in captivity at Sepharad at the time the passage was written this cannot possibly be the correct interpretation.

Sepoy (sē' poi). The Anglicized form of Hindu and Persian sipahi, a soldier, from sipah, army, denoting a native East Indian soldier trained and disciplined in the British manner. It was especially applied to such a soldier in the British Indian Army.

Sept. Deriving from the O.French septe, a variant of secte or sect, this term was applied especially to an Irish clan. The old Irish sept was a division of the tribe, of which it was an offshoot. The freemen of the sept bore the clan name with the prefix "Ua," grandson, written in English as "O'."

September. The seventh month from March, where the year used to commence.

The old Dutch name was Herst-maand (autumn-month); the old Saxon, Gerst-monath (barley-month), or Hæfest-monath; and after the introduction of Christianity Halig-monath (holy-month, the nativity of the Virgin Mary being on the 8th, the exaltation of the Cross on the 14th, Holy-Rood Day on the 26th and St. Michael's Day on the 29th). In the French Republican calendar, it was called Fructidor (fruit-month, August 18th to September 21st).

September Bible. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

September massacres. An indiscriminate slaughter, during the French Revolution, of loyalists confined in the Abbaye and other prisons, lasting from September 2nd to 5th, 1792. Danton gave the order after the capture of Verdun by the allied Prussian army; as many as 8,000 persons fell, among whom was the Princess de Lamballe. Those who instigated or took part in the massacres were known as Septembriseurs.

Septentrional Signs (sep ten' tri ò nāl). The first six signs of the Zodiac, because they belong to the northern celestial hemisphere. The North was called the septentrion from the seven stars of the Great Bear (Lat. septem, seven, triones, plough oxen). Cp. URSA MAJOR.

Septuagesima Sunday (sep tū à jes' i mà). The third Sunday before Lent; in round numbers, seventy days (Lat. septuagesima dies) before Easter. Really only sixty-eight days before Easter.

Septuagint (sep' tū à jint). A Greek version of the Old Testament and Apocrypha, so called because it was traditionally said to have been made by seventy-two Palestinian Jews in the 3rd century B.C., at the command of Ptolemy Philadelphus. They worked on the island of Pharos and completed the translation in seventy-two days.

This tradition applies, however, only to the Pentateuch; Greek translations of the other books were added by later writers, some, perhaps, being as late as the Christian era. The name Septuagint is frequently printed LXX.

Sepulchre, The Holy. The cave outside the walls of Jerusalem in which the body of Christ is believed to have lain between His burial and resurrection. From at least the 4th century (see INVENTION OF THE CROSS, under CROSS) the spot has been covered by a Christian church.

Knights of the Holy Sepulchre. An order of military knights founded by Godfrey of Bouillon, in 1099, to guard the Holy Sepulchre. Since 1342 it has existed only as a religious body, the Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem being its Grand Master.

Seraglio (sè ra' lyò). The palace of the Sultans of Turkey at Constantinople, situated on the Golden Horn, and enclosed by walls seven miles and a half in circuit. The chief entrance was the Sublime Gate (cp. SUBLIME PORTE); and the chief of the large edifices is the Harem, or "sacred spot," which contained numerous houses, one for each of the sultan's wives, and others for his concubines. The Seraglio might be visited by strangers; not so the Harem.

Seraphic (se rāf' ik). Seraphic Blessing. The blessing written by St. Francis of Assisi at the request of Brother Leo on Mt. Alverna, in 1224. It is based on Numbers vi, 25: May the Lord bless thee and keep thee. May He shew His face to thee and have mercy on thee. May He turn His countenance to thee and give thee peace. May the Lord bless thee, Brother Leo.

The Seraphic Doctor. The scholastic philosopher, St. Bonaventura (1221-74).

The Seraphic Father, or Saint. St. Francis of Assisi (1182-1226), whence the Franciscans are sometimes called the Seraphic Order.

The Seraphic Hymn. The Sanctus "Holy, holy, holy" (Is. vi, 3), which was sung by the seraphim.

Seraphim. The highest of the nine choirs of angels, so named from the seraphim of Is. vi, 2. The word is probably the same as saraph, a serpent, from saraph, to burn (in allusion to its bite); and thus connexion with burning suggested to early Christian interpreters that the seraphim were specially distinguished by the ardency of their zeal and love.

Seraphim is a plural form; the singular, seraph, was first used in English by Milton. Abdiel was

The flaming Seraph, fearless, though alone,
Encompassed round with foes.

Paradise Lost, v, 875.

Serapis (se rä' pis). The Ptolemaic form of Apis, an Egyptian deity who, when dead, was honoured under the attributes of Osiris (q.v.), and thus became "osirified Apis" or [O]Sorapis. He was lord of the underworld, and was identified by the Greeks with Hades.

Serat, Al. See AL-SIRAT.

Serbonian Bog, The (sēr bō' nī ān). A great morass, now covered with shifting sand, between the isthmus of Suez, the Mediterranean, and the delta of the Nile, that in Strabo's time was a lake stated by him to be 200 stadia long and 50 broad, and by Pliny to be 150 miles in length. Typhon was said to dwell at the bottom of it, hence its other name, Typhon's Breathing Hole.

A gulf profound as that Serbonian bog,
Betwixt Damietta and Mount Cassius old,
Where armies whole have sunk.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, ii, 592.

The term is used figuratively of a mess from which there is no way of extricating oneself.

Serendipity (se rēn dip' i ti). A happy coinage by Horace Walpole to denote the faculty of making lucky and unexpected "finds" by accident. In a letter to Mann (January 28th, 1754) he says that he formed it on the title of a fairy story, The Three Princes of Serendip, because the princes—were always making discoveries, by accidents and sagacity, of things they were not in quest of.

Serendip is an ancient name of Ceylon!

Serene (Lat. serenus, 'clear, calm). A title formerly given to certain German princes. Those who used to hold under the empire were entitled Serene or Most Serene Highnesses.

It's all serene. All right (Span. sereno, all right—the sentinel's countersign).

The drop serene. See DROP.

Sergeanty or Serjeanty. A feudal tenure, the tenant rendering some specified personal service to the king.

Petit sergeanty. Holding lands of the Crown by the service of rendering annually some small implement of war, as a bow, a sword, a lance, a flag, an arrow, and the like. Thus the Duke of Wellington holds Strathfieldsaye and Apsley House, London, by presenting a flag annually to the Crown on the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo, and the Duke of Marlborough pays a similar "peppercorn rent" for Blenheim Palace on the anniversary of the battle of Blenheim.

Serif and Sanserif (ser' if, sän ser' if). The former is type with the wings or finishing stroke (as T); the latter is type without the finishing strokes (as T).

Serjeants-at-Law. A superior order of barristers (q.v.) abolished in 1877. From the Low Latin serviens ad legem, one who serves (the king) in matters of law. Serjeants Inn, formerly in Chancery Lane and later in Fleet Street, was their inn at law.

Serpent. See also SNAKE. The serpent is symbolical of—

(1) Deity, because, says Plutarch, "it feeds upon its own body; even so all things spring from God, and will be resolved into deity again" (De Iside et Osiride, i, 2, p. 5; and Philo Byblius).

(2) Eternity, as a corollary of the former. It is represented as forming a circle, holding its tail in its mouth.

(3) Renovation and the healing art. It is said that when old it has the power of growing young again "like the eagle," by casting its slough, which is done by squeezing itself between two rocks. It was sacred to Æsculapius (q.v.), the Greek god of medicine, as it was supposed to have the power of discovering healing herbs. Hence, two serpents appear in the badge of the Royal Army Medical Corps. See CADUCEUS.

(4) Guardian spirit. It was thus employed by the ancient Greeks and Romans, and not unfrequently the figure of a serpent was depicted on their altars.

In the temple of Athena at Athens, a serpent, supposed to be animated by the soul of Ericthonius, was kept in a cage, and called "the Guardian Spirit of the Temple."

(5) Wisdom. "Be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves" (Matt. x, 16).

(6) Subtlety. "Now the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field" (Gen. iii, 1).

It is also symbolical of the devil, as the Tempter, and in early pictures is sometimes placed under the feet of the Virgin, in allusion to the promise made to Eve after the fall (Gen. iii, 15).

In Christian art it is an attribute of St. Cecilia, St. Euphemia, St. Patrick, and many other saints, either because they trampled on Satan, or because they miraculously cleared some country of snakes.

Fable has it that the cerastes hides in sand that it may bite the horse's foot and get the rider thrown. In allusion to this belief, Jacob says, "Dan shall be . . . an adder in the path, that biteth the horse heels, so that his rider shall fall backward" (Gen. xlix, 17). The Bible also tells us that the serpent stops up its ears that it may not be charmed by the charmers, "charming never so wisely" (Ps. lviii, 4).

Another old idea about snakes was that when attacked they would swallow their young and not eject them until reaching a place of safety.

It was in the form of a serpent, says the legend, that Jupiter Ammon appeared to Olympia and became by her the father of Alexander the Great.

Pharaoh's serpent. See PHARAOH.

Sea serpent. See SEA.

The serpent of old Nile. Cleopatra, so called by Antony.

He's speaking now,
Or murmuring "Where's my serpent of old Nile?"
For so he calls me.

Antony and Cleopatra, i, 5.

Their ears have been serpent-licked. They have the gift of foreseeing events, the power of seeing into futurity. This is a Greek superstition. It is said that Cassandra and Helenus were gifted with the power of prophecy, because serpents licked their ears while sleeping in the temple of Apollo.

To cherish a serpent in your bosom. To show kindness to one who proves ungrateful. The Greeks say that a husbandman found a frozen serpent, which he put into his bosom. The snake was revived by the warmth, and stung its benefactor. Shakespeare applies the tale to a serpent's egg:

Therefore think him as a serpent's egg
Which, hatched, would (as his kind) grow dangerous.
Julius Caesar, ii, 1.

Serpentine Verses. Such as end with the same word as they begin with. The following are examples:—

Crescit amor nummi, quantum ipsa pecunia crescit.
(Greater grows the love of pelf, as pelf itself grows greater.)

Ambo florentes ætatis, Arcades ambo.
(Both in the spring of life, Arcadians both.)

The allusion is to the old representations of snakes with their tails in their mouths—no beginning and no end.

Serve. I'll serve him out—give him a quid pro quo. This is the French desserver, to do an ill turn to one.

Serves you right! You've got just what you deserved.

To serve a rope. To lash or whip it with thin cord to prevent it fraying.

To serve a sentence. To undergo the punishment awarded.

To serve a writ on. To deliver into the hands of the person concerned a legal writ.

To serve a mare. To place a stallion to her.

To serve one's time. To hold an office or appointment for the full period allowed; to go through one's apprenticeship; also, to serve one's sentence in prison.

Servus servorum (sēr' vūs sēr vōr' ūm) (Lat.). The slave of slaves, the drudge of a servant. Servus servorum Dei (the servant of the servants of God) is one of the honorific epithets of the Pope; it was first adopted by Gregory the Great (590-604).

Sesame (ses' á mi). Open, Sesame. The "password" at which the door of the robbers' cave flew open in the tale of The Forty Thieves (Arabian Nights); hence, a key to a mystery, or anything that acts like magic in obtaining a favour, admission, recognition, etc.

Sesame is an East Indian annual herb, with an oily seed which is used as a food, a laxative, etc. In Egypt they eat sesame cakes, and the Jews frequently add the seed to their bread.

Sesquipedalian (ses kwi pē dā' lī án) is sometimes applied in heavy irony to cumbersome and pedantic words. It comes from Horace's sesquipedalia verba, words a foot and a half long.

Session, Court of. See COURT.

Sestina (ses tē' ná). A set form of poem, usually rhymed, with six stanzas of six lines each and a final triplet. The terminal words of stanzas 2 to 6 are the same as those of stanza 1 but arranged differently. Sestinas were invented by the Provençal troubadour Arnaut Daniel (13th cent.); Dante, Petrarch, and others employed them in Italy, Cervantes and Camoens in the Peninsula, and an early use in English was by Drummond of Hawthornden. Swinburne's sestinas are probably the best in English.

Set. The Egyptian original of the Greek Tython (q.v.), the god of evil, brother (or son) of Osiris, and his deadly enemy. He is represented as having the body of a man and the head of some unidentified mythological beast with pointed muzzle and high square ears.

Set, To. A set scene. In theatrical parlance, a scene built up by the stage carpenters, or a furnished interior, as a drawing-room, as distinguished from an ordinary or shifting scene.

A set to. A boxing match, a pugilistic fight, a scolding. In pugilism the combatants were by their seconds "set to the scratch" or line marked on the ground.

Setting a hen. Giving her a certain number of eggs to hatch. The whole number for incubation is called a setting.

Setting a saw. Bending the teeth alternately to the right and left in order to make it cut.

The setting of a jewel. The frame or mount of gold or silver surrounding a jewel in a ring, brooch, etc.

This precious stone set in the silver sea.
Richard II, ii, 1.

The setting of the sun, moon, or stars. Their sinking below the horizon. The saying, The sun never sets on the British dominions was used long ago of other empires. Thus, in the Pastor Fido (1590) Guarini speaks of Philip II of Spain as—that proud monarch to whom, when it grows dark [elsewhere] the sun never sets:

Captain John Smith in his Advertisements for the Unexperienced notes that—the brave Spanish soldiers brag The sunne never sets in the Spanish dominions, but ever shineth on one part or other we have conquered for our king:

and Thomas Gage in his Epistle Dedicatory to his New Survey of the West Indies (1648) writes—

It may be said of them [the Dutch], as of the Spaniards, that the Sun never sets upon their Dominions.

To set off to advantage. To display a thing in its best light, put the best construction on it. Perhaps a phrase from the jewellers' craft.

To set the Thames on fire. See THAMES.

Setebos (set' e bos). A god or devil worshipped by the Patagonians, and introduced by Shakespeare into his Tempest as the god of Sycorax, Caliban's mother.

His art is of such power,
It would control my dam's god, Setebos,
And make a vassal of him. Tempest, i, 2.

The cult of Setebos was first known in Europe through Magellan's voyage round the world, 1519-21.

Seven. A mystic or sacred number; it is composed of four and three, which, among the Pythagoreans, were, and from time immemorial have been, accounted lucky numbers. Among the Babylonians, Egyptians, and other ancient peoples there were seven sacred planets; and the Hebrew verb to swear means literally "to come under the influence of seven things"; thus seven ewe lambs figure in the oath between Abraham and Abimelech at Beersheba (Gen. xxi, 28), and Herodotus (III, viii) describes an Arabian oath in which seven stones are smeared with blood.

There are seven days in creation, seven days in the week, seven graces, seven divisions in the Lord's Prayer, seven ages in the life of man, climacteric years are seven and nine with their multiples by odd numbers, and the seventh son of a seventh son was always held notable.

Among the Hebrews every seventh year was sabbatical, and seven times seven years was the jubilee. The three great Jewish feasts lasted seven days, and between the first and second were seven weeks. Levitical purifications lasted seven days. The number is associated with a variety of occurrences in the Old Testament.

In the Apocalypse we have seven churches of Asia, seven candlesticks, seven stars, seven trumpets, seven spirits before the throne of God, seven horns, seven vials, seven plagues, a seven-headed monster, and the Lamb with seven eyes.

The old astrologers and alchemists recognized seven planets, each having its own "heaven"—

The bodies seven, eek, lo hem heer anoon;
Sol gold is, and Luna silver we therepe,
Mars yren, Mercurie quyksilver we clepe;
Saturnus leed, and Jubitur is tyn;
And Venus coper, by my fader kyn.

CHAUCER: Prol. of the Canon's Yeoman's Tale.

And from this very ancient belief sprang the theory that man was composed of seven substances, and has seven natures. See under SENSE.

Seven, The. Used of groups of seven people, especially (1) the "men of honest report" chosen by the Apostles to be the first Deacons (Acts vi, 5), viz., Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicholas; (2) the Seven Bishops (see below); or (3) the Seven Sages of Greece (see WISE MEN). See ALSO SEVEN NAMES, below.

Seven Against Thebes, The. The seven Argive heroes (Adrastus, Polynices, Tydeus, Amphiaræus, Capaneus, Hippomedon, and Parthenopæus), who, according to Greek legend, made war on Thebes with the object of restoring Polynices (son of Œdipus), who had been expelled by his brother Eteocles. All perished except Adrastus (q.v.), and the brothers slew each other in single combat. The legend is the subject of one of the tragedies of Æschylus. See NEMEAN GAMES.

Seven Bishops, The. Archbishop Sancroft, and Bishops Lloyd, Turner, Ken, White, Lake, and Trelawney, who refused to read James II's Declaration of Indulgence (1688), and were in consequence sent to the Tower for non-conforming. Cp. NONJURORS.

Seven Champions, The. The mediæval designation of the national patron saints of England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland, France, Spain, and Italy. In 1596 Richard Johnson published a chap-book, The Famous History of the Seven Champions of Christendom. In this he relates that St. George of England was seven years imprisoned by the Almidor, the black king of Morocco; St. Denys of France lived seven years in the form of a hart; St. James of Spain was seven years dumb out of love to a fair Jewess; St. Anthony of Italy, with the other champions, was enchanted into a deep sleep in the Black Castle, and was released by St. George's three sons, who quenched the seven lamps by water from the enchanted fountain; St. Andrew of Scotland delivered six ladies who had lived seven years under the form of white swans; St. Patrick of Ireland was immured in a cell where he scratched his grave with his own nails; and St. David of Wales slept seven years in the enchanted garden of Ormandine, and was redeemed by St. George.

Seven Churches of Asia. Those mentioned in Rev. i, 11, viz.:—

(1) Ephesus, founded by St. Paul, 57, in a ruinous state in the time of Justinian.

(2) Smyrna. Polycarp was its first bishop.

(3) Pergamos, renowned for its library.

(4) Thyatira, now called Ak-hissar (the White Castle).

(5) Sardis, now Sart, a small village.

(6) Philadelphia, now called Allah Shehr (City of God).

(7) Laodicea, now a deserted place called Eski-hissar (the Old Castle).

Seven cities warred for Homer being dead. See HOMER.

Seven Deadly or Capital sins. Pride, Wrath, Envy, Lust, Gluttony, Avarice, Sloth.

The Island of the Seven Cities. A land of Spanish fable, where seven bishops, who quitted Spain during the dominion of the Moors, founded seven cities. The legend says that many have visited the island, but no one has ever quitted it.

Seven Dials (London). A column with seven dials formerly stood facing the seven streets which radiated therefrom.

Where famed St. Giles's ancient limits spread

An in-railed column rears its lofty head,

Here to seven streets seven dials count the day,

And from each other catch the circling ray.

GAY: Trivia, ii.

The district had at one time an unenviable reputation for squalor (cp. GILES, St.); hence Sir W. S. Gilbert's—

Hearts just as pure and fair

May beat in Belgrave Square,

As in the lowly air

Of Seven Dials —Iolanthe.

Seven Gifts of the Spirit, The. Wisdom, Understanding, Counsel, Power or Fortitude, Knowledge, Righteousness, and Godly Fear.

Seven Gods of Luck, The. In Japanese folklore, Bentein, goddess of love, Bishamon, god of war, Daikoku, of wealth, Ebisu, of self-effacement, Fukurokujin and Jurojin, gods of longevity, and Hstei, god of generosity. These are really popular conceptions of the seven Buddhist devas who preside over human happiness and welfare.

Seven Heavens, The. See HEAVEN.

Seven Hills. The walls of Ancient Rome, built about the 6th century B.C., included the seven hills, Palatine, Capitol, Aventine, Caelian, Esquiline, Viminal and Quirinal. The heart of the modern city clings to these hills, in some cases now scarcely perceptible rises in the street level.

Seven Joys, The. See MARY.

Seven Names of God, The. The ancient Hebrews had many names for the Deity (see under NAME, To take God's name in vain, and ELOHISTIC), and the Seven over which the scribes had to exercise particular care were—El, Elohim, Adonai, YHWH (i.e. our Jehovah), Ehyeh-Asher-Ehyeh, Shaddai, and Zebaoth. In mediæval times God was sometimes called simply, The Seven.

Now lord, for thy naymes sevyne, that made both moyn and starnys,
Well mo then I can nevyn thī will, lord, of me tharnys.
Towneley Mysteries, xiii, 191 (about 1460).

Seven Planets, Sacraments, The. See these headings.

Seven Sages of Greece, The. See WISE MEN.

Seven Sciences, The. See SCIENCE.

Seven Seas, The. The Arctic and Antarctic, North and South Pacific, North and South Atlantic, and the Indian Oceans.

Seven Sisters, The. An old name of the Pleiades; also given to a set of seven cannon, cast by one Robert Borthwick and used at Flodden (1513).

Seven Sleepers, The. Seven Christian youths of Ephesus, according to the legend, who fled in the Decian persecution (250) to a cave in Mount Celion. After 230 years they awoke, but soon died, and their bodies were taken to Marseilles in a large stone coffin, still shown in Victor's church. Their names are Constantine, Dionysius, John, Maximian, Malchus, Martinian, and Serapion. This fable took its rise from a misapprehension of the words, "They fell asleep in the Lord"—i.e. died.

The mystic number is connected with other mediæval "Sleepers"; thus, Barbarossa turns himself once every seven years; once every seven years, also, Ogier the Dane thunders on the floor with his iron mace; and it was seven years that Tannhauser and Thomas of Ercildoune spent beneath the earth in magic enthrallment.

Seven Sorrows. See MARY.

Seven Stars, The. Used formerly of the planets; also of the Pleiades and the Great Bear.

Fool: The reason why the seven stars are no more than seven is a pretty reason.

Lear: Because they are not eight?

Fool: Yes, indeed; thou wouldst make a good fool.

King Lear, i, 5.

Seven Virtues, The. See VIRTUES.

Seven Weeks War, The. The war between Austria and Prussia in 1866 (June-July), ostensibly to settle the Schleswig-Holstein question, but in fact to end the long existing rivalry between the two countries and bring Austria to her knees. This was quickly done; the Austrians were decisively defeated at Sadowa (July 3rd), and her Italian allies on land at Custoza (June 24th) and at sea off Lissa (July 20th). Truce was declared on July 26th, and the Peace of Prague signed on August 23rd.

Seven Wise Masters, The. A collection of Oriental tales (see SANDABAR) supposed to be told by his advisers to an Eastern king to show the evils of hasty punishment, with his answers to them. Lucien, the son of the king (who, in some versions, is named Dolopathos), was falsely accused to him by one of his queens. By consulting the stars the prince discovered that his life was in danger, but that all would be well if he remained silent for seven days. The "Wise Masters" now take up the matter; each one in turn tells the king a tale to illustrate the evils of ill-considered punishments, and as the tale ends the king resolves to relent; but the queen at night persuades him to carry out his sentence. The seven days being passed, the prince tells a tale which embodies the whole truth, whereupon the king sentences the queen to death. The tales were immensely popular, and the germs of many later stories are to be found in this collection.

Seven Wonders of the World, The. See WONDERS.

Seven Works of Mercy, The. See MERCY.

Seven Years War, The (1756-1763) was waged by France, Austria, Russia, Sweden, Saxony, and Spain against Frederick the Great of Prussia, Great Britain, and Hanover. The prime cause of the war was fear of Frederick, coupled with Maria Theresa's eagerness to regain Silesia as an Austrian possession. The exhaustion of his enemies and his own superior generalship gave Frederick the victory. Britain gained most out of the war—the conquest of Bengal and the capture of Quebec and hence the whole of Canada.

In the seventh heaven. See HEAVEN.

Seventh-day Adventists. A small sect of millenarians holding very strict sabbatarian views.

Seventh-day Baptists. Modern representatives of the Traskites (q.v.); more numerous in America than in England.

The seventh son of a seventh son. See SEVEN, above.

Several (late Lat. sēparāte, from sēparāre, to separate). The English word used simply to denote what is severed or separate; each, as "all and several."

Azariah was a leper, and dwelt in a several house.—2 Kings xv, 5.

And it is still used in this way, as—

Three times slipping from the outer edge,

I bump'd the ice into three several stars.

TENNYSON: The Epic, 12.

A several is the old legal term for a piece of enclosed ground adjoining a common field, or an enclosed pasture as opposed to an open field or common.

Severn. See SABRINA.

Severus, St. (se vēr' ūs). Patron saint of fullers, being himself of the same craft.

The Wall of Severus. A stone rampart, built in 208 by the Emperor Severus, between the Tyne and the Solway. It is to the north of Hadrian's wall, which was constructed in 120.

Sèvres Ware (sāvr). Porcelain of fine quality made at the French government works at Sèvres, near Paris. The factory was first established at Vincennes in 1745; in 1756 it was removed to Sèvres, and three years later was acquired by the state.

Sexagesima Sunday (seks á jes' i má). The second Sunday before Lent; so called because in round numbers it is sixty days (Lat. sexagesima dies) before Easter.

Sextile (seks' til). The aspect of two planets when distant from each other sixty degrees or two signs. This position is marked by astrologers thus *.

In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite
Of noxious efficacy.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, x, 659.

At Eton a sixth-form boy is called a Sextile.

Sexton. A corruption of sacristan, a church official who has charge of the sacra, or things attached to a specific church, such as vestments, cushions, books, boxes, tools, vessels, and so on.

Shaddock. A large kind of orange, now generally known as grape fruit (citrus decumana), so called from Captain Shaddock (early 18th century), who first transplanted one in the West Indies. It is a native of China and Japan.

Shade. Wine vaults with a lounge attached are often known as shades. The term originated at Brighton, where the Old Bank, in 1819, was turned into a smoking-room and bar. There was an entrance by the Pavilion Shades, or Arcade, and the name was soon transferred to the drinking-bar. It was not inappropriate, as the room was in reality shaded by the opposite house, occupied by Mrs. Fitzherbert.

To put someone in the shade. To out-do him, eclipse him; to attract to yourself all the applause and encomiums he had been enjoying.

Shadow. A word with a good many figurative and applied meanings, such as, a ghost; Macbeth says to the ghost of Banquo:—

Hence, horrible shadow! unreal mockery, hence!
Macbeth, iii, 4.

An imperfect or faint representation, as "I haven't the shadow of a doubt"; a constant attendant, as in Milton's "Sin and her shadow Death" (Paradise Lost, ix, 12); moral darkness or gloom—"He has outsoared the shadow of our night" (Shelley; Adonais, xl, 1); protecting influence—

Hither, like you ancient Tower,
Watching o'er the River's bed,
Fling the shadow of Thy power,
Else we sleep among the dead.

WORDSWORTH: Hymn (Jesu! bless).

Gone to the bad for the shadow of an ass. "If you must quarrel, let it be for something better than the shadow of an ass." Demosthenes says a young Athenian once hired an ass to Megara. The heat was so great at midday that he alighted to take shelter from the sun under the shadow of the poor beast. Scarcely was he seated when the owner came up and laid claim to the shadow, saying he let the ass to the traveller, but not the ass's shadow. After fighting for a time, they agreed to settle the matter in the law courts, and the suit lasted so long that both were ruined.

May your shadow never grow less! May your prosperity always continue and increase. The phrase is of Eastern origin. Fable has it that when those studying the black arts had made certain progress they were chased through a subterranean hall by the devil. If he caught only their shadow, or part of it, they became first-rate magicians, but lost either all or part of their shadow. This would make the expression mean, May you escape wholly and entirely from the clutches of the foul fiend. A more simple explanation of the phrase is, May you never waste away but always remain healthy and robust. See SCHLEMIHL.

To be reduced to a shadow. Of people, to become thoroughly emaciated; of things, to become an empty form from which the substance has departed.

To shadow. To follow about like a shadow, especially as a detective, with the object of spying out all one's doings.

Shady. A shady character. A person of very doubtful reputation; one whose character would scarcely bear investigation in the light of day.

On the shady side of forty—the wrong side, meaning more than forty.

SHAEF. Mnemonic of Supreme Headquarters Allied Expeditionary Forces, the supreme directive military organization, under the command of General Eisenhower, in the later stages of World War II. SHAEF was disbanded in July, 1945.

Shah. The title of the king or emperor of Persia; that of his sons is Shahzadah. It is a corruption of padishah (q.v.).

Shake. A good shake up. Something sudden that startles one out of his lethargy and rouses him to action.

A shake of the head. An indication of refusal, disapproval, annoyance, etc.

I'll do it in a brace of shakes. Instantly, as soon as you can shake the dice-box twice.

No great shakes. Nothing extraordinary; no such mighty bargain. The reference is probably to gambling with dice.

In two shakes of a lamb's tail. Instantly. American expression originating in the early 19th century.

To shake hands. A very old method of salutation and farewell; when one was shaking hands one could not get at one's sword to strike a treacherous blow. When Jehu asked Jehonadab if his "heart was right" with him, he said,

"If it be, give me thine hand," and Jehonadab gave him his hand (2 Kings x, 15). Nestor shook hands with Ulysses on his return to the Grecian camp with the stolen horses of Rhesus; Æneas, in the temple of Dido, sees his lost companions enter, and avid conjungere dexteras ardebant (Æneid, i, 514); and Horace, strolling along the Via Sacra, shook hands with an acquaintance. Arreptâque manu, "Quid agis dulcissimè rerum?"

To shake in one's shoes. See SHOE.

To shake one's sides. To be convulsed with laughter; cp. Milton's "Laughter holding both his sides" (L'Allegro).

To shake the dust from one's feet. See DUST.

Come and have a shakedown at my place—a bed for the night, especially a makeshift one. The allusion is to the time when men slept upon litter or clean straw.

Shakers. A sect of Second Adventists, founded in the 18th century in England by a secession from the Quakers, and transplanted in America by Ann Lee (1736-84), or "Mother Ann," as she is generally known. She was an uneducated factory hand, daughter of a Manchester blacksmith.

A sect of English Shakers, the "People of God," was founded in Battersea about 1864 by Mary Anne Girling (1827-86), a farmer's daughter; its chief seat was in the New Forest, and it disappeared soon after her death.

Shakespeare (1564-1616), the greatest poet and dramatist of all time and all countries. William Shakespeare born at Stratford-on-Avon, the third child of John Shakespeare, an alderman and bailiff of that town (variously described as a butcher, glover, and general trader), and Mary Arden, both of yeoman stock. He received a sound education at the Stratford grammar-school; in spite of Ben Jonson's remark that he had "small Latin and less Greek." Leaving Stratford in 1585 to avoid a prosecution for poaching by Sir Thomas Lucy ("Justice Shallow"), he came to London where he acted with the Earl of Leicester's company. His plays and poems were written between 1591 (Love's Labour's Lost) and 1611 (The Tempest). In the latter year he retired to Stratford, but visited London frequently, keeping up his relations with actors and poets until his death.

Ben Jonson calls him "Sweet Swan of Avon," also "The applause! delight! the wonder of our stage!" and says that "He was not for an age, but for all time" (To the Memory of Shakespeare). Milton calls him "Dear son of Memory, great heir of fame" (An Epitaph), and "Sweetest Shakespeare, fancy's child" (L'Allegro); to Collins he was "The perfect boast of Time" (Epistle to Sir Thos. Hanmer); to Coleridge, "Our myriad-minded Shakespeare" (Biog. Lit. xv); to Carlyle, "the greatest of intellects" (Characteristics of Shakespeare); to Christopher North, "the Poet Laureate of the Court of Faery"; to Landor, "not our poet, but the world's";

Dryden said of him—

Shakespeare's magic could not copied be;

Within that circle none durst walk but he.

Prologue to the Tempest.

And that he "was a man who of all modern and perhaps ancient poets, had the largest and most comprehensive soul." Young says—"He wrote the play the Almighty made"; (Epistle to Lord Lansdowne); Mallett—"Great above rule. . . Nature was his own" (Verbal Criticism); Dr. Johnson—

Each change of many-colour'd life he drew;
Exhausted worlds, and then imagined new;
Existence saw him spurn her bounded reign,
And panting Time toiled after him in vain.

Prologue, 1747.

Pope—

Shakespeare (whom you and every play-house bill Style "the divine," "the matchless," what you will)
For gain, not glory, winged his roving flight,
And grew immortal in his own despite.

Imitations of Horace, Ep. 1.

And Matthew Arnold—

Others abide our question. Thou art free.
We ask and ask—Thou smilest and art still,
Out-topping knowledge—Shakespeare.

There are thirty-seven plays credited wholly or in part to Shakespeare, and an enthusiast has discovered that they contain 106,007 lines and 814,780 words, Hamlet being the longest, with 3,930 lines, and the Comedy of Errors, with 1,777 lines the shortest. The plays contain 1,277 speaking characters, of whom only 157 are females. The longest part is that of Hamlet, who has 11,610 words to deliver.

Shakespeare's descendants.

Shakespeare married (1582) Anne Hathaway, of Shottery, who was eight years his senior, and died in 1623. They had one son and two daughters—Susanna (b. 1583), and the twins Hamnet and Judith (1585). Hamnet died at the age of 11; Judith married Thomas Quiney, had three sons, all of whom died young and unmarried, and died in 1662. Susanna married John Hall and died in 1649, leaving only one child, Elizabeth, the last descendant of the dramatist. She married twice, but had no children; and died as Lady Bernard, wife of Sir John Bernard, of Abington Manor, Northampton, in 1670.

Shakespeare; the name. There is no way of spelling the dramatist's name that is certainly "correct" (i.e. as he would himself have spelt it), because the six unquestionably genuine signatures of his that we possess (viz., three on the Will, two on the Blackfriars conveyance and mortgage, and one on his deposition in the suit brought by Stephen Bellot against Christopher Mountjoy) vary, and are very difficult to decipher. The most usual modern spelling—Shakespeare—is that used throughout the First and Second Folios (1623 and 1632), and in all the Quartos with the exception of the 1598 Love's Labour's Lost ("Shakespere") and the first 1608, King Lear ("Shakspeare"), in the dedicatory epistles to Venus and Adonis (1593) and Lucrece (1594), and though on his own monument the name is given as "Shakspeare," on the tombs of his wife and daughter "Shakespeare" is the spelling. Theobald (1733) used this spelling; Rowe (1709), Pope (1725), and Hanmer (1744) all followed the Third and Fourth Folios, which spelt the name "Shakespear." Steevens and Malone (1778) preferred "Shakspeare."

The "Shakspeare" spelling was used in Bell's edition of the works (1788), and in Knight's various editions (1839), etc., but its more recent adoption in literary circles is due to Sir Frederick Madden, who advocated it on the ground that this was the spelling of the most legible of the signatures—that in the copy of Florio's Montaigne (1603) now in the British Museum—and to Furnivall having founded the "New Shakspeare Society" to take the place of the defunct "Shakespeare Society." This signature is now, however, generally taken to be a forgery. The autograph in the Bellott-Mountjoy suit does not help matters, as it is abbreviated to "Willm Shak'p"; and on the bond that Shakespeare took out for his marriage licence the name appears as "Shagspere." See J. R. Wise's Autograph of William Shakespeare . . . together with 4,000 ways of spelling the name, published at Philadelphia in 1869.

The Shakespeare of divines. Jeremy Taylor (1613-67).

The Shakespeare of eloquence. So Barnave happily characterized the Comte de Mirabeau (1749-91).

The German Shakespeare. Kotzebue (1761-1819) has been so styled.

The Spanish Shakespeare. Calderon (1600-81).

Le Shakespeare du boulevard. Guilbert de Pixérécourt.

Shakespeare-Bacon Theory. The lack of culture and education ascribed to William Shakespeare started theories of some other authorship of his works so far back as 1769, and for many years desultory attempts were made to father his plays on contemporary poets and dramatists. In the 1860s Sir Robert Durning Lawrence not only ascribed Shakespeare's works to Lord Bacon but proceeded to assert that he was the real author of Montaigne's Essais, Marlowe's plays, Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy and other Elizabethan classics. In 1900 a Mrs. Gallup "discovered" a cipher which, applied to Shakespeare's plays, conclusively proved them to be the work of Lord Bacon. This same cipher, moreover, revealed the interesting fact that Bacon had made use of Alexander Pope's translation of the Iliad. The extravagant and unscholarly claim of the Baconians, mostly based negatively on Shakespeare's inadequacy, have reduced the theory to little more than the hobby of a few cranks.

Shakuntala. See SAKUNTALA.

Shaky. Not steady; not in good health; not strictly upright; not well prepared for examination; doubtfully solvent.

Shalott, The Lady of (shá lot'). A maiden of the Arthurian legends, who fell in love with Sir Lancelot of the Lake, and died because her love was not returned. Tennyson has a poem on the subject; and the story of Elaine (q.v.), "the lily maid of Astolat," is substantially the same.

Shamanism (sha' má nizm). A primitive form of religion, in which those who practise it believe that the world and all events are governed by good and evil spirits who can be propitiated or bought off only through the intervention of a witch-doctor, or Shaman. The word is Slavonic; it comes from the Samoyeds and other Siberian peoples, but is now applied to Red Indian and other primitive worship.

Shamefast. Bashful; awkward through shyness; sheepish. This is the old form of shamefaced (which is properly an error), the -fast meaning "firmly fixed" or "restrained" (by shame).

Shamrock, the symbol of Ireland, because it was selected by St. Patrick to illustrate to the Irish the doctrine of the Trinity. According to the elder Pliny no serpent will touch this plant.

Shandean (shǎn' dē'án). Characteristic of Tristram Shandy or the Shandy family in Sterne's novel, Tristram Shandy (9 vols., 1759-67). Tristram's father, Walter Shandy, is a metaphysical Don Quixote in his way, full of superstitious and idle conceits. He believes in long noses and propitious names, but his son's nose is crushed, and his name becomes Tristram instead of Trismegistus. Tristram's Uncle Toby was wounded at the siege of Namur, and is benevolent and generous, simple as a child, brave as a lion, and gallant as a courtier. His modesty with Widow Wadman and his military tastes are admirable. He is said to be drawn from Sterne's father. The mother was the beau-ideal of nonentity; and of Tristram himself, we hear almost more before he was born than after he had burst upon an astonished world.

Shanghai, To (shǎng hī'). An old nautical phrase meaning to drug a man insensible in order to get him on board an outward bound vessel in need of crew. It would appear to have originated in the phrase "ship him to Shanghai," i.e. send him on a long voyage.

Shangri La (shǎng gri'la'). The hidden Buddhist lama paradise described in James Hilton's Lost Horizon (1933). In World War II the name was applied to the secret air base used by the U.S.A. Air Force for the great attack on Japan.

Shanks's Mare. To ride Shanks's mare is to go on foot, the shanks being the legs. A similar phrase is "Going by the marrow-bone stage" or "by Walker's bus."

Shannon. Dipped in the Shannon. One who has been dipped in the Shannon is said to lose all bashfulness.

Shanties, Chanties. Songs sung by sailors at work, to ensure united action (Fr. chanter, to sing). They are in sets, each of which has a different cadence adapted to the work in hand. Thus, in sheeting topsails, weighing anchor, etc., one of the most popular of the shanty songs runs thus:—

I'm bound away, this very day,
I'm bound for the Rio Grande.
Ho, you, Rio!

Then fare you well, my bonny blue bell,
I'm bound for the Rio Grande.

A shanty is also a small wooden house, or a roughly-built hut.

Shan Van Voght. This excellent song (composed 1798) has been called the Irish Mar-seil-laise. The title of it is a corruption of An t-sean bhean bhocht (the poor old woman—i.e. Ireland). The last verse is—

Will Ireland then be free?

Said, the Shan Van Voght. [repeat]

Yes, Ireland shall be free

From the centre to the sea,

Hurrah for liberty!

Said the Shan Van Voght.

Shark. A swindler, a pilferer, an extortionate boarding-house keeper or landlord, etc.; one who snaps up things like a shark, which eats almost anything, and seems to care little whether its food is alive or dead, fish, flesh, or human bodies.

To shark up. To get a number of people, etc., together promiscuously, without consideration of their fitness.

Now, sir, young Fortinbras . . .

Hath in the skirts of Norway here and there

Shark'd up a list of lawless resoluters,

For food and diet, to some enterpriser

That hath a stomach in't.

Hamlet, i, 1.

Sharp. A regular Becky Sharp. An unprincipled, scheming young woman, who by cunning, hypocrisy, and low smartness raises herself from obscurity and poverty to some position in Society, and falls therefrom in due course after having maintained a more or less precarious foothold. Of course she is good-looking, and superficial amiability is a sine qua non. Becky Sharp, the original of this, is the principal character in Thackeray's Vanity Fair (1848).

Sharp practice. Underhand or dishonourable dealing; low-down trickery intended to advantage oneself.

Sharps and flats. See FLAT.

Sharp's the word! Look alive, there! no hanging about.

Sharp-set. Hungry; formerly used of hawks when eager for their food.

If anie were so sharpe-set as to eat fried flies, buttered bees, stued snails, either on Fridaie or Sundaie, he could not be therefore indicted of haulte treason.—STANIHURST: Ireland, p. 19 (1586).

Shave. Just a grazing touch; a near or close shave, a narrow escape; to shave through an examination, only just to get through, narrowly to escape being "plucked." At Oxford a pass degree is sometimes called a shave.

A good lather is half the shave. Your work is half done if you've laid your plans and made your preparations properly.

To shave a customer. A draper's expression for charging more for an article than it is worth; because, so it is said, when the manager sees a chance of doing this he strokes his chin as a sign to the assistant that he may fleece the customer all he can.

To shave an egg. To attempt to extort the uttermost farthing; to "skin a flint."

Shaveling. Used in contempt—especially after the Reformation—of a priest. At a time when the laity wore moustaches and beards the clergy were not only usually clean shaven but invariably wore large shaven tonsures.

It maketh no matter how thou live here, so thou have the favour of the pope and his shavelings.—JOHN BRADFORD (1510-1555) a Marian martyr.

B.D.—27

Shavian (shā' vi'ān). After the manner of George Bernard Shaw (1856-1950) or descriptive of his philosophy and style of humour.

She. She Bible, The. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

She Stoops to Conquer. Goldsmith's comedy (1773) owes its existence to an incident which actually occurred to its author. When he was sixteen years of age a wag residing at Ardagh directed him, when passing through that village, to Squire Fetherstone's house as the village inn. The mistake was not discovered for some time, and then no one enjoyed it more heartily than Oliver himself.

She-wolf of France. See WOLF.

Shear. God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb. See GOD.

Ordeal by sieve and shears. See SIEVE.

Shear or Shere Thursday. Maundy Thursday, the Thursday of Holy Week; so called, it is said, because in—old fadres dayes the people wolde that day shere theyr hedes, and clyppe theyr berdes, and poll theyr hedes, and so make them honest agens Ester day.

Sheathe. To sheathe the sword. To cease hostilities, make peace. In the early months of World War I the phrase "We will not sheathe the sword until the wrong done to Belgium has been righted" was a common slogan.

Sheba, The Queen of (shē' bā). The queen who visited Solomon (1 Kings x) is known to the Arabs as Balkis, Queen of Saba (Koran, ch. xxvii). Sheba was thought by the Greeks and Romans to have been the capital of what is now Yemen, S.W. Arabia; and the people over whom the queen reigned were the Sabæans.

Shebang (she bāŋ'). Fed up with the whole shebang. Tired of the whole concern and everything connected with it. Shebang is American slang for a hut or one's quarters; also for a cart; and also, in a humorously depreciatory way, for almost anything.

Shebeen (she bēn'). A place (originally only in Ireland) where liquor is sold without a licence; hence applied to any low-class public house. You've been takin' a dhrap o' the crathur an' Danny says "Troth, an' I been Dhrinking yer health wid Shamus O'Shea at Katty's shebeen." TENNYSON: To-morrow.

Shedem. See MAZIKEEN.

Sheep. Ram or tup, the sire; ewe, the dam; lamb, the young till weaned, when it is called a tup-hogget or ewe-hogget, as the case may be, or, if the tup is castrated, a wether-hogget.

After the removal of the first fleece, the tup-hogget becomes a shearling, the ewe-hogget a gimmer, and the wether-hogget a dinnont.

After the removal of the second fleece, the shearling becomes a two-shear tup, the gimmer an ewe, and the dinnont a wether.

After the removal of the third fleece, the ewe is called a twinter-ewe; and when it ceases to breed a draft-ewe.

Sheepish. Awkward and shy; bashful through not knowing how to deport oneself in the circumstances.

Sheep's head. A fool, a simpleton—

Gostanzo: What, sirrah, is that all?

No entertainment to the gentlewoman?

Valerio: Forsooth y'are welcome by my father's leave.

Gos.: What, no more compliment? Kiss her, you sheep's head!

Lady, you'll pardon our gross bringing up?

We dwell far off from court, you may perceive.

CHAPMAN: All Fools, II, 1.

The Black Sheep (Kârâ-koin-loo). A tribe which established a principality in Armenia that lasted 108 years (1360-1468); so called from the device of their standard.

The White Sheep (Ak-koin-loo). A tribe which established a principality in Armenia, etc., on the ruin of the Black Sheep (1468-1508); so called from the device of their standard.

There's a black sheep in every flock. In every club or party of persons there's sure to be at least one shady character.

To cast sheep's eyes. To look askance, in a sheepish way, at a person to whom you feel lovingly inclined.

But he, the beast, was casting sheep's eyes at her.—COLMAN: Broad Grins.

Vegetable sheep. See SCYTHIAN LAMB.

Sheepskin (U.S.A.). A college diploma.

Sheer Thursday. See SHEAR.

Sheet. Three sheets in the wind. Very drunk; just about as drunk as one can be. The sheet is the rope attached to the lower end of a sail, used for shortening and extending sail; if quite free, the sheet is said to be "in the wind," and the sail flaps and flutters without restraint. If all the three sails were so loosened, the ship would "reel and stagger like a drunken man."

Captain Cuttle looking, candle in hand, at Bunsby more attentively, perceived that he was three sheets in the wind, or, in plain words, drunk.—DICKENS: Dombey and Son.

That was my sheet anchor. My best hope, chief stay, last refuge; if that fails me, then all is indeed lost. The sheet anchor is the largest anchor of a ship, and in stress of weather, the sailor's chief dependence. The Greeks and Romans said, "my sacred anchor," because the sheet anchor was always dedicated to some god.

Sheikh (shêk, shek). A title of respect among the Arabs (like the Ital. signore. Fr. seur, Span. señor, etc.), but properly the head of a Bedouin clan, family, or tribe, or the headman of an Arab village.

Sheikh-ul-Islam. The Grand Mufti, or supreme head of the Mohammedan hierarchy in Turkey.

Shekels (shek' elz). Colloquial for money. The Hebrew shekel was a weight of about 250 grains troy, also a silver coin worth roughly 2s. 6d.

Shekinah (she ki' nâ) (Heb. shakan, to reside). The visible glory of the Divine Presence in the shape of a cloud, which rested over the mercy-seat between the Cherubim, and in the Temple of Solomon (see Exod. xl, 34-38). The word does not occur in the Bible, but is frequent in the Targums, and was employed by the Jews as a periphrasis for the Divine Name.

Sheldonian Theatre (shel dô' ni ân). The Senate House of Oxford; so called from Gilbert Sheldon (1598-1677), Archbishop of Canterbury, who built it.

Shelf. Laid on the shelf, or shelved. Put on one side as of no further use; superannuated. Said of officials and others no longer actively employed; an actor no longer assigned a part; a woman past the ordinary age of marriage; also of a pawn at the broker's, a question started and set aside, etc.

Shell (A.S. scell). The hard outside covering of nuts, eggs, molluscs, tortoises, etc.; hence applied to other hollow coverings, as a light or inner coffin, and the hollow projectile filled with explosives and missiles which will explode on impact or at a set time.

Eggshells. Many persons, after eating a boiled egg, break or crush the shell. This, according to Sir Thomas Browne—is but a superstitious relic . . . and the intent thereof was to prevent witchcraft; for lest witches should draw or prick their names therein, and veneficiously mischief their persons, they broke the shell.—Pseudodoxia Epidemica, V, xxii.

Scallop shells were the emblem of St. James the Great (q.v.), and were hence carried by pilgrims, under whose special protection they were.

Shell jacket. An undress military jacket, fatigue jacket.

Shell shock. An acute neurasthenic condition due to a shock to the system caused by the explosion of a shell or bomb at close quarters. The term came into use in World War I.

Shellback. Nautical slang for an old and seasoned sailor, an "old salt."

To retire into one's shell. To become reticent and uncommunicative, to withdraw oneself from society in a forbidding way. The allusion is to the tortoise, which, once it has "got into its shell," is quite unget-at-able.

See also NUTSHELL.

Shelter. In World War II this word, as an abbreviation of Air Raid Shelter, was especially applied to the various excavations, buildings, or devices employed as a protection against aerial bombing. Deep shelters, e.g. the London Tubes, were sufficiently far below the ground level to be immune from damage even by a direct hit. Such shelters as the Anderson (half above and half below ground, and made of corrugated steel) or the Morrison (a sort of steel dining-table with room for a bed beneath) afforded exiguous protection from blast or falling masonry.

Sheol. See HADES.

Shepherd. The Shepherd Kings. See HYKSOS.

The Shepherd Lord. Henry, tenth Lord Clifford (d. 1523), sent by his mother to be brought up by a shepherd, in order to save him from the fury of the Yorkists. At the accession of Henry VII he was restored to all his rights and seigniories. The story is told by Wordsworth in The Song for the Feast of Brougham Castle.

The Shepherd of Banbury. The ostensible author of a Weather Guide (published 1744). He styles himself John Claridge, Shepherd; but is said to have been a Dr. John Campbell.

The Shepherd of the Ocean. So Sir Walter Raleigh is called by Spenser—"

When I asked from what place he came,
And how he hight, himselfe he did ycleape
The Shepheard of the Ocean by name,
And said he came far from the main-sea deepe.

Colin Clout's Come Home Again, 64.

The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain. A famous religious tract by Mrs. Hannah More, first published in The Cheap Repository (1795), a series of moral "tales for the people." It had enormous popularity; and the story is said to be founded on the life of one David Saunders, who was noted for his homely wisdom and practical piety, whom she turns into a sort of Christian Arcadian.

The Shepherd's Sundial. The scarlet pimpernel, which opens at a little past seven in the morning and closes at a little past two. When rain is at hand, or the weather is unfavourable, it does not open at all.

The Shepherd's Warning

A red sky at night is the shepherd's delight,
But a red sky in the morning is the shepherd's warning.

The Italian saying is Sera rosso e bianco mattino allegra il pellegrino (a red evening and a white morning rejoice the pilgrim).

To shepherd. To guard and guide carefully as a shepherd does his flock; in colloquial use, to follow and spy on as a detective.

Sheppard, Jack (1702-24). A notorious highwayman, son of a carpenter in Smithfield, noted for his two escapes from Newgate in 1724. He was hanged at Tyburn the same year.

Shere Thursday. See SHEAR.

Sherif (she rêf'). A descendant of the Prophet Mohammed, formerly applied to the governor of Mecca. The title was also adopted by the rulers of Morocco, who claimed descent from the Prophet through his grandson Hasan.

Sheriff (sher' if). In mediæval and later times the sheriff (shire reeve) was an official who looked after the king's property in the various shires or counties. In England and Wales each county has its sheriff, called the High Sheriff, whose duty it is to keep the peace, administer justice under the direction of the courts, execute writs by deputy, preside over parliamentary elections, etc. There are sheriffs in certain cities such as Bristol, Norwich, etc., and the City of London has two.

In U.S.A. the sheriff is the officer in a county commissioned with the enforcement of law and order.

Sheriffmuir. There was mair lost at the Shirra-muir. Don't grieve for your losses, for worse have befallen others before now. The battle of Sheriffmuir, in 1715, between the Jacobites and Hanoverians was very bloody; both sides sustained heavy losses, and both sides claimed the victory.

Sherlock Holmes. The most important figure in detective fiction, the creation of Arthur Conan Doyle (1859-1930). His solutions of crimes and mysteries were related in a series of sixty stories that appeared in the Strand Magazine off and on between 1891 and 1927. The character was based on Dr. Joseph Bell, of the Edinburgh Infirmary, whose methods of deduction suggested a system that Holmes developed into a science; his stooge Watson was a skit on Doyle himself. Holmes's method is in itself simple—the observation of the minutest details and apparently insignificant circumstances; the correct interpretation and application of the information thus acquired enables him to solve the apparently unsolvable with a minimum of energy or detective apparatus.

Sherrick. Yorkshire for something very small. Used in Australia for a small amount of anything, particularly money.

Shewbread. Food for show only, and not intended to be eaten except by certain privileged persons. The term is Jewish, and refers to the twelve loaves (one for each tribe; see Exod. xxv, 30, Lev. xxiv, 5-8) which the priest "showed" or exhibited to Jehovah, by placing them week by week on the sanctuary table. At the end of the week, the priest was allowed to take them home for his own eating; but no one else could partake of them.

Shibboleth (shib' ò leth). The password of a secret society; the secret by which those of a party know each other; also a worn-out or discredited doctrine. The Ephraimites could not pronounce sh, so when they were fleeing from Jephthah and the Gileadites (Judges xii, 1-16) they were caught at the ford on the Jordan because Jephthah caused all the fugitives to say the word Shibboleth (meaning "a stream in flood"), which all the Ephraimites pronounced as Sibboleth.

Shield. The most famous shields in story are the Shield of Achilles described by Homer, of Hercules described by Hesiod, of Aeneas described by Virgil, and the Aegis (q.v.).

Others are that of:—

Agamemnon, a gorgon.

Ameycos (son of Poseidon), a crayfish, symbol of prudence.

Cadmus and his descendants, a dragon, to indicate their descent from the dragon's teeth.

Eteocles, one of the Seven Against Thebes, a man scaling a wall.

Hector, a lion.

Idomeneus, a cock.

Menelaus, a serpent at his heart; alluding to the elopement of his wife with Paris.

Parthenopæus, one of the Seven Against Thebes, a sphinx holding a man in its claws.

Ulysses, a dolphin. Whence he is sometimes called Delphinosemos.

Servius says that in the siege of Troy the Greeks had, as a rule, Neptune on their bucklers, and the Trojans Minerva.

It was a common custom, after a great victory, for the victorious general to hang his shield on the wall of some temple.

The clang of shields. When a chief doomed a man to death, he struck his shield with the blunt end of his spear by way of notice to the royal bard to begin the death-song.

Cairbar rises in his arms,
The clang of shields is heard.

OSSIAN: Temora, 1.

The Gold and Silver Shield. A mediæval allegory tells how two knights coming from opposite directions stopped in sight of a shield suspended from a tree branch, one side of which was gold and the other silver, and disputed about its metal, proceeding from words to blows. Luckily a third knight came up: the point was referred to him, and the disputants were informed that the shield was silver on one side and gold on the other. Hence the sayings, The other side of the shield, It depends on which side of the shield you are looking at, etc.

The Shield of Expectation. The perfectly plain shield given to a young warrior in his maiden campaign. As he achieved glory, his deeds were recorded or symbolized on it.

Shi'ites (Arab. shi'ah, a sect). Those Mohammedans who regard Ali as the first rightful Imam or Caliph (rejecting the three Sunni Caliphs), and do not consider the Sunna, or oral law of any authority, but look upon it as apocryphal. They wear red turbans, and are sometimes called "Red Heads." Cp. SUNNITES.

Shillelagh (Ir.). A cudgel of oak or blackthorn; so called from a village of this name in County Wicklow.

Shilling (A.S. scilling, which is connected either with O.Teut. skel-, to resound or ring, or skil-, to divide). The coin was originally made with a deeply indented cross, and could easily be divided into halves or quarters.

Shilling shocker. See PENNY DREADFUL.

To be cut off with a shilling. See CUT.

To take the Queen's (or King's) shilling. To enlist; in allusion to the former practice of giving each recruit a shilling when he was sworn in.

Shilly Shally. To hesitate, act in an undecided, irresolute way; a corruption of "Will I, shall I," or "Shall I, shall I?"

There's no delay, they ne'er stand shall I, shall I,
Hermogenes with Dakhia doth dally.

Taylor's Works, iii, 3 (1630).

Shindig (shin' dig). A slang term for a dance, a noisy celebration party, etc.

Shindy. A row, a disturbance. To kick up a shindy, to make a row. The word is probably connected with shinty or shinny, a primitive kind of hockey played in the north.

Shine. To take the shine out of one. To humiliate him, "take him down a peg or two"; to outshine him.

Shiner. A black eye.

Shin Plaster. An old American and also Australian phrase still occasionally used for paper tokens issued by rural stores as small change. It is said that some storekeepers baked them to make them brittle so that they would powder to nothing in the recipient's pocket.

Shintoism, the national religion of Japan. Worship takes the form of offerings and prayers for temporal blessings, litanies read by priests, reverence for ancestors and an unquestioning loyalty to the State. The chief of numerous deities is Ameratsu, the sun goddess from whom the emperors claim descent.

Ship. In the printing-house the body of compositors engaged for the time being on one definite piece of work is known as a ship; this is said to be short for companionship, but it is worth noting that many printing-house terms (cp. CHAPEL, FRIAR, MONK) have an ecclesiastical origin, and ship was an old name for the nave of a church.

Losing a ship for a ha'porth o' tar. Suffering a great loss out of stinginess. By mean savings, or from want of some necessary outlay, to lose the entire article. For example, to save the expense of a nail and lose the horseshoe as the first result, then to lame the horse, and finally perhaps kill it.

Ship-money. A tax formerly levied in time of war on ports and seaboard counties for the maintenance of the Navy. It was through Charles I levying this tax in 1634-7 without the consent of Parliament, and extending it to the inland counties illegally, that the Puritan party, led by Hampden, refused to pay and thus began the struggle which culminated in the Civil War.

Shipshape. As methodically arranged as things in a ship; in good order. When a vessel is sent out temporarily rigged, it is termed "jury-rigged," and when the jury rigging has been duly changed for ship rigging, the vessel is "shipshape," i.e. in due or regular order.

Ship's husband. The agent on land who represents the owners and attends to the repairs, provisioning and other necessities and expenses of the ship.

Ships of the line. Men-of-war large enough to have a place in a line of battle.

The ship of the desert. The camel.

To take shipping. To set out on a voyage, to embark on board ship.

When my ship comes home. When my fortune is made. The allusion is to the argosies returning from foreign parts laden with rich freights, and so enriching the merchants who sent them forth.

Shipton, Mother. This so-called prophetess is first heard of in a tract of 1641, in which she is said to have lived in the reign of Henry VIII, and to have foretold the death of Wolsey, Cromwell, Lord Percy, etc. In 1677 the pamphleteering publisher, Richard Head, brought out a Life and Death of Mother Shipton, and in 1862 Charles Hindley brought out a new edition in which she was credited with having predicted steam-engines, the telegraph, and other modern inventions, as well as the end of the world in 1881.

Shire. When the Saxon kings created an earl, they gave him a shire (A.S. scir) or division of land to govern. Scir meant originally employment or government, and is connected with scirian, to appoint, allot. At the Norman Conquest count superseded the title earl, and the shire or earldom was called a county. Even to the present hour we call the wife of an earl a countess.

Knight of the Shire. See KNIGHT.

The shires. The English counties whose names terminate in -shire; but, in a narrower sense, the Midland counties noted for fox-hunting, especially Leicestershire, Northamptonshire, and Rutland.

Shire horse. The old breed of large, heavily built English cart-horse, originally raised in the Midland shires. The term is applied to any draught horse of a certain character which can show a registered pedigree. The sire and dam, with a minute description of the horse itself, its age, marks and so on, must be shown in order to prove the claim of a "shire horse."

Clydesdale horses are Scotch draught horses, not equal to shire horses in size, but of great endurance.

Shirt. A boiled shirt. An Americanism for a stiff white shirt, as opposed to an unstarched coloured one.

Close sits my shirt, but closer my skin. My property is dear to me, but dearer my life; my belongings sit close to my heart, but Ego proximus mihi.

Not a shirt to one's name. Nothing at all; penniless and propertyless.

The shirt of Nessus. See NESSUS.

To get one's shirt out. To lose one's temper, to get in a rage. A variant is to get one's rag out.

Shirty. Bad-tempered; very cross and offended; in the state one is when somebody has "got your shirt out."

To give the shirt off one's back. All one has.

To put one's shirt on a horse. To back it with all the money one possesses.

Shirts as party emblems. The custom of wearing coloured shirts as a political gesture originated in the Garibaldi Italian campaign of 1848-49. While in S. America, fighting for the Uruguayan Republic, Garibaldi and his men were issued with red shirts bought as a job lot by the government from a mercantile house in Montevideo. On their arrival in Europe the Italian patriots accompanying Garibaldi still wore these shirts, which became an emblem of hope and patriotism that reached its culmination when Garibaldi led his red-shirted Thousand to the conquest of Sicily and South Italy in 1860. Mussolini adopted the Black Shirt as the emblem of Fascism in the 1920s; Hitler clothed his henchmen in Brown Shirts; other colours have been chosen by ardent though less eminent imitators.

Shiva. See SIVA.

Shivering Mountain. Mam Tor, a hill on the Peak of Derbyshire; so called from the waste of its mass by "shivering"—that is, breaking away in "shivers" or small pieces. This has been going on for ages, as the hill consists of alternate layers of shale and griststone. The former, being soft, is easily reduced to powder, and, as it crumbles small "shivers" of the griststone break away from want of support.

Shmoo (U.S.A.). A small being, the characteristics of which are that it can at will become whatever you wish. It was invented by Al Capp (inventor of Little Abner) in 1948 and became a craze in strip form, books, boy's balloons, and other representations. It also became a nation-wide cause of dissension, some seeing behind the idea a subtle political attack on the Capitalist system.

Shoat (U.S.A.). A half-grown pig, hence an uncomplimentary term for a person of no account.

Shoddy. Worthless stuff masquerading as something that is really good; from the cheap cloth called shoddy which is made up out of cloth from old garments torn to pieces and shredded, mixed with new wool.

Shoddy characters. Persons of tarnished reputation, like cloth made of shoddy or refuse wool.

Shoe. It was at one time thought unlucky to put on the left shoe before the right, or to put either shoe on the wrong foot. It is said that Augustus Cæsar was nearly assassinated by a mutiny one day when he put on his left shoe first.

One of the sayings of Pythagoras was: "When stretching forth your feet to have your sandals put on, first extend your right foot, but when about to step into a bath, let your left foot enter first." Iamblichus says the hidden meaning is that worthy actions should be done heartily, but base ones should be avoided (Protreptics, symbol xii).

It has long been a custom to throw an old shoe, or several shoes, at the bride and bridegroom when they quit the bride's home, after the wedding breakfast, or when they go to church to get married.

Now, for good luck caste an old shoe after me.—HAYWOOD (1693-1756).

Ay, with all my heart, there's an old shoe after you.—The Parson's Wedding (Dodsley, vol. ix, p. 499).

In Anglo-Saxon marriages the father delivered the bride's shoe to the bridegroom, who touched her with it on the head to show his authority; and it is said that in Turkey the bridegroom is chased by the guests, who either administer blows by way of adieux, or pelt him with slippers.

Some think this shoe-throwing represents an assault and refers to the notion that the bridegroom carried off the bride with force and violence. Others look upon it as a relic of the ancient law of exchange, implying that the parents of the bride give up henceforth all right of dominion to their daughter. Luther told the bridegroom at a wedding that he had placed the husband's shoe on the head of the bed so that he should take to himself the mastery and governing of his wife.

Loosing the shoe (cp. Josh. v, 15) is a mark of respect in the East to the present hour. The Mussulman leaves his slippers at the door of the mosque, and when making a visit of ceremony to a European visitor, at the tent entrance.

In Deut. xxv, 5-10 we read that the widow refused by the surviving brother, asserted her independence by "loosing his shoe"; and in the story of Ruth we are told "that it was the custom" in exchange to deliver a shoe in token of renunciation. When Boaz, therefore, became possessed of his lot, the kinsman's kinsman indicated his assent by giving Boaz his shoe. "A man without sandals" was a proverbial expression among the Jews for a prodigal, from the custom of giving one's sandals in confirmation of a bargain.

Another man's shoes. "To stand in another man's shoes" is to occupy the place of another. Among the ancient Northmen, when a man adopted a son, the person adopted put on the shoes of the adopter.

In Reynard the Fox (q.v.) Reynard, having turned the tables on Sir Bruin the Bear, asked the queen to let him have the shoes of the disgraced minister; so Bruin's shoes were torn off and put upon the new favourite.

Another pair of shoes. A different thing altogether; quite another matter.

A shoe too large trips one up. A Latin proverb, Calceus major subvertit. An empire too large falls to pieces; a business too large comes to grief; an ambition too large fails altogether.

No one knows where the shoe pinches like the wearer. This was said by a Roman sage who was blamed for divorcing his wife, with whom he seemed to live happily.

For, God it wot, he sat ful still and song.

When that his scho ful bitterly him wrong.

CHAUCER: Canterbury Tales, 6,074.

The fons et origo of some trouble is called "the place where the shoe pinches."

Over Edom will I cast my shoe (Ps. lx, 8; cviii, 9). Will I march and triumph.

Over shoes, over boots. In for a penny, in for a pound.

Where true courage roots,

The proverb says, "once over shoes, o'er boots"

Taylor's Works, ii, 145 (1690).

To die in one's shoes. To die a violent death, especially one on the scaffold.

And there is M'Fuze, and Lieutenant Tregooze,

And there is Sir Carnaby Jenks, of the Blues

All come to see a man die in his shoes

Ingoldsby Legends: The Execution.

To shake in one's shoes. To be in a state of nervous terror.

To shoe a goose. To engage in a silly and fruitless task.

To shoe the anchor. To cover the flukes of an anchor with a broad triangular piece of plank, in order that the anchor may have a stronger hold in soft ground.

To shoe the cobbler. To give a quick peculiar movement with the front foot in sliding.

To shoe the wild colt. To exact a fine called "footing" from a newcomer, who is called the "colt." Colt is a common synonym for a greenhorn, or a youth not broken in. Thus Shakespeare says—"Ay, that's a colt indeed, for he doth nothing but talk of his horse" (Merchant of Venice, i, 2.).

Waiting for dead men's shoes. Looking out for legacies; looking to stand in the place of some moneyed man when he is dead and buried.

Whose shoes I am not worthy to bear (Matt. iii, 11). This means, "I am not worthy to be his humblest slave." It was the business of a slave recently purchased to loose and carry his master's sandals. When the Emperor Wladimir proposed marriage to the daughter of Reginald, she rejected him, saying, "I will not take off my shoe to the son of a slave."

Shoemakers. The patron saints of shoemakers are St. Crispin and his brother Crispian, who supported themselves by making shoes while they preached to the people of Gaul and Britain. In compliment to these saints the trade of shoemaking is called "the gentle craft."

Shofar (shō' far). A Hebrew trumpet still used in the modern synagogue. It is made of the horn of a ram or any ceremonially clean animal, and produces only the natural series of harmonics from its fundamental note.

Shogun (shō' gūn). The title of the actual ruler of Japan from the 12th century to the modernization of the country in 1868. The Shoguns were hereditary commanders-in-chief (the word means "army leader"), and took the place of the Mikados, whom they kept in a state of perpetual imprisonment. Also called the Tycoon (q.v.).

Shoot. See also SHOT.

Shooting-iron. Slang (originally American) for a firearm, especially a revolver.

Shooting stars. Incandescent meteors shooting across the sky, formerly, like comets, fabled to presage disaster—

A little ere the mightiest Julius fell,

The graves stood tenantless, and the sheeted dead

Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets:

As stars with trains of fire and dews of blood,

Disasters in the sun. Hamlet, i, 1.

They were called in ancient legends the "fiery tears of St. Lawrence," because one of the periodic swarms of these meteors is between August 9th and 14th, about the time of St. Lawrence's festival, which is on the 10th. Other periods are from November 12th to 14th, and from December 6th to 12th.

Shooting stars are said by the Arabs to be firebrands hurled by the angels against the inquisitive genii, who are for ever clambering up on the constellations to peep into heaven.

To go the whole shoot. To do all there is to do, go the whole hog, run through the gamut.

To shoot a line. To boast.

To shoot one's linen. To display an unnecessary amount of shirt-cuff; to show off.

To shoot the moon. To remove one's household goods by night to avoid distraint; to "do a moonlight flit."

To shoot the sun. A sailor's expression for taking the sun's meridional altitude, which is done by aiming at the reflected sun through the telescope of the sextant.

Shoot! Go ahead; say what you have to say. Let's have it! In motion pictures it is the word used in the studios for the cameras to begin turning when all is ready.

Shop. The Shop. In military slang, is the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich; on the Stock Exchange it is the South African gold market.

All over the shop. Scattered in every direction, all over the place; or pursuing an erratic course.

To shop a person. To put him in prison, or to inform against him so that he is arrested; similarly, a billiard player will speak of "shopping the white," i.e. putting his opponent's ball down in the pocket.

To shut up shop. To retire from business, withdraw from participation in the undertaking, etc.

To talk shop. To talk about one's affairs or business; to draw allusions from one's business, as when Ollapod, the apothecary in Colman's Poor Gentleman, talks of a uniform with rhubarb-coloured facings.

You've come to the wrong shop. I can't help you, I can't give you the information, and so on, you require.

Shopkeepers. A nation of shopkeepers. This phrase, applied to Englishmen by Napoleon in contempt, comes from Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations (iv, 7), a book well known to the Emperor. He says—

To found a great empire for the sole purpose of raising up a people of customers, may at first sight appear a project fit only for a nation of shopkeepers.

Ten years earlier, in 1766, J. Tucker had written in the third of his Four Tracts:—

A Shop-keeper will never get the more Custom by beating his Customers; and what is true of a Shop-keeper, is true of a Shop-keeping Nation.

Shoreditch. according to tradition, is so called from Jane Shore, the mistress of Edward IV, who, it is said, died there in a ditch. This tale comes from a ballad in Pepys' collection—

I could not get one bit of bread
Whereby my hunger might be fed. . .
So, weary of my life, at length
I yielded up my vital strength
Within a ditch . . . which since that day
Is Shoreditch called, as writers say—

But the truth is, it appears in the Index to Kemble's Codex Diplomaticus as Sordic, in the 14th century as Soerditch, and Stow says that in the 12th century it was called Soersditch. It is probable that it is from a former Anglo-Saxon proprietor, Soer.

Jane Shore is supposed to have died about 1527, but the date and place are alike unknown.

The Duke of Shoreditch. The most successful of the London archers received this playful title.

Good king, make not good Lord of Lincoln Duke of Shoreditch!—The Poore Man's Petition to the King (1603).

Shorne, John. A rector of North Marston, Buckinghamshire, at the close of the 13th century. He is said to have blessed a well, which became the resort of multitudes and brought in a yearly revenue of some £500, and to have conjured the devil into a boot. After his death he was prayed to by sufferers from ague.

Maister John Shorne, that blessed man borne,

For the ague to him we apply,

Which jugglenth with a bote; I beschrewe his herte rote
That will trust him, and it be I.

Fantassie of Idolatrie.

Short. A drop of something short. A tot of whisky, gin, or other spirit, as opposed to a glass of beer.

Cut it short! Don't be so prolix, come to the point; "cut the cackle and come to the 'osses." Said to a speaker who goes round and round his subject.

My name is Short. I'm in a hurry and cannot wait.

Well, but let us hear the wishes (said the old man); my name is short, and I cannot stay much longer.—W. YEATS: Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 240.

Short commons. See COMMONS.

Short thigh. See CURTHOSE.

The short cut is often the longest way round. It does not always pay to avoid taking a little trouble; e.g. there is no short cut to knowledge. Bacon has the same idea—

It is in life, as it is in ways, the shortest way is commonly the foulest, and surely the faire way is not much about.—Advancement of Learning, 66, ii.

To break off short. Abruptly, without warning, but completely.

To sell short. A Stock Exchange phrase meaning to sell stock that one does not at the moment possess on the chance that before the date of delivery the price will have fallen; the same as "selling for a fall," or "selling a bear."

To make short work of it. To dispose of it quickly, to deal summarily with it.

To win by a short head. Only just to out-distance one's competitors, to win with practically nothing to spare. The phrase is from horse-racing.

Shorter Catechism. The name given to a confession of faith which sets forth the Presbyterian doctrines of the Church of Scotland. Drawn up in 1647 it was called the "shorter" to distinguish it from the larger catechism which was too complicated and difficult for ordinary instruction.

Shorthand. The earliest shorthand was invented in Rome by M. Tullius Tiro (63 B.C.) who used it to take down Cicero's speeches. Various systems were in use during the Middle Ages, but in The Arte of Stenographie, 1602, John Willis devised a system based on sound rather than on spelling. This was improved on by Thomas Shelton (1630) in a system later employed by Samuel Pepys in setting down his diary. In 1786 Samuel Taylor published an essay attempting to set up a standard phonetic system which was, in 1840, improved and modified by Isaac Pitman. This is one of the two systems now in general use, the other being devised (1888) on a monoslope basis by John Robert Gregg. Gregg's shorthand is in general use in U.S.A. whereas Pitman's is the more popular in Great Britain.

Shot. A fool's bolt is soon shot. See BOLT.

Big shot. An important person. 20th-century development of the 19th-century "great gun" or "big bug."

Down with your shot. Your reckoning or quota, your money. See SCOT.

As the fund of our pleasure, let us each pay his shot.
BEN JONSON.

He shot wide of the mark. He was altogether in error. The allusion is to shooting at the mark or bull's-eye of a target.

I haven't a shot in the locker. Not a penny to bless myself with; my last resources are used up. A phrase from the days of the old men-of-war, when the ammunition was kept in lockers.

Like a shot. With great rapidity; or, without hesitation, most willingly.

Shotten Herring. A lean, spiritless creature, a Jack-o'-Lent, like a herring that has shot, or ejected, its spawn. Herrings gutted and dried are so called also.

Though they like shotten-herrings are to see,
Yet such tall souldiers of their teeth they be,
That two of them, like greedy cormorants,
Devour more then six honest Protestants.
Taylor's Workes, iii, 5.

Shoulder. Showing the cold shoulder. Receiving without cordiality someone who was once on better terms with you. See COLD.

Straight from the shoulder. With full force. A boxing term.

The government shall be upon his shoulder (Is. ix, 6). The allusion is to the key slung on the shoulder of Jewish stewards on public occasions, and as a key is emblematic of government and power, the metaphor is very striking.

Soft shoulders. A warning sign on roads in the U.S.A., drawing driver's attention to the fact that the clay edges of the road outside the macadam are unsafe.

Shouting, All over but the. Success is so certain that only the applause is lacking. The phrase perhaps originated in a hotly contested election.

Shovel Board. A game in which three counters, or coins, were shoved or slid over a smooth board, very popular in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The "two Edward shovel-boards" mentioned by Slender in the Merry Wives of Windsor (i, 1), were the broad shillings of Edward VI used in playing the game.

Show. Australian, a gold mine. "Give him a show," give him a chance, i.e. originally let him stake out his own claim.

Shrapnel. A type of shell containing a number of bullets which are released and travel forwards with a high velocity when the shell is shattered by the bursting charge. It was invented in 1784 by Col. Henry Shrapnel (1761-1842) and was adopted in 1803 by the British army. In World War II this type of projectile was not used, but the term was loosely applied to all high-explosive fragments.

Shrew-mouse. A small insectivorous mammal, resembling a mouse, formerly supposed to have the power of poisoning cattle and young children by running over them. To provide a remedy our forefathers used to plug the creature into a hole made in an ash-tree; then any branch from it would cure the mischief done.

Shrift. The shriving of a person; i.e. his confession to a priest, and the penance and absolution arising therefrom.

To give short shrift to. To make short work of. Short shrift was the few minutes in which a criminal about to be executed was allowed to make his confession.

Shrimp. A child, a puny little fellow, in the same ratio to a man as a shrimp to a lobster. Fry, and small fry, are also used for children. It cannot be this weak and writhled shrimp
Would strike such terror to his enemies,
1 Henry VI, ii, 3.

Shrivatsa. See VISHNU.

Shroff. An Oriental term, in India applied to a money-changer or banker, in China to an expert who tests gold and silver coins for their genuineness.

Shropshire. The "shire of shrubs." The Anglo-Saxon name of Shrewsbury was scrobbes byrg, the burgh among the shrubs. The Normans could not pronounce sc-; so the A.S. name became Salopesbury, and for the name of the county the -bury (= town) was dropped, giving Salop, a name still used as an alternative for Shropshire; whence Salopian, a native of the county.

Shrovetide. The three days just before the opening of Lent, when people went to confession and afterwards indulged in all sorts of sports and merry-making.

Shrove Tuesday. The day before Ash Wednesday; "Pancake day." It used to be the great "Derby Day" of cock-fighting in England.

Or martyr beat, like Shrovetide cocks, with bats.
PETER PINDAR: Subjects for Painters.

Shun-pike (U.S.A.). A side-road is so called because it is used to avoid the pike, or turn-pike, where toll had to be paid.

Shut Up. Hold your tongue. Shut up your mouth.

Shy. To have a shy at anything. To fling at it, to try and shoot it.

Shylock. A (sh' lok). A grasping, stony-hearted moneylender; in allusion to the Jew in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice.

A stony adversary, an inhuman rutch
Uncapable of pity, void and empty
From any dram of mercy.
iv, 1.

Shyster. A mean, tricky sort of person; originally American slang for a low-class lawyer hanging about the courts on the off-chance of exploiting petty criminals.

Si (sè), the seventh note in music, was not introduced till the 17th century. Guido d'Arezzo's original scale consisted of only six notes. See ARETTIAN SYLLABLES.

Si Quis (si kwis) (Lat., if anyone). A notice to all whom it may concern, given in the parish church before ordination, that a resident means to offer himself as a candidate for holy orders; and if anyone knows any just cause or impediment thereto, he is to declare the same to the bishop.

Siamese Twins (si' a mēz). Yoke-fellows, inseparable; so called from the original pair, Eng and Chang, who were born of Chinese parents about 1814 and discovered at Mekong, Siam, in 1829, and were subsequently exhibited as freaks. Their bodies were united by a band of flesh, stretching from breast-bone to breast-bone. They married two sisters, had offspring, and died within three hours of each other on January 17th, 1874.

Other so-called Siamese twins were Barnum's "Orissa twins," born at Orissa, Bengal, and joined by a band of cartilage at the waist only; "Millie-Christine," two joined South Carolina negroes who appeared all over the world as the "Two-headed Nightingale"; and Josepha and Roza Blazek, natives of Bohemia, who were joined by a cartilaginous ligament above the waist. They died practically simultaneously in Chicago (1922), Josepha leaving a son aged 12.

Sibyl (sib' il). A prophetess of classical legend, who was supposed to prophesy under the inspiration of a deity; the name is now applied to any prophetess or woman fortune-teller. There were a number of sibyls, and they had their seats in widely separate parts of the world—Greece, Italy, Babylonia, Egypt, etc.

Plato mentions only one, viz., the Erythraean—identified with Amalthea, the Cumæan Sibyl, who was consulted by Æneas before his descent into Hades and who sold the Sibylline books (q.v.) to Tarquin; Martian Capella speaks of two, the Erythraean and the Phrygian; Ælian of four, the Erythraean, Samian, Egyptian, and Sardian; Varro tells us there were ten, viz. the Cumæan, the Delphic, Egyptian, Erythraean, Hellespontine, Libyan, Persian, Phrygian, Samian and Tiburtine.

How know we but that she may be an eleventh Sibyl or a second Cassandra?—RABELAIS: Gargantua and Pantagruel, iii, 16.

The mediæval monks "adopted" the sibyls—as they did so much of pagan myth; they made them twelve, and gave to each a separate prophecy and distinct emblem:—

(1) The Libyan: "The day shall come when men shall see the King of all living things." Emblem, a lighted taper.

(2) The Samian: "The Rich One shall be born of a pure virgin." Emblem, a rose.

(3) The Cuman: "Jesus Christ shall come from heaven, and live and reign in poverty on earth." Emblem, a crown.

(4) The Cumæan: "God shall be born of a pure virgin, and hold converse with sinners." Emblem, a cradle.

(5) The Erythraean: "Jesus Christ, Son of God, the Saviour." Emblem, a horn.

(6) The Persian: "Satan shall be overcome by a true prophet." Emblem, a dragon under the sibyl's feet, and a lantern.

(7) The Tiburtine: "The Highest shall descend from heaven, and a virgin be shown in the valleys of the deserts." Emblem, a dove.

(8) The Delphic: "The Prophet born of the virgin shall be crowned with thorns." Emblem, a crown of thorns.

(9) The Phrygian: "Our Lord shall rise again." Emblem, a banner and a cross.

(10) The European: "A virgin and her Son shall flee into Egypt." Emblem, a sword.

(11) The Agrippian: "Jesus Christ shall be outraged and scourged." Emblem, a whip.

(12) The Hellespontic: "Jesus Christ shall suffer shame upon the cross." Emblem, a T cross.

Sibylline Books, The. A collection of oracles of mysterious origin, preserved in ancient Rome, and consulted by the Senate in times of emergency or disaster. According to Livy there were originally nine: these were offered in sale by Amalthea, the Sibyl of Cumæ, in Æolia, to Tarquin, the offer was rejected, and she burnt three of them. After twelve months she offered the remaining six at the same price. Again being refused, she burnt three more, and after a similar interval asked the same price for the three left. The sum demanded was now given, and Amalthea never appeared again.

The three books were preserved in a stone chest underground in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and committed to the charge of custodians chosen in the same manner as the high priests. The number of custodians was at first two, then ten, and ultimately fifteen. Augustus had some 2,000 of the verses destroyed as spurious, and placed the rest in two gilt cases, under the base of the statue of Apollo, in the temple on the Palatine Hill; but the whole perished when the city was burnt in the reign of Nero.

A Greek collection in eight books of poetical utterances relating to Jesus Christ, compiled in the 2nd century, is entitled Oracula Sibyllina, or the Sibylline Books.

Sic (sik) (Lat., thus, so). A word used by reviewers, quoters, etc., after a doubtful word or phrase, or a misspelling, to indicate that it is here printed exactly as in the original and to call attention to the fact that it is wrong in some way.

Sicilies, The Two. The old name for the Spanish and Bourbon kingdom of Naples, united to the kingdom of Italy in 1860. It consisted of the island of Sicily, and, on the mainland of the peninsula, the provinces of AbruZZi and Molise, Apulia, Campania, Basilicata, and Calabria. The origin of this ambiguous name is not now known.

Sicilian Vespers. The massacre of the French in Sicily, which began at the hour of vespers on Easter Monday in 1282. The term is used proverbially of any treacherous and bloody attack.

Sick Man, The. So Nicholas of Russia (in 1844) called the Ottoman Empire, which had been declining ever since 1586.

I repeat to you that the sick man is dying; and we must never allow such an event to take us by surprise. —Annual Register, 1853.

Don John, Governor-General of the Netherlands, writing in 1579 to Philip II of Spain, calls the Prince of Orange the sick man, because he was in the way, and he wanted him "finished."

"Money" (he says in his letter) "is the gruel with which we must cure this sick man [for spies and assassins are expensive drugs]"—MOTLEY: Dutch Republic, Bk. v, 2.

Side. On the side of the angels. The famous phrase with which Disraeli thought he had settled the questions raised by Darwin's theory of the origin of species. It occurred in his speech at the Oxford Diocesan Conference in 1864—

The question is this: Is man an ape or an angel? I, my lord, am on the side of the angels.

It was the same statesman who said in the House of Commons (May 14th, 1866), "Ignorance never settles a question."

Putting on side. Giving oneself airs; being bumptious. To put on side in billiards is to give your ball a twist or spin with the cue as you strike it.

To side-track. Originally an American railroad term; hence, to get rid of, shelve, put on one side indefinitely.

Sideburns (U.S.A.). Short side-whiskers worn with a smooth chin. Originally called Burnside's from the Federal general A. E. Burnside (1824-1881) who wore such whiskers and whose face was familiar to many Americans.

Sidney, Sir Philip (1554-86), often taken as the type of the magnanimous and perfect soldier and statesman—the Happy Warrior. After he had received his death wound at the battle of Zutphen a soldier brought him some water, but as he was about to drink he observed a wounded man eye the draught with longing looks. Sir Philip gave up the water to him, saying, "Poor fellow, thy necessity is greater than mine." Spenser laments him in his Astrophel (q.v.), and largely modelled the Prince Arthur of the Faerie Queene on him.

Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother. Mary Herbert (née Sidney), Countess of Pembroke, poetess, etc. (died 1621). The line is from her Epitaph, which has been claimed both for Ben Jonson and for William Browne.

Sidney Sussex College. Cambridge, founded by Lady Frances Sidney, Countess of Sussex, in 1598.

Sidrac (sid' rāk). An old French romance which tells how Sidrac converted to Christianity Boccus, an idolatrous king and magician of India. Sidrac lived only 847 years after Noah, and became possessed of Noah's wonderful book on astronomy and the natural sciences. This passed through various hands, including those of a pious Chaldean, and Naaman the Syrian, until, as legend relates, Roger of Palermo translated it at Toledo into Spanish. The work is more a romance of Arabian philosophy than of chivalry. In Henry VI's reign an English metrical version was made by Hugh Campeden, and this was printed in 1510 as The Historie of King Boccus and Sydracke.

Siege Perilous. In the cycle of Arthurian romances a seat at the Round Table which was kept vacant for him who should accomplish the quest of the Holy Grail. For any less a person to sit in it was fatal. As the crown of his achievement Sir Galahad took his seat in the Siege Perilous.

Siegfried (sēg' frēd). Hero of the first part of the Nibelungenlied. He was the youngest son of Siegmund and Sieglind, king and queen of the Netherlands. He married Kriemhild, Princess of Burgundy, and sister of Gunther. Gunther craved his assistance in carrying off Brunhild from Issland, and Siegfried succeeded by taking away her talisman by main force. This excited the jealousy of Gunther, who induced Hagen, the Dane, to murder Siegfried. Hagen struck him with a spear in the only vulnerable part (between the shoulder-blades), while he stooped to quench his thirst at a fountain.

Siegfried's cloak of invisibility, called "tarnkappe" (tarnen, to conceal; kappe, a cloak). It not only made the wearer invisible, but also gave him the strength of twelve men.

Siegfried Line. The defences built by the Germans on their Western frontier before and after 1939 as a reply to France's Maginot Line. The British song, popular in 1939, entitled "We'll hang out the washing on the Siegfried Line" was held in derision after Dunkirk in 1940, but when the Canadian troops penetrated the Line in 1945 they hung up a number of sheets and erected a large notice bearing the simple words "The Washing."

Sierra (sē ēr' ā) (Span., a saw). A mountain whose top is indented like a saw; a range of mountains whose tops form a saw-like appearance; a line of craggy rocks; as Sierra Morena (where many of the incidents in Don Quixote are laid), Sierra Nevada (the snowy range) Sierra Leone (in West Africa, where lions abound), etc.

Siesta (sē es' tā). Spanish for "the sixth hour"—i.e. noon (Lat. sexta hora). It is applied to the short sleep taken in Spain during the midday heat.

Sieve and Shears. The oracle of sieve and shears. This method of divination is mentioned by Theocritus. The modus operandi was as follows:—The points of the shears were stuck in the rim of a sieve, and two persons supported them with their finger-tips. Then a verse of the Bible was read aloud, and St. Peter and St. Paul were asked if it was A, B, or C (naming the persons suspected). When the right person was named, the sieve would suddenly turn round.

Searching for things lost with a sieve and shears.—BEN JONSON: Alchemist, i, 1.

Sight, for "multitude," though now regarded as a colloquialism or as slang, is good old English, and was formerly in literary use, the earlier significance being "a show or display of something." Thus, Juliana Berners, lady prioress in the 15th century of Sopwell nunnery, speaks of a bombynable syght of monkes (a large number of friars); and in one of the Paston Letters (May 25th, 1449) we read—ye sawe never suche a syght of schyppys take in to Englond thys c. [hundred] wynter.

A sight for sore eyes. Something that it is very pleasurable to see or witness, especially something unexpected.

Second sight. See SECOND.

Though lost to sight, to memory dear. This occurs in a song by Geo. Linley (c. 1835), but it is found as an "axiom" in the Monthly Magazine, Jan., 1827, and is probably of much earlier date. Horace F. Cutter (pseudonym Ruthven Jenkyns) uses the expression in the Greenwich Magazine for Mariners, 1707, but this date is fictitious.

To do a thing on sight. At once, without any hesitation.

Sign. Royal Sign Manual. A stamp reproducing the royal signature, used when the sovereign is too ill to sign documents.

To sign off. In the 19th century this denoted leaving one religious denomination in a formal manner for another. In the 20th century it was for long used in radio as synonymous with the termination of a performance by a regular broadcaster known to the public, hence

Signature tune. A musical theme played regularly as a means of identification when introducing a well-known artist, dance band, etc.

Significavit (sig ni fi cā' vit). A writ of Chancery given by the ordinary to keep an excommunicate in prison till he submitted to the authority of the Church. The writ, which is now obsolete, used to begin with Significavit nobis venerabilis pater, etc. Chaucer says of his Sompnour—

And also ware him of a significavit.
Canterbury Tales (Prologue), 664.

Sigurd (sig' ērd). The Siegfried (q.v.) of the Volsunga Saga, the Scandinavian version of the Nibelungenlied (q.v.). He falls in love with Brynhild, but, under the influence of a love-potion, marries Gudrun, a union which brings about a volume of mischief.

Sikes, Bill. The type of a ruffianly house-breaker, from the fellow of that name in Dickens's Oliver Twist. The only rudiment of a redeeming feature he possessed was a kind of affection for his dog.

Sikh (sik) (Hindu sikh, disciple). The Sikhs were originally a monotheistic body founded in the Punjab by Nanak (1469-1539). They soon became a military community, and in 1764 formally assumed national independence. In 1809 their ruler, Rangit Singh made a treaty with Britain, but the anarchy following upon his death led to the Sikh Wars of 1845-46 and 1848-49. During the Mutiny they remained loyal to Britain.

Silbury, near Marlborough. A prehistoric artificial mound, 130 feet high, and covering seven acres of ground, said to be the largest in Europe, and to have been erected by the Celts about 1600 B.C. Some say it is where "King Sel" was buried; others, that it is a corruption of Solis-bury (mound of the sun); others, that it is Sel-barrow (great tumulus), in honour of some ancient prince of Britain.

Silence. Silence gives consent. A saying (common to many languages) founded on the old Latin law maxim—Qui tacet consentire videtur (who is silent is held to consent).

But that you shall not say I yield, being silent,
I would not speak. Cymbeline, ii, 3.

Silence is golden. See under SPEECH.

The rest is silence. The last words of the dying Hamlet (Hamlet, v, 2).

Towers of Silence. The small towers on which the Parsees and Zoroastrians place their dead to be consumed by birds of prey. The bones are picked clean in the course of a day, and are then thrown into a receptacle and covered with charcoal.

Parsees do not burn or bury their dead, because they consider a corpse impure, and they will not defile any of the elements. They carry it on a bier to the tower. At the entrance they look their last on the body, and the corpse-bearers carry it within the precincts and lay it down to be devoured by vultures which are constantly on the watch.

Two-minute Silence. A cessation of traffic and all other activities for two minutes at 11 a.m. on November 11th, to commemorate those who died in World War I. It was first observed in 1919 and discontinued in 1947 when the day was named Remembrance Day in memory of the fallen in both World Wars, and observed on the Sunday preceding November 11th.

Silent, The. William I, Prince of Orange (1533-84), so called because when (1559) Henri II of France, thinking that he would be a ready accomplice, revealed to him the plans for a general massacre of Protestants in the Netherlands—the Prince, although horror-struck and indignant at the royal revelations, held his peace, and kept his countenance . . . without revealing to the monarch, by word or look, the enormous blunder which he had committed.—MOTLEY: Dutch Republic, II, 1.

Silenus (sil' ē' nūs). The drunken companion and nurse of Dionysus (Bacchus) in Greek mythology; fond of music, and a prophet, but incurably lazy, wanton, and given to debauch. He is described as a jovial old man, with bald head, pug nose, and face like Bardolph's.

Within his car, aloft, young Bacchus stood,
Trifling his ivy-dart, in dancing mood,

With sidelong laughing; . . .

And near him rode Silenus on his ass,
Pelted with flowers as he on did pass

Tipsily quaffing. KEATS: Endymion, iv, 209.

Silhouette (sil oo et'). A black profile, so called from Etienne de Silhouette (1709-67), Contrôleur des Finances, 1759, who made great savings in the public expenditure of France. Some say the black portraits were named after him in allusion to the sacrifices he demanded from the nobles—silhouette being the popular term for a figure reduced to its simplest form; others assert that he devised this way of taking likenesses to save expense.

Silk. To take silk. Said of a barrister who has been appointed a Queen's Counsel (Q.C.), because he then exchanges his stuff gown for a silk one.

You cannot make a silk purse of a sow's ear. You cannot make something good of what is by its nature bad or inferior in quality. "You cannot make a horn of a pig's tail."

Silly is the German selig (blessed) and used to mean in English "happy through being innocent"; whence the infant Jesus was termed "the harmless silly babe," and sheep were called "silly." As the "innocent" are easily taken by or worldly cunning, the word came to signify "gullible," "foolish."

Silly-how. An old name—still used in Scotland—for a child's caul. It is a rough translation of the German term glückshaube, lucky cap. The caul has always been supposed to bring luck to its original possessor.

The silly season. An obsolescent journalistic expression for the part of the year when Parliament and the Law Courts are not sitting (about August and September), when, through lack of news, the papers had to fill their columns with trivial items—such as news of giant gooseberries and sea serpents—and long correspondence on subjects of evanescent (if any) interest.

Silurian. Of or pertaining to the ancient Silures or the district they inhabited, viz. Hereford, Monmouth, Radnor, Brecon, and Glamorgan. The "sparkling wines of the Silurian vats" are cider and perry.

From Silurian vats, high-sparking wines
Foam in transparent floods.

THOMSON: Autumn.

Silurian rocks. A name given by Sir R. Murchison to what miners call gray-wacke, and Werner termed transition rocks. Sir Roderick thus named them (1835) because it was in the region of the ancient Silures that he first investigated their structure.

Silurist, The. A surname adopted by the mystical poet Henry Vaughan (1621-95), who was born and died in Brecknockshire.

Silver. In England standard silver (i.e. that used for the coinage) formerly consisted of thirty-seven fortieths of fine silver and three fortieths of alloy (fineness, 925); but by an Act passed in 1920 the proportions, for reasons of economy, were changed to one half silver and one half alloy (fineness, 500). The Coinage Act of 1946 permitted copper-nickel coins, with no silver whatever, to replace the former silver coins.

Silver is not legal tender for sums over £2.

Silver articles are marked with five marks (see HALL MARK): the maker's private mark, the standard or assay mark, the hall mark, the duty mark, and the date mark. The standard mark states the proportion of silver, to which figure is added a lion passant for England, a harp crowned for Ireland, a thistle for Edinburgh, and a lion rampant for Glasgow.

Among the ancient alchemists silver represented the Moon, or Diana; in heraldry it is known by its French name, Argent (which also gives its chemical symbol, "Ag."), and is indicated in engravings by the silver (argent) portion being left blank.

A silver lining. The prospect of better days, the promise of happier times. The saying, Every cloud has a silver lining, is an old one; thus in Milton's Comus, the Lady lost in the wood resolves to hope on, and sees a "sable cloud turn forth its silver lining to the night."

Born with a silver spoon in one's mouth. See BORN.

Silver of Guthrum. See GUTHRUM.

Silver Star. A U.S.A. military medal awarded to an officer or man who has been cited for gallantry in action of a less conspicuous nature than would warrant a citation for the Medal of Honor or the Distinguished Service Cross. It consists of a bronze star bearing a small silver star in its centre.

Silver-tongued. An epithet bestowed on many persons famed for eloquence; especially William Bates, the Puritan divine (1625-99); Anthony Hammond, the poet (1668-1738); Henry Smith, preacher (1550-1600); and Joshua Sylvester (1563-1618), translator of Du Bartas.

Silver Wedding. The twenty-fifth anniversary, when presents of silver plate (in Germany a silver wreath) are given to the happy pair.

Speech is silver. See SPEECH.

The Silver Age. The second of the Ages of the World (q.v.), according to Hesiod and the Greek and Roman poets; fabled as a period that was voluptuous and godless, and much inferior in simplicity and true happiness to the Golden Age.

The silver cooper. A kidnapper. "To play the silver cooper," to kidnap. A cooper is one who coops up another.

The Silver-Fork School. A name given in amused contempt (about 1830) to the novelists who were sticklers for the etiquette and graces of the Upper Ten and showed great respect for the affectations of gentility, Theodore Hook, Lady Blessington, and Bulwer Lytton might be taken as representatives of it.

The Silver Streak. The English Channel.

Thirty pieces of silver. The sum of money that Judas Iscariot received from the chief priest for the betrayal of his Master (Matt. xxvi, 15); hence used proverbially of a bribe or "blood-money."

With silver weapons you may conquer the world. The Delphic oracle to Philip of Macedon, when he went to consult it. Philip, acting on this advice, sat down before a fortress which his staff pronounced to be impregnable. "You shall see," said the king, "how an ass laden with silver will find an entrance."

Simeon, St. (sim' ē ōn), is usually depicted as bearing in his arms the infant Jesus, or receiving Him in the Temple. His feast-day is February 18th.

St. Simeon Stylites. See STYLITES.

Similia similibus curantur (sim il' iä si mil' i būs kūr ān' ter) (Lat.). Like cures like; or, as we say, "Take a hair of the dog that bit you."

Simkin. Anglo-Indian for champagne—of which word it is an Urdu mispronunciation.

Simmel Cakes. Rich cakes formerly eaten (especially in Lancashire) on Mid-Lent Sunday ("Mothering Sunday"), Easter, and Christmas Day. They were ornamented with scallops, and were eaten at Mid-Lent in commemoration of the banquet given by Joseph to his brethren, which forms the first lesson of Mid-Lent Sunday, and the feeding of five thousand, which forms the Gospel of the day.

The word simnel is through O.Fr. from late Lat. simnellus, fine bread, Lat. simila, the finest wheat flour.

Simon, St. (Zelotes), is represented with a saw in his hand, in allusion to the instrument of his martyrdom. He sometimes bears fish in the other hand, in allusion to his occupation as a fishmonger. His feast day is October 28th.

Simon Magus. Isidore tells us that Simon Magus died in the reign of Nero, and adds that he had proposed a dispute with Peter and Paul, and had promised to fly up to heaven. He succeeded in rising high into the air, but at the prayers of the two apostles he was cast down to earth by the evil spirits who had enabled him to rise.

Milman, in his History of Christianity (ii, p. 51) tells another story. He says that Simon offered to be buried alive, and declared that he would reappear on the third day. He was actually buried in a deep trench, "but to this day," says Hippolytus, "his disciples have failed to witness his resurrection."

His followers were known as Simonians, and the sin of which he was guilty, viz. the trafficking in sacred things, the buying and selling of ecclesiastical offices (see Acts viii, 18) is still called simony.

Simon Pure. The real man, the authentic article, etc. In Mrs. Centlivre's Bold Stroke for a Wife, a Colonel Feignwell passes himself off for Simon Pure, a Quaker, and wins the heart of Miss Lovely. No sooner does he get the assent of her guardian, than the Quaker turns up, and proves, beyond a doubt, he is the "real Simon Pure."

Simple Simon. A simpleton, a gullible booby; from the character in the well-known anonymous nursery tale, who "met a pie-man."

Simple, The. Charles III of France. (879, 893-929).

The simple life. A mode of living in which the object is to eliminate as far as possible all luxuries and extraneous aids to happiness, etc., returning to the simplicity of life as imagined by the pastoral poets.

Simplicity is sine plica, without a fold; as duplicity is duplex plica, a double fold. Conduct "without a fold" is straightforward, simple.

The flat simplicity of that reply was admirable.—VANBRUGH: The Provoked Husband, i.

Disraeli spoke in the House of Commons (February 19th, 1850) of "The sweet simplicity of the Three per Cents," plagiarizing Lord Stowell, who had earlier spoken of their "elegant simplicity" (see Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors, vol. x).

Simplon Pass, over the Alps leads from Brieg in Canton Vaud to Domodossola in Piedmont at an altitude of 6,582 feet. The Simplon Road was begun by Napoleon in 1800 to shorten the advance into Italy. The railway tunnel through the mountain is one of the longest in the world, being over twelve miles long; it was opened in 1906, operations having been begun at either end and meeting midway beneath the mountain with only a few inches discrepancy. A second tunnel was opened in 1921.

Sin, according to Milton, is twin-keeper with Death of the gates of Hell. She sprang full-grown from the head of Satan.

... Woman to the waist, and fair,
But ending foul in many a scaly fold
Voluminous and vast, a serpent armed
With mortal sting. Paradise Lost, ii, 650-653.

Original sin. That corruption which is born with us, and is the inheritance of all the offspring of Adam. Theology teaches that as Adam was founder of his race, when Adam fell the taint and penalty of his disobedience passed to all his posterity.

Sin-eaters. Persons hired at funerals in ancient times, to eat beside the corpse and so take upon themselves the sins of the deceased, that the soul might be delivered from purgatory.

Notice was given to an old sire before the door of the house, when some of the family came out and furnished him a cricket [low stool], on which he sat down facing the door; then they gave him a groat which he put in his pocket, a crust of bread which he ate, and a bowl of ale which he drank off at a draught. After this he got up from the cricket and pronounced the ease and rest of the soul departed, for which he would pawn his own soul.—Bagford's letter on Leland's Collectanea, i, 76.

The Man of Sin. (2 Thess. ii, 3). Generally held to signify the Antichrist (q.v.), but applied by the old Puritans to the Pope of Rome, by the Fifth Monarchy men to Cromwell, and by many modern theologians to that "wicked one" (identical with the "last horn" of Dan. vii) who is immediately to precede the Second Advent.

The seven deadly sins. Pride, Wrath, Envy, Lust, Gluttony, Avarice, and Sloth.

To earn the wages of sin. To be hanged, or condemned to death.

The wages of sin is death.—Rom. vi, 23.

To sin one's mercies. To be ungrateful for the gifts of Providence.

Sinbad the Sailor (sin' bād). The hero of a story of this name in the Arabian Nights Entertainments. A wealthy citizen of Bagdad, he was called "The Sailor" because of his seven voyages in which, among other high adventures, he discovered the Roc's egg and the Valley of Diamonds, and killed the Old Man of the Sea who had got on his back and would not be dismounted.

Sine (Lat.). Without.

Sine die (Lat.). No time being fixed; indefinitely in regard to time. When a proposal is deferred sine die, it is deferred without fixing a day for its reconsideration, which is virtually "for ever."

Sine qua non (Lat.). An indispensable condition. Lat. Sine qua non potest esse or fieri (that without which [the thing] cannot be, or be done).

Sinecure (Lat. sine cura, without cure, or care). An enjoyment of the money attached to a benefice without having the trouble of the "cure"; applied to any office to which a salary is attached without any duties to perform.

Sinews of War. Essential funds for the prosecution of a war. Troops have to be paid and fed and the materials of war are costly.

The English phrase comes from Cicero's Nervos belli pecuniam (Phil. V. ii, 5), money makes the sinews of war. Rabelais (I, xlv) uses the same idiom—Les nerfs des batailles sont les pécunes.

Victuals and ammunition,
And money too, the sinews of the war,
Are stored up in the magazine.

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER: Fair Maid of the Inn, i, 1.

Sing. Singing bread (Fr. pain à chanter). An old term for the wafer used in celebration of the Mass, because singing was in progress during its consecration. The Reformers directed that the sacramental bread should be similar in fineness and fashion to the round bread and water singing-cakes used in private Masses.

Swans sing before they die. See SWAN.

To make one sing another tune. To make him change his behaviour altogether; make him recant what he has said.

To sing in tribulation. Old slang for to confess when put to the torture. One who did this was termed in jail slang a "canary bird."

"This man, sir, is condemned to the galleys for being a canary-bird." "A canary-bird!" exclaimed the knight. "Yes, sir," added the arch-thief; "I mean that he is very famous for his singing." "What!" said Don Quixote; "are people to be sent to the galleys for singing?" "Marry, that they are," answered the slave. "For there is nothing more dangerous than singing in tribulation."—CERVANTES: Don Quixote, iii, 8.

To sing out. To cry or squeal from chastisement; formerly said also of a prisoner who turned informer against his comrades. See above.

To sing small. To cease boasting and assume a lower tone.

Single-speech Hamilton. William Gerard Hamilton (1729-96), who was Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland, 1763-84. So called from his maiden speech in Parliament (1755), a masterly torrent of eloquence which astounded everyone.

Single Tax. The doctrine that land rent alone should be subject to taxation, propounded by Henry George in Progress and Poverty (1879).

Sinis (sī' nis). A Corinthian robber of Greek legend, known as the Pinebender, because he used to fasten his victims to two pine-trees bent towards the earth, and then leave them to be rent asunder when the trees were released. He was captured by Theseus and put to death in this same way.

Sinister (sin' is ter) (Lat., on the left hand). Foreboding of ill; ill-omened. According to augury, birds, etc., appearing on the left-hand side forbode ill-luck; but on the right-hand side, good luck. Plutarch, following Plato and Aristotle, gives as the reason that the west (or left side of the augur) was towards the setting or departing sun.

Corva sinistra (a crow on the left-hand) is a sign of ill-luck which belongs to English superstitions as much as to the ancient Roman or Etruscan (Virgil: Eclogues, i, 18.)

That raven on yon left-hand oak
(Curse on his ill-beuding croak)
Bodes me no good. GAY: Fable, xxxvii.

Bar sinister. See BAR.

Sinn Fein (shin fān). Irish for "Ourselves alone" This was the Nationalist movement that finally brought about the establishment of the Irish Free State in 1921. The rebellion of 1916 was its first overt act of great importance; in the following year Eamonn de Valera was elected president of the movement and the new republican policy was inaugurated. In December, 1918, Sinn Fein candidates were elected for 73 out of 105 Irish seats in Parliament and these constituted themselves as Dail Eireann. The Irish republican army was organized and carried on a violent guerrilla warfare against the military and the police. In December, 1921, negotiations were opened between the Sinn Fein leaders and the British government, and the Treaty of independence of Eire was signed.

Sinon (sī' non). The Greek who induced the Trojans to receive the wooden horse (Virgil: Æneid, ii, 102, etc.). Anyone deceiving to betray is called "a Sinon."

Sioux (soo). A North American Indian tribe who call themselves Dakotas, Sioux being the termination of the French form of their Ojibwa name meaning "enemies." The name is used for the Siouan family generally, comprising many tribes in the Mississippi and Missouri basins.

Sir. Lat. senex, Span. señor, Ital. signor, Fr. sieur, sire.

As a title of honour prefixed to the Christian name of baronets and knights, Sir is of great antiquity; and the clergy had at one time Sir prefixed to their name. This is merely a translation of the university word dominus given to graduates, as "Domnus Hugh Evans," etc. Spenser uses the title as a substantive, meaning a parson—

But this, good Sir, did follow the plaine word.—Mother Hubbard's Tale, 390.

Sirat. AL. See AL-SIRAT.

Sirdar (ser' dar). A native noble in India. Also the former official title of the British commander-in-chief of the Egyptian army.

Siren (sī' ren). One of the mythical monsters, half woman and half bird, said by Greek poets (see Odyssey, xii) to entice seamen by the sweetness of their song to such a degree that the listeners forgot everything and died of hunger (Gr. sirenes, entanglers); hence applied to any dangerous, alluring woman.

In Homeric mythology there were but two sirens; later writers name three, viz. Parthenope, Ligea, and Leucosia; and the number was still further augmented by later writers.

Ulysses escaped their blandishments by filling his companions' ears with wax and lashing himself to the mast of his ship.

What Song the Syrens sang, or what name Achilles assumed when he hid himself among women, though puzzling questions are not beyond all conjecture.—SIR THOS. BROWNE: Urn Burial, v.

Plato says there were three kinds of sirens—the celestial, the generative, and the cathartic. The first were under the government of Jupiter, the second under that of Neptune, and the third of Pluto. When the soul is in heaven the sirens seek, by harmonic motion, to unite it to the divine life of the celestial host; and when in Hades, to conform them to the infernal regimen; but on earth they produce generation, of which the sea is emblematic. (Proclus: On the Theology of Plato, Bk. vi.)

In more recent times the word has been applied to the loud mechanical whistle sounded at a factory, etc., to indicate that work is to be started or finished for the day. Sirens with two or more recognizable notes were employed in World War II to give warning of the approach or departure of hostile aircraft.

Siren suit. A one-piece garment, on the lines of a boiler suit, sometimes worn in London during the bombing raids of World War II. It is so named from its being slipped on over the night clothes at the first moan of the siren.

Sirius (sir' i ūs). The Dog-star; so called by the Greeks from the adjective seirios, hot and scorching. The Romans called it canicula, whence our Canicular days (q.v.), and the Egyptians sepi, which gave the Greek alternative sothis. See SOTHIC YEAR.

Sirlain. Properly surlain, from Fr. sur-longe, above the loin. The mistaken spelling sir- has given rise to a number of stories of the joint having been "knighted" because of its estimable qualities. Fuller tells us that Henry VIII did so—

Dining with the Abbot of Reading, he [Henry VIII] ate so heartily of a loin of beef that the abbot said he would give 1,000 marks for such a stomach. "Done!" said the king, and kept the abbot a prisoner in the Tower, won his 1,000 marks, and knighted the beef.—Church History, vi, 2, p. 299 (1655).

Another tradition fathers the joke on James I:—

"I vow, 'tis a noble sirlain!"

"Ay, here's cut and come again."

"But pray, why is it called a sirlain?"

"Why you must know that our King James I, who loved good eating, being invited to dinner by one of his nobles, and seeing a large loin of beef at his table, he drew out his sword, and in a frolic knighted it. Few people know the secret of this."

JONATHAN SWIFT: Polite Conversation ii.

And yet another on Charles II.

In any case the joke is an old one; in Taylor the Water Poet's, Great Eater of Kent (1680) we read of one who—should presently enter combat with a worthy knight, called Sir Loyne of Beefe, and overthrow him.

Sirocco (si rok' ō). A wind from northern Africa that blows over Italy, Sicily, etc., producing extreme languor and mental debility.

Sise Lane. See TOOLEY STREET.

Sistine (sis' tin, sis' tēn). The Sistine Chapel. The private chapel of the Pope in the Vatican, so called because built by Pope Sixtus IV (1471-84). It is decorated with the frescoes of Michelangelo and others.

Sistine Madonna, The, or the Madonna di San Sisto. The Madonna painted by Raphael (about 1518) for the church of St. Sixtus (San Sisto) at Piacenza; St. Sixtus is shown kneeling at the right of the Virgin. The picture was in the Royal Gallery, Dresden, but after World War II passed into Russian hands.

Sisyphus (sis' i fŭs). A legendary king of Corinth, crafty and avaricious, said to be the son of Æolus, or—according to later legend, which also makes him the father of Ulysses—of Autolycus. His task in the world of shades is to roll a huge stone up a hill till it reaches the top; as the stone constantly rolls back his work is incessant; hence "a labour of Sisyphus" or "Sisyphean toil" is an endless, heart-breaking job.

Sit. To make one sit up. To astonish or disconcert him considerably, to stir him up to action.

To sit on or upon. To snub, squash, smother, put in his place.

Sit on has other meanings also; thus to sit on a corpse is to hold a coroner's inquest on it; to sit on the bench is to occupy a seat as a judge or magistrate.

To sit on the fence. See FENCE.

To sit tight. To keep your own counsel; to remain in or as in hiding. The phrase is from poker, where, if a player does not want to continue betting and at the same time does not wish to throw in his cards, he "sits tight."

To sit under. A colloquialism for attending the ministrations of the clergyman named. The phrase was common three hundred years ago, and is still in use.

There would then also appear in pulpits other visages, other gestures, and stuff otherwise wrought than what we now sit under, oft-times to as great a trial of our patience as any other than they preach to us.—MILTON: Of Education (1644).

Sit-down strike. A strike in which the workers remain at their factory, etc., but refuse to work themselves or allow others to do so.

Sitting Bull. A famous warrior chief of the Sioux Indians, born on Grand River, South Dakota, in 1834. He commanded the Indians who defeated General Custer at Little Big Horn, 1876, but was killed on December 5th, 1890 while resisting arrest at Fort Yates, N. Dakota, during the Sioux rebellion of that year.

Siva or Shiva (sē' va, shē' va). The third person of the Hindu Trinity, or Trimurti, representing the destructive principle in life and also, as in Hindu philosophy restoration is involved in destruction, the reproductive or renovating power. He is a great worker of miracles through meditation and penance, and hence is a favourite deity with the ascetics. He is a god of the fine arts, and of dancing; and Siva, one only of his very many names, means "the Blessed One."

Six. At sixes and sevens. Higgledy-piggledy, in a state of confusion; or of persons, unable to come to an agreement. The phrase comes from dicing.

The goddess would no longer wait;
But rising from her chair of state,
Left all below at six and seven,
Harness'd her doves, and flew to heaven.
SWIFT: Cadenus and Vanessa (closing lines).

A six-hooped pot. A two-quart pot. Quart pots were bound with three hoops, and when three men joined in drinking each man drank his hoop. Mine host of the Black Bear (Kenilworth, ch. iii), calls Tressalian "a six-hooped pot of a traveller," meaning a first-class guest, because he paid freely, and made no complaints.

Six Principle Baptists. A sect of Arminian Baptists, founded about 1639, who based their creed on the six principles enunciated in Heb. vi, viz., repentance, faith, baptism, the laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, and eternal life.

Six of one and half a dozen of the other. There is nothing to choose between them, they are both in the wrong—Arcades ambo.

The Six Articles. An Act of Parliament passed in 1539 (repealed 1547) enjoining belief in (1) the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist; (2) the sufficiency of communion in one kind; (3) the celibacy of the priests; (4) the obligation of vows of chastity; (5) the expediency of private masses; and (6) the necessity of auricular confession, and decreeing death on those who denied the doctrine of Transubstantiation. It was also known as The Bloody Bill, and the Six Stringed Whip.

The Six Clerks Office. An old name for the Court of Chancery because there were six highly paid clerks connected with it.

The six-foot way. The strip of ground between two parallel sets of railway lines.

The Six Nations. The confederacy of North American Indian tribes consisting of the Five Nations (q.v.) and the Tuscaroras (formerly of North Carolina but now of New York and Ontario) who joined about 1715.

The Six Points of Ritualism. Altar lights, eucharistic vestments, the eastward position, wafer bread, the mixed chalice, and incense. These were sanctioned in the Church of England in the time of Edward VI, and, it is held by many, were never forbidden by competent authority.

The Six Stringed Whip. The Six Articles (see above).

Sixteen-string Jack. John Rann a highwayman (hanged 1774), noted for his foppery. He wore sixteen tags, eight at each knee.

Dr. Johnson said that Gray's poetry towered above the ordinary run of verse as Sixteen-string Jack above the ordinary foot-pad.—BOSWELL: Life of Johnson.

Sizar (sī' zār). An undergraduate of Cambridge, or of Trinity College, Dublin, who receives a grant from his college to assist in paying his expenses. Formerly sizars were expected to undertake certain menial duties now performed by college servants; and the name is taken to show that one so assisted received his sizes or sizings free.

Sizings. The allowance of food provided by the college for undergraduates at a meal; a pound loaf, two inches of butter, and a pot of milk used to be the "sizings" for breakfast; meat was provided for dinner, but any extras had to be sized for. The word is a contraction of assize, a statute to regulate the size or weight of articles sold.

A size is a portion of bread or drinke; it is a farthing which schollers in Cambridge have at the buttry. It is noted with the letter S.—MINSHIEN: Ductor (1617)

Skains-mate.

Scurvy knave! . . . I am none of his skains-mates.
—Romeo and Juliet, II, 4.

The meaning of the word is uncertain, but skene or skean is the long dagger formerly carried by the Irish and Scots (Gael. scian, sgian), so it may mean a dagger-comrade or fellow-cut-throat.

Swift, describing an Irish feast (1720), says, "A cubit at least the length of their skains," and Greene, in his Quip for an Upstart Courtier (1592), speaks of "an ill-favoured knave, who wore by his side a skane, like a brewer's bung-knife."

Skanda. See KARTTIKEYA.

Skedaddle. To run away hastily, make off in a hurry; to be scattered in rout. The Scots apply the word to the milk spilt over the pail in carrying it. During the American Civil War the word came into prominence with its present meaning.

Skeleton. The family skeleton, or the skeleton in the cupboard. Some domestic secret that the whole family conspires to keep to itself; every family is said to have at least one.

The story is that someone without a single care or trouble in the world had to be found. After long and unsuccessful search a lady was discovered whom all thought would "fill the bill"; but to the great surprise of the inquirers, after she had satisfied them on all points and the quest seemed to be achieved, she took them upstairs and there opened a closet which contained a human skeleton. "I try," said she, "to keep my trouble to myself, but every night my husband compels me to kiss that skeleton." She then explained that the skeleton was once her husband's rival, killed in a duel.

The skeleton at the feast. The thing or person that acts as a reminder that there are troubles as well as pleasures in life. Plutarch says in his Moralia that the Egyptians always had a skeleton placed in a prominent position at their banquets.

Skevington's Daughter. See SCAVENGER'S.

Skiddaw (skid' aw). Whenever Skiddaw hath a cap, Scruffell wots full well of that (Fuller: Worthies). When my neighbour's house is on fire mine is threatened; when you are in misfortune I also am a sufferer; when you mourn I have cause also to lament. Skiddaw and Scruffell, or Scawfell, are neighbouring hills in Cumberland. When Skiddaw is capped with clouds, it will be sure to rain ere long at Scawfell.

Skid Row (U.S.A.). A district populated by vicious characters or down-and-outs, i.e. those who have skidded from the path of virtue.

Skill. It skills not. It makes no difference; it doesn't matter one way or the other. The phrase was once very common, but is now looked upon as an archaism.

Whether he [Callimachus] be now lyving I know not but whether he be or no, it skilleth not —LYLY: Euphues and his England (1580).

Similarly, What skills talking? What is the use of talking?

Skimble-skamble. Rambling, worthless. "Skamble" is merely a variety of scramble, hence "scambling days," those days in Lent when no regular meals are provided, but each person "scrambles" or shifts for himself. "Skimble" is added to give force.

And such a deal of skimble-skamble stuff
As put me from my faith.

1 Henry IV, iii, 1.

With such scramble-scemble, spitter-spatter,
As puts me cleane beside the money-matter.

TAYLOR, The Water Poet, ii, 39 (1630).

Skimmington. It was an old custom in rural England and Scotland to make an example of nagging wives and unfaithful husbands by forming a ludicrous procession through the village for the purpose of ridiculing the offender. In cases of hen-pecking Grose tells us that the man rode behind the woman, with his face to the horse's tail. The man held a distaff, and the woman beat him about the jowls with a ladle. As the procession passed a house where the woman was paramount, each gave the threshold a sweep. This performance was called riding Skimmington (also riding the stang—see STANG), and the husband or wife was, for the time, known as Skimmington. The origin of the name is uncertain, but in an illustration of the procession of 1639 the woman is shown belabouring her husband with a skimming-ladle.

The custom was not peculiar to Britain; it prevailed in Scandinavia, Spain, and elsewhere. The procession is described at length in Hudibras, II, ii.

Skin. By the skin of one's teeth. Only just, by a mere hair's breadth. The phrase comes from the book of Job (xix, 20):—

My bone cleaveth to my skin and to my flesh, and I am covered with the skin of my teeth.

Coverdale's rendering of the passage is—

My bone hangeth to my skynne, and the flesh is awaye only there is left me the skynne aboute my teth.

To save one's skin. To get off with one's life.

To sell the skin before you have caught the bear. To count your chickens before they are hatched. Shakespeare alludes to a similar practice:—

The man that once did sell the lion's skin
While the beast lived, was killed with hunting him.
Henry V, iv, 3.

To skin a flint. To be very exacting in making a bargain. The French say, Tondre sur un œuf. The Latin lana caprina (goat's wool), means something as worthless as the skin of a flint or fleece of an eggshell. Hence a skinflint, a pinch-farthing, a niggard.

Skinners. A predatory band in the American Revolutionary War which roamed over Westchester County, New York, robbing and fleeing those who refused to take the oath of fidelity to the Republic.

Skirt. To sit upon one's skirt. To insult, or seek occasion of quarrel. Tarlton, the clown, told his audience the reason why he wore a jacket was that "no one might sit upon his skirt." Sitting on one's skirt is, like stamping on one's coat in Ireland, a fruitful source of quarrels, often provoked.

Crosse me not, Liza, nether be so pette,

For if thou dost, I'll sit upon thy skirte.

The Abortive of an Idle Hour (1620).

In English slang a skirt is a girl.

Skull. Skull and crossbones. An emblem of mortality; specifically, the pirate's flag. The "crossbones" are two human thigh-bones laid across one another.

Sky. Rhyming slang for pocket, the missing word being rocket. See RHYMING SLANG.

If the sky falls we shall catch larks. A bantering reply to those who suggest some very improbable or wild scheme.

Lauded to the skies. Extravagantly praised; praised to the heights.

Sky-raker. A nautical term for any topsail; strictly speaking, a sail above the fore-royal, the main-royal, or the mizzen-royal.

Skyscraper. A very tall building, especially one in New York or some other American city. Some of them run to a hundred floors, and more. Also applied by sailors to a sky-raker.

To skylark about. To amuse oneself in a frolicsome way, jump around and be merry, indulge in mild horseplay. The phrase was originally nautical and referred to the sports of the boys among the rigging after work was done.

Slam. A term in card-playing denoting winning all the tricks in a deal. In Bridge this is called Grand slam, and winning all but one, Little slam. Cp. RUFF.

Slander. Literally, a stumbling-block (cp. SCANDAL), or something which trips a person up (Gr. skandalon, through Fr. esclandre.)

Slang. As denoting language or jargon of a low or colloquial type the word first appeared in the 18th century; its origin is not known, but it is probably connected with sling (cp. mud-slinging, for hurling abuse at one). Slang is of various sorts, fashionable, professional, schoolboy, sporting, etc. Some of it is introduced into the language from below, i.e. from the ranks of thieves, rogues, and vagabonds. It usually has an element of humour about it, through exaggeration or absurd juxtaposition. Slang is always invented by individuals and adopted later by the public. When the adoption becomes so general and so approved that the expression in question is accepted as standard English, it ceases to be slang.

See also BACK-SLANG; RHYMING SLANG.

To slang a person. To abuse him, give him a piece of your mind.

Slap-bang. At once, without hesitation—done with a slap and a bang. The term was formerly applied to cheap eating-houses, where one slapped one's money down as the food was banded on the table.

They lived in the same street, walked to town every morning at the same hour, dined at the same slap-bang every day.—DICKENS: Sketches by Boz, III, 36.

Slap-dash. In an off-hand manner done hurriedly as with a slap and a dash. Rooms used to be decorated by slapping and dashing the walls so as to imitate paper, and at one time slap-dash walls were very common.

Slap-up. First-rate, grand, stylish.

[The] more slap-up still have the shields painted on the panels with the coronet over.—THACKERAY.

Slapstick. Literally the two or more laths bound together at one end with which harlequins, clowns, etc., strike other performers with a resounding slap or crack; but more often applied to any broad comedy with knock-about action and horseplay.

Slate. Slate club. A sick benefit club for working-men. Originally the names of the members and the money paid in were entered on a folding slate.

To have a slate or tile loose. See TILE.

To slate one. To reprove, abuse, or criticize him savagely. It is not known how the term arose, but perhaps it is because at school the names of bad boys were chalked up on the slate as an exposure.

The journalists there lead each other a dance. If one man "slates" another for what he has done, it is pistols for two, and then coffin for one. Funch (The Pugnacious Penmen), 1885.

To start with a clean slate. To be given another chance, one's past misdeeds having been forgiven and expunged, as writing is sponged from a slate.

Slave. This is an example of the strange changes which come over some words. The Slavi were a tribe which once dwelt on the banks of the Dnieper, and were so called from slav (noble, illustrious); but as, in the later stages of the Roman Empire, vast multitudes of them were spread over Europe as captives, the word acquired its present meaning.

Similarly, Goths means the good or godlike men; but since the invasion of the Goths the word has become synonymous with barbarous, bad, ungodlike.

In World War II a slave was a vehicle with electrical equipment designed to serve tanks—i.e. charge their batteries, and start them in the morning.

Sleave. The ravelled sleeve of care (Macbeth ii, 2). The sleeve is the knotted or entangled part of thread or silk, the raw, unwrought floss silk; hence, any tangle. Churton Collins (in Studies in Shakespeare) speaks of smoothing "the tangled sleeve of Shakespearean expression."

Sledge-hammer. A sledge-hammer argument. A clincher; an argument which annihilates opposition at a blow. The sledge-hammer (A.S. slecege) is the largest hammer used by smiths, and is wielded by both hands.

Sleep. To sleep away. To pass away in sleep, to consume in sleeping; as, "to sleep one's life away."

To sleep like a top. Excellently, go the night through without waking or discomfort. When peg-tops are at the acme of their gyration they become so steady and quiet that they do not seem to move; in this state they are said to "sleep." Congreve plays on the two meanings:—

Hang him, no, he a dragon! If he be, 'tis a very peaceful one. I can ensure his anger dormant, or should he seem to rouse, 'tis but well lashing him and he will sleep like a top.—Old Bachelor, I, 5.

To sleep off. To get rid of by sleep.

To sleep on a matter. To let a decision on it stand over till to-morrow.

Sleeper, The. Epimenides, the Greek poet, is said to have fallen asleep in a cave when a boy, and not to have waked for fifty-seven years, when he found himself possessed of all wisdom.

In mediæval legend stories of those who have gone to sleep and have been—or are to be—awakened after many years are very numerous. Such legends hang round the names of King Arthur, Charlemagne, and Barbarossa. Cf. also the stories of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, Tannhauser, Ogier the Dane, Kilmeny, and Rip van Winkle.

Sleeper Awakened, The. See SLY, CHRISTOPHER.

Sleepers. In Britain, the timber or steel supports for the chairs which carry the rails on a railway line (from the Norwegian sleep, a roller or timber laid along a road). In U.S.A. these supports are called ties. A sleeper, in U.S.A. means a railway sleeping-car.

Sleeping Beauty, The. This charming nursery tale comes from the French La Belle au Bois Dormant, by Charles Perrault (1628-1703). (Contes de ma mère l'Oye, 1697). The Princess is shut up by enchantment in a castle, where she sleeps a hundred years, during which time an impenetrable wood springs up around. Ultimately she is disenchanting by the kiss of a young Prince, who marries her.

Sleeping partner. A partner in a business who takes no active share in running it beyond supplying capital.

Sleeping sickness. A West African disease caused by a parasite, Trypanosoma Gambiense, characterized by fever and great sleepiness, and usually terminating fatally. The disease known in England, which shows similar symptoms is usually called Sleeping illness or Sleepy sickness as a means of distinction; its scientific name is Encephalitis lethargica.

Sleepy. Pears are said to be "sleepy" when they are beginning to rot; and cream when, in the course of its making, the whole assumes a frothy appearance.

Sleepy hollow. Any village far removed from the active concerns of the outside world. The name given in Washington Irving's Sketch Book to a quiet old-world village on the Hudson.

Sleepy sickness. See SLEEPING SICKNESS, above.

Sleeve. To hang on one's sleeve. To listen devoutly to what one says; to surrender your freedom of thought and action to the judgment of another.

To have up one's sleeve. To hold in reserve; to have it ready to bring out in a case of emergency. The allusion is to conjurers, who frequently conceal in the sleeve the means by which they do the trick.

To laugh in one's sleeve. To ridicule a person not openly but in secret. At one time it was quite possible to conceal a laugh by hiding one's face in the large sleeves worn by men. The French say, rire sous cape.

To pin to one's sleeve, as, "I shan't pin my faith to your sleeve," meaning, "I shall not slavishly believe or follow you." The allusion is to the practice of knights, in days of chivalry, pinning to their sleeve some token given them by their lady-love. This token was a pledge that he would do or die.

To wear one's heart on one's sleeve, to expose all one's feelings to the eyes of the world. Iago wears his heart on his sleeve, displaying a feigned devotion to his master (Othello, 1, 1).

Sleeveless. In the 16th century sleeveless was very commonly applied to errand, answer, message, etc., signifying that it was fruitless or futile, an errand, etc., that has no result. In Eikonoclastes Milton speaks of sleeveless reason, meaning reasoning that leads nowhere and proves nothing; and a sleeveless message was used of a kind of April fool trick—the messenger being dispatched merely so as to get rid of him for a time.

If all these faile, a beggar-woman may
A sweet love-letter to her hands convey,
Or a neat laundresse or a hearb-wife can Carry a sleeveless message now and than.

Taylor's Works, II, 111 (1630).

Sleuth-hound. A blood-hound which follows the sleuth (old Norse sloth, our more modern sloth) or track of an animal. Hence used, especially in America, of a detective.

There is a law also among the Borderers in time of peace, that whoso denieth entrance or sute of a sleuth-hound in pursuit made after fellows and stolen goods, shall be holden as accessarie unto the theft.—HOLINSHED: Description of Scotland, p. 14.

Slew. Intoxicated. When a vessel changes her tack, she staggers and gradually heels over. A drunken man moves like a ship changing her angle of sailing.

Slick. Adroit, dextrous, smart; the word is a variant of sleek.

Sliding Scale. A scale of duties, prices, payment, etc., which slides up and down as the article to which it refers becomes dearer or cheaper, or by which such payments accommodate themselves to the fluctuations in other conditions previously named.

Slip. Many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip. Everything is uncertain till you possess it. Cp. ANACREON.

Multa cadunt inter calicem supremaque labra.—HORACE

To give one the slip. To steal off unperceived; to elude pursuit. A sea phrase; a cable and buoy are fastened to the anchor-chain, which is let slip though the hawse-pipe. Done to save time in weighing anchor. The metaphor probably came originally from the action of "slipping" a hound, i.e. allowing it to run free by slipping the lead from its collar. In coursing the official who releases the greyhounds is still called the slipper.

Sloane MSS. 3,560 MSS. collected by Sir Hans Sloane (1660-1753), and left to the nation, together with his library (50,000 vols.) and other collections on condition that his heirs received £20,000, which was far less than their value. These collections were bought and housed in Montague House, and formed the nucleus of the British Museum.

Slogan (slō' gán). The war-cry of the old Highland clans (Gael. sluagh, host, ghairm, outcry). Hence, any warcry; and, in later use, a political party cry, an advertising catchphrase, etc. Cp. SLUGHORN.

Slop, Dr. The nickname given by Wm. Hone to Sir John Stoddart (1773-1856), a choleric lawyer and journalist who assailed Napoleon most virulently in The Times (1812-16). The allusion was to Dr. Slop the ignorant man-midwife in Sterne's Tristram Shandy.

Slope. To decamp; to run away. The term came from the United States, and may be a contraction of let's lope, lope being a dialect variation of loup (leap), to run or jump away.

The slippery slope. The broad and easy way "that leadeth to destruction." Facilis descensus Averno. See AVERNUS.

Slops. Police; originally "ecilop." See BACK-SLANG.

I dragged you in here and saved you,
And sent out a gal for the slops;
Ha! they're acomin', sir! Listen!
The noise and the shoutin' stops.

SMS: Ballads of Babylon (The Matron's Story).

Slough of Despond. A period of, or fit of, great depression. In Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Pt. 1, it is a deep bog which Christian has to cross in order to get to the Wicket Gate. Help comes to his aid, but Neighbour Pliable turns back.

Slow. Slow burn. A comedy routine invented by the Hollywood comedian Edgar Kennedy. It consists in struggling to preserve one's patience by passing the hands slowly over the face, but finally losing control and degenerating into hysteria. Kennedy's enormous success in exploiting this trick is undoubtedly due to the fact that it expresses to perfection the helpless exasperation of the little man in a bureaucratic and machine-ridden existence.

Slow-coach. A dawdle. As a slow coach in the old coaching-days got on slowly, so one that gets on slowly is a slow coach.

Slow-worm. See MISNOMERS.

Slubberdegullion (slüb er de gūl' yon). A nasty, paltry fellow. To slubber is to do things by halves, to perform a work carelessly; degullion is a fanciful addition (as in rapscallion).

Quoth she, "Although thou hast deserved,
Base slubber-degullion, to be served
As thou didst vow to deal with me.

BUTLER: Hudibras, I, 3.

Slug (U.S.A.). A $50 gold piece.

Slugabed. A late riser. To slug used to be quite good English for to be thoroughly lazy. Sylvester has—

The Soldier, slugging long at home in Peace,
His wonted courage quickly doth decrease.
Du Bartas, I, vii, 340 (1591).

Slug-horn. A battle-trumpet; the word being the result of an erroneous reading by Chatterton of the Gaelic slogan. He thought the word sounded rather well; and, as he did not know what it meant, gave it a meaning that suited him:—

Some caught a slughorne and an onsett wounde.—
The Battle of Hastings, ii, 99.

Browning adopted it in the last line but one of his Childe Rolande to the Dark Tower Came, and thus this “ghost-word” (q.v.) got a footing in the language.

Sly, Christopher. A keeper of bears and a tinker, son of a pedlar, and a sad, drunken sot in the induction of the Taming of the Shrew. Shakespeare mentions him as a well-known character of Wincot, a hamlet near Stratford-on-Avon, and it is more than probable that in him we have an actual portrait of a contemporary.

Sly is found dead drunk by a lord, who commands his servants to put him to bed, and on his waking to attend upon him like a lord and bamboozle him into the belief that he is a great man; the play is performed for his delectation. The same trick was played by the Caliph Haroun al-Raschid on Abou Hassan, the rich merchant, in The Sleeper Awakened (Arabian Nights), and by Philippe the Good, Duke of Burgundy, on his marriage with Eleanor, as given in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy (Pt. ii, sec. 2, num. 4).

Sly-boots. One who appears to be a dolt, but who is really wide awake; a cunning dolt.

The frog called the lazy one several times, but in vain; there was no such thing as stirring him, though the sly-boots heard well enough all the while.—
Adventures of Abdalla, p. 32 (1729).

You're a sly dog. A playful way of saying, You pretend to be disinterested, but I can read between the lines.

Small. A small and early. An evening party on a modest scale, with not a lot of guests, and not late hours.

Small-back. Death. So called because he is usually drawn as a skeleton.

Small beer. Properly, beer of only slight alcoholic strength; hence, trivialities, persons or things of small consequence.

Iago: She was a wight, if ever such wight were,—
Des.: To do what?

Iago: To suckle fools and chronicle small beer.
Des.: O most lame and impotent conclusion!

Othello, ii, 1.

Hence, he does not think small beer of himself, he has a very good opinion of himself.

To express her self-esteem [it might be said] that she did not think small beer of herself.—DE QUINCEY: Historical Essays.

Small clothes. An obsolete term for breeches.

Small-endians. See LITTLE-ENDIANS.

Small fry. A humorous way of referring to a number of young children, from the numerous fry or young of fish and other creatures.

Small holding. A small plot of land (but larger than an allotment) let by a local or county council to a tenant for agricultural purposes. The Act of 1892 lays down that a small holding shall be not less than one acre nor more than fifty, and should not exceed £50 in annual value.

Small talk. Chit-chat, trivial gossip.

The small hours. The hours from 1 A.M. to 4 or 5 A.M., when you are still in the small, or low, numbers.

The small of the back. The slenderer, narrower part, just above the buttocks.

To feel small. To feel humiliated, “taken down a peg or two.”

To live in a small way. Keep a modest, unpretentious household; make both ends meet, but with little to spare and no ostentation,

To sing small. To adopt a humble tone; to withdraw some sturdy assertion and apologize for having made it.

Smalls. The undergraduates' name at Oxford for Responsions, i.e. the first of the three examinations for the B.A. degree; about corresponding to the Cambridge Little-go.

Smart Money. Money paid by a person to obtain exemption from some disagreeable office or duty, or given to soldiers or sailors for injuries received in the service; in law it means a heavy fine. It either makes the person “smart,” i.e. suffer, or else the person who receives it is paid for smarting.

Smear. A figurative sense of this word is to besmirch a reputation, to hint unpleasant things without specifying or doing more than suggest something derogatory.

Smectymnuus (smek tim' nūs). The name under which was published (1641) an anti-episcopalian tract in answer to Bishop Hall's Divine Right of Episcopacy. The name is a sort of acrostic, composed of the initials of the authors, viz.:—

Stephen Marshal, Edward Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurstow.

Milton published his Apology for Smectymnuus, another reply to Hall, in 1642.

Also contracted to smec.

The handkerchief about the neck,
Canonical cravat of Smec.

BUTLER: Hudibras, Pt. 1, 5.

Smelfungus. See MUNDUNGUS.

Smell, To. Often used figuratively for to suspect, to discern intuitively, as in I smell a rat (see RAT), to smell treason, to discern indications of treason, etc.

Shakespeare has, “Do you smell a fault?” (Lear, i, 1); and Iago says to Othello, “One may smell in this a will most rank.” St. Jerome says that St. Hilarión had the gift of knowing what sins or vices anyone was inclined to by simply smelling either the person or his garments, and by the same faculty could discern good feelings and virtuous propensities.

It smells of the lamp. See LAMP.

Smiler. Another name for shandy-gaff—a mixture of ale and lemonade or ginger-beer.

Smith of Nottingham. Applied to conceited persons who imagine that no one is able to compete with themselves. Ray, in his Collection of Proverbs, has the following couplet:—

The little Smith of Nottingham
Who doth the work that no man can.

Smith's Prize-man. One who has obtained the prize (£25), founded at Cambridge by Robert Smith, D.D. (1689-1768) (Master of Trinity, 1742-68), for proficiency in mathematics and natural philosophy. There are annually two prizes, awarded to two commencing Bachelors of Arts.

Smithfield. The smooth field (A.S. smethe, smooth), called in Latin Campus Planus, and described by Fitz-Stephen in the 12th century as a "plain field where every Friday there is a celebrated rendezvous of fine horses brought thither to be sold." Bartholomew Fair was held here till 1855, at which date also the cattle-market was removed to Copenhagen Fields, Islington.

Smoke. To detect, or rather to get a scent of, some plot or scheme. The allusion may be to the detection of the enemy by smoke seen to issue from their place of concealment.

Cape smoke. A cheap and villainous kind of whisky sold in South Africa.

No smoke without fire. Every slander has some foundation. The reverse proverb, "No fire without smoke," means no good without some drawback.

Smoke-farthings, smoke-silver. An offering formerly given to the priest at Whitsuntide, according to the number of chimneys in his parish.

The Bishop of Ely hath out of everie parish in Cambridgeshire a certain tribute called . . . smoke-farthings, which the churchwardens do levie according to the number of . . . chimneys that be in a parish. —MSS. Baker, xxxix, 326.

To end in smoke. To come to no practical result. The allusion is to kindling, which smokes, but will not light a fire.

To smoke the pipe of peace. See CALUMET.

Snack (a variant of snatch).

To go snacks. To share and share alike.

To take a snack. To take a morsel.

Snag. To come up against a snag. To encounter some obstacle in your progress. The phrase is from the American lumber camps, a snag being a tree-trunk lodged in the bottom of the river and reaching the surface, or near it.

Snake. Rhyming-slang (q.v.) for a looking-glass, the missing portion being "in the grass."

It was an old idea that snakes in casting their sloughs annually gained new vigour and fresh strength; hence Shakespeare's allusion—

When the mind is quicken'd, out of doubt,
The organs, though defunct and dead before,
Break up their drowsy grave, and newly move
With casted slough and fresh legerity.

Henry V, ii, 1.

And another notion was that one could regain one's youth by feeding on snakes.

You have eat a snake

And are grown young, gamesome and rampant.

BEAUMONT and FLETCHER: Elder Brother, iv, 4.

A snake in the grass. A hidden or hypocritical enemy, a disguised danger. The phrase is from Virgil (Ecl. iii, 93), Latet anguis in herba, a snake is lurking in the grass.

Great snakes! An exclamation of surprise.

To see snakes, to have snakes in one's boots, etc. To suffer from delirium tremens. This is one of the delusions common to those so afflicted.

Snake-eyes. A double one, in throwing dice (U.S.A.).

Snake stones. The fossils called Ammonites (q.v.).

Snap. Not worth a snap of the fingers. Utterly worthless and negligible.

Snapdragon. The same as "flapdragon" (q.v.); also, a plant of the genus Antirrhinum with a flower opening like a dragon's mouth.

Snapshot. Formerly applied to a shot fired without taking aim, but now almost exclusively to an instantaneous photograph. Hence to snapshot a person, to take an instantaneous photograph of him.

Snap vote. A vote taken unexpectedly, especially in Parliament. The result of a "snap vote" has, before now, been the overthrow of the ministry.

To snap one's nose off. See NOSE.

Snark. The imaginary animal invented by Lewis Carroll as the subject of his mock heroic poem, The Hunting of the Snark (1876). It was most elusive and gave endless trouble, and when eventually the hunters thought they had tracked it down their quarry proved to be but a Boojum. The name (a "portmanteau word" of snake and shark) has hence sometimes been given to the quests of dreamers and visionaries.

It was one of Rossetti's delusions that in The Hunting of the Snark Lewis Carroll was caricaturing him.

Snarling Letter (Lat. litera canina). The letter r. See R.

Sneck Posset. To give one a sneck posset is to give him a cold reception, to slam the door in his face (Cumberland and Westmorland). The "sneck" is the latch of a door, and to "sneck the door in one's face" is to shut a person out.

Sneeze. St. Gregory has been credited with originating the custom of saying "God bless you" after sneezing, the story being that he enjoined its use during a pestilence in which sneezing was a mortal symptom. Aristotle, however, mentions a similar custom among the Greeks; and Thucydides tells us that sneezing was a crisis symptom of the great Athenian plague.

The Romans followed the same custom, their usual exclamation being Absit omen! The Parsees hold that sneezing indicates that evil spirits are abroad, and we find similar beliefs in India, Africa, ancient and modern Persia, among the North American Indian tribes, etc.

We are told that when the Spaniards arrived in Florida the Caziue sneezed, and all the court lifted up their hands and implored the sun to avert the evil omen.

It is not to be sneezed at—not to be despised.

Snickersnee. A large clasp-knife, or combat with clasp-knives. The word is a corruption of the old snick and snee or snick or snee, cut and thrust, from the Dutch.

Snide. A slang term for counterfeit, bogus. In the U.S.A. mean, contemptible.

Snidesman. An utterer of false coin.

Snob. A vulgar person who apes the ways of, and truckles to those in a higher social position than himself.

Thackeray calls George IV a snob, because he assumed to be "the first gentleman in Europe," but had not the genuine stamp of a gentleman's mind.

The word actually means a journeyman cobbler or a shoemaker's apprentice; at Cambridge it denotes a townsman as opposed to a gowmsman.

Snood. The lassie lost her silken snood. The snood was a ribbon with which a Scots lass braided her hair, and was the emblem of her maiden character. When she married she changed the snood for the curch or coif; but if she lost the name of virgin before she obtained that of wife, she "lost her silken snood," and was not privileged to assume the curch.

In more recent times the word has been applied to the net in which women confine their hair.

Snooks. An exclamation of incredulity or derision. To cock or pull a snook, to make a gesture of contempt by putting the thumb to the nose and spreading the fingers.

Snotty. Sailors' slang for a midshipman.

Snow King. The. So the Austrians called Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden (1594, 1611-1632), because, said they, he "was kept together by the cold, but would melt and disappear as he approached a warmer soil."

Snuff. To be snuffed out—put down, eclipsed; killed. To snuff it is a euphemism for to die. The allusion is to a candle snuffed with snuffers.

'Tis strange the mind, that very fiery particle,
Should let itself be snuffed out by an article.

BYRON: Don Juan, xi, 60.

Took it in snuff—in anger, in huff.

You'll mar the light by taking it in snuff.

Who . . . when it next came there, took it in snuff.
—Henry IV, i, 3.

Up to snuff. Wide awake, knowing, sharp; not easily taken in or imposed upon.

Soap, or Soft Soap. Flattery especially of an oily, unctuous kind.

How are you off for soap? A common street-saying of the mid-19th century, of indeterminate meaning. It may mean "What are you good for?" in the way of cash, or anything else; and it was often just a general piece of cheek. Cp. "What! No soap?" in Foote's nonsense passage (see PANJANDRUM).

In soaped-pig fashion. Vague; a method of speaking or writing which always leaves a way of escape. The allusion is to the custom at fairs, etc., of soaping the tail of a pig before turning it out to be caught by the tail.

He is vague as may be; writing in what is called the "soaped-pig" fashion.—CARLYLE: The Diamond Necklace, ch. iv.

Soap-lock (U.S.A.). A fashion in men's hairdressing c. 1840 when the hair was parted and came down long on either side. Also a rowdy, who did his hair in this way.

Soapy Sam. Samuel Wilberforce (1805-1873), Bishop of Oxford, and afterwards of Winchester; so called because of his persuasive and unctuous way of speaking. It is somewhat remarkable that the floral decorations above the stall of the bishop and of the principal of Cuddesdon, were S. O. A. P., the initials of Sam Oxon and Alfred Port.

Someone asking the bishop why he was so called, received the answer, "Because I am often in hot water and always come out with clean hands."

Sob Stuff. A phrase describing newspaper, film, or other stories of a highly sentimental kind.

Sob Sister. A woman reporter.

Sobersides. A grave, steady-going, serious-minded person, called by some "a stick-in-the-mud"; generally Old Sobersides.

Social. Pertaining to society, the community as a whole, or to the intercourse and mutual relationships of mankind at large.

The social evil, or plague. Euphemisms for prostitution and venereal diseases.

Society. The upper ten thousand, or "the upper ten." When persons are in "society," they are on the visiting lists of the fashionable social leaders.

Society of Friends. See QUAKERS.

Society verse. See VERS DE SOCIÉTÉ.

Socinianism (so sin' yàn izm). A form of Unitarianism which, on the one hand, does not altogether deny the supernatural character of Christ, but, on the other, goes farther than Arianism, which, while upholding His divinity, denies that He is coequal with the Father. So called from the Italian theologian, Faustus Socinus (1539-1604), who, with his brother, Lælius (1525-62), propagated this doctrine.

Sock. The light shoe worn by the comic actors of Greece and Rome (Lat. soccus); hence applied to comedy itself.

Then to the well-trod stage anon,

If Jonson's learned sock be on.

MILTON: L'Allegro.

The difference between the sock of comedy and the buskin (q.v.) of tragedy was that the sock reached only to the ankle, but the buskin extended to the knee.

Socrates (sok' rà tēz). The great Greek philosopher, born and died at Athens (about 470-399 B.C.). He used to call himself "the midwife of men's thoughts"; and out of his intellectual school sprang those of Plato and the Dialectic system, Euclid and the Megaric, Aristippus and the Cyrenaic, Antisthenes and the Cynic. Cicero said of him that "he brought down philosophy from the heavens to earth"; and he was certainly the first to teach that "the proper study of mankind is man." He was condemned to death for the corruption of youth by introducing new gods (thus being guilty of impiety) and drank hemlock in prison, surrounded by his disciples.

Socratic irony. Leading on your opponent in an argument by simulating ignorance, so that he "ties himself in knots" and eventually falls an easy prey—a form of procedure used with great effect by Socrates.

The Socratic method. The method of conducting an argument, imparting information, etc., by means of question and answer.

Soda-jerker. An attendant at an ice-cream soda fountain in the U.S.A.

Sodom. Apples of Sodom. See APPLE.

Soft, or softy. A mentally retarded or undeveloped person; one whose brain shows signs of softening.

A soft fire makes sweet malt. Too much hurry or precipitation spoils work, just as too fierce a fire would burn the malt and destroy its sweetness. "Soft and fair goes far," "the more haste the less speed" are sayings of similar meaning.

Soft sawder. Flattery, adulation. Soft solder (pronounced sawder) is a composition of tin and lead, used for soldering zinc, lead, and tin; hard solder for brass, etc.

Soft soap. See SOAP.

Soft words butter no parsnips. See BUTTER.

Soho! (sō hō'). An exclamation used by huntsmen, especially in hare-coursing when a hare has been started. It is a very old call, dating from at least the 13th century, and corresponds to the "Tally-ho!" of fox-hunters when the fox breaks cover.

Soho, the district in London, is so called from a mansion which stood there in the time of Charles II, belonging to the Duke of Monmouth.

Soi-disant (swa dē' zon) (Fr.). Self-styled, would-be.

Soil. A son of the soil. One native to that particular place, whose family has been settled there for generations; especially if engaged in agriculture.

To take soil. A hunting term, signifying that the deer has taken to the water. Soil here is the Fr. souille, mire in which a wild boar wallows.

Fida went downe the dale to seeke the hinde,
And founde her taking soyle within a flood.

BROWN: Britannia's Pastorals, i, 84.

Sol. The Roman sun god; hence used for the sun itself.

Sol through white curtains shot a timorous ray,
And oped those eyes that must eclipse the day.
POPE: Rape of the Lock, i, 13.

The name was given by the old alchemists to gold, and in heraldry it represents or (gold). In music sol is the name of the fifth note of the diatonic scale (see DOH).

Solano (so la' nō). Ask no favour during the Solano. A popular Spanish proverb, meaning—Ask no favour during a time of trouble or adversity. The solano (solanus, sun, see SOL) of Spain is a south-east wind, extremely hot, and loaded with fine dust; it produces giddiness and irritation.

Sold down the river (U.S.A.). Deceived or demoted. From the practice of selling slaves in the upper Southern States to the cotton and sugar plantation owners farther South, and so breaking up families and causing distress.

Soldan or Sowdan. A corruption of sultan, meaning in mediæval romance the Saracen king; but, with the usual inaccuracy of these writers, we have the Soldan of Egypt, the Sowdan of Persia, the Sowdan of Babylon, etc., all represented as accompanied by grim Saracens to torment Christians.

In Spenser's Faerie Queene (V, vii) the Soldan typifies Philip II of Spain who used all his power to bribe and seduce the subjects of Elizabeth I, here figuring as Queen Mercilla.

Soldier originally meant a hireling or mercenary; one paid a solidus, or wage, for military service; but hireling and soldier convey now very different ideas.

Soldier's battles. Engagements which are more of the nature of hand to hand encounters than regular pitched battles; those that have to be fought by the soldiers themselves, their leaders not having been able to take up strategic positions. The principal "Soldiers' Battles" of English history are Malplaquet, 1709, and Inkermann, 1854.

Soldiers of fortune. Men who live by their wits; chevaliers de l'industrie. Referring to those men in mediæval times who let themselves for hire into any army.

To come the old soldier over one. To dictate peremptorily and profess superiority of knowledge and experience; also to impose on one.

But you needn't try to come the old soldier over me. I'm not quite such a fool as that.—HUGHES: Tom Brown at Oxford, II, xvii.

Solecism (sō' lē sizm). A deviation from correct idiom or grammar; from the Greek soloikos, speaking incorrectly, so named from Soloi, a town in Cilicia, the Attic colonists of which spoke a debased form of Greek.

The word is also applied to any impropriety or breach of good manners.

Solemn. The Solemn League and Covenant. A league entered into by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, the Westminster Assembly of English Divines, and the English Parliament in 1643, for the establishment of Presbyterianism and suppression of Roman Catholicism in both countries. Charles II swore to the Scots that he would abide by it and therefore they crowned him in 1651 at Dunbar; but at the Restoration he not only rejected the Covenant, but had it burnt by the common hangman.

Sol-fa. See TONIC SOL-FA.

Solicitor. See ATTORNEY.

Solid. In the 18th century this denoted a man of property and position, hence later it became synonymous with honest, genuine; in the 20th century it has kept the same meaning but only in U.S.A. slang—a fine jazz tune, for instance, being a solid sender.

Solid Doctor. The. Richard Middleton, (fl. 1280), a Franciscan Schoolman, author of works on theology and canon law.

Solipsism (sō lip' sizm) (Lat. solus, alone, ipse, self). Absolute egoism; the metaphysical theory that the only knowledge possible is that of oneself.

Solomon. King of Israel (d. about 930 B.C.). He was specially noted for his wisdom, hence his name has been used for wise men generally.

The English Solomon. James I (1603-25), whom Sully called "the wisest fool in Christendom."

The Solomon of France. Charles V (1364-80) le Sage.

Solomon's Carpet. See CARPET, THE MAGIC.

Solomon's Ring. Rabbinical fable has it that Solomon wore a ring with a gem that told him all he desired to know.

Solomon's Seal. Polygonatum multiflorum, a plant with drooping white flowers. As the stems decay the root-stalk becomes marked with scars that have some resemblance to seals; this, according to some, accounts for the name; but another explanation offered is that the root has medicinal value in sealing up and closing green wounds.

Solon (sō' lon). A wiseacre or sage; from the great lawgiver of ancient Athens (d. about 560 B.C.), one of the Seven Sages of Greece.

The Solon of Parnassus. So Voltaire called Boileau (1636-1711), in allusion to his Art of Poetry.

Solstice (sol' stis). The summer solstice is June 21st; the winter solstice is December 22nd; so called because on or about these dates the sun reaches its extreme northern and southern points in the ecliptic and appears to stand still (Lat. sol, sun, sistit, stands) before it turns back on its apparent course.

Solyman (sol' i mán). King of the Turks (in Jerusalem Delivered), whose capital was Nice. Being driven from his kingdom, he fled to Egypt, and was there appointed leader of the Arabs (Bk. ix).

Soma (sō' ma). An intoxicating drink anciently made, with mystic rites and incantations, from the juice of some Indian plant by the priests, and drunk by the Brahmins as well as offered as libations to their gods. It was fabled to have been brought from heaven by a falcon, or by the daughters of the Sun; and it was itself personified as a god, and represented the moon. The plant was probably a species of Asclepias.

To drink the Soma. To become immortal, or as a god.

Some. Used—originally in America—with a certain emphasis as an adjective-adverb of all work, denoting some special excellence or high degree. "This is some book," for instance, means that it is a book that particularly fascinates, appeals to, or "intrigues" the speaker; "some golfer," a super-excellent golfer; "going some," going the pace.

Some pumpkins (U.S.A.). Substantial, important; the opposite of "small potatoes."

Somerset House occupies the site in the Strand, London, of a princely mansion built by Somerset the Protector, brother of Lady Jane Seymour, and uncle of Edward VI. At the death of Somerset on the scaffold it became the property of the Crown, and in the reign of James I was called Denmark House in honour of Anne of Denmark, his queen. Old Somerset House was pulled down in the 18th century, and the present structure was erected by Sir William Chambers in 1776 as government offices for the Board of Inland Revenue, Registrar General, Wills and Probates, etc.

Somoreen. See ZAMORIN.

Song. An old song. A mere trifle, something hardly worth reckoning, as "It went for an old song," it was sold for practically nothing.

Don't make such a song about it! Be more reasonable in your complaints; don't make such a fuss about it.

The Songs of Degrees. Another name for the Gradual Psalms (q.v.).

The Song of Roland. See under ROLAND.

The Song of Songs. The Canticles, or the Song of Solomon, in the Old Testament.

Sonnet. Prince of the sonnet. Joachim du Bellay, a French sonneteer (1526-60); but Petrarch (1304-74) better deserves the title.

Sooner. Slang for a sponger, one who lives on his wits and will do anything sooner than work for his living.

In America the term is applied to settlers in the western districts who peg out their claims in the territory before the time appointed by the Government.

Sooterkin. A kind of after-birth fabled to be produced by Dutch women through sitting over their stoves; hence an abortive proposal or scheme, and, as applied to literature, an imperfect or a supplementary work.

For knaves and fools being near of kin

As Dutch boors are t' a sooterkin,

Both parties join'd to do their best

To damn the public interest.

BUTLER: Hudibras, III, ii, 145.

Sop. A sop in the pan. A tit-bit, dainty morsel; a piece of bread soaked in the dripping of meat caught in a dripping-pan; a bribe (see below).

To give a sop to Cerberus. To give a bribe, to quiet a troublesome customer, Cerberus is Pluto's three-headed dog, stationed at the gates of the infernal regions. When persons died the Greeks and Romans used to put a cake in their hands as a sop to Cerberus, to allow them to pass without molestation.

Soph. A student at Cambridge is a Freshman for the first term, a Junior Soph for the second year, and a Senior Soph for the third year. The word Soph is a contraction of "sophister," which is the Greek and Latin sophistes (a sophist). In former times these students had to maintain a given question in the schools by opposing the orthodox view of it. These opponencies are now limited to Law and Divinity degrees.

In American Universities Soph is an abbreviation of Sophomore, a term applied to students in their second year.

Sophia, Santa (só fî' à). The great metropolitan cathedral of the Orthodox Greek Church at Istanbul. It was built by Justinian (532-7), but since the capture of the city by the Turks (1453) has been used as a mosque. It was not dedicated to a saint named Sophia, but to the "Logos," or Second Person of the Trinity, called Hagia Sophia (Sacred Wisdom).

Sophist, Sophistry, Sophism, Sophisticator, etc. These words have quite run from their legitimate meaning. Before the time of Pythagoras (586-506 B.C.) the sages of Greece were called sophists (wise men). Pythagoras out of modesty called himself a philosopher (a wisdom-lover). A century later Protagoras of Abdera resumed the title, and a set of quibblers appeared in Athens who professed to answer any question on any subject, and took up the title discarded by the Wise Samian. From this movement sophos and all its family of words were applied to "wisdom falsely so called," and philo-sophos to the "modest search after truth."

Sophy, The. An old title of the rulers of Persia, first given to Shek Juneyd u Dien, founder of the Saffi dynasty (about 1500-1736).

Soppy. Mawkish (of people), ultra-sentimental (of stories, etc.). A soppy boy is one who is "tied to his mother's apron-strings."

Sorbonne. The institution of theology, science, and literature in Paris founded by Robert de Sorbon, Canon of Cambrai, in 1252. In 1808 the buildings, erected by Richelieu in the 17th century, were given to the University, and a great scheme of reconstruction was carried out in 1885. Since 1896 the Sorbonne has been the University of Paris.

Sordello (sôr del' ô). A Provençal troubadour (d. about 1255), mentioned a number of times by Dante in the Purgatorio, now remembered because of Browning's very obscure poem of this name (1840). It details, in a setting which shows the restless condition of northern Italy in the early 13th century, the conflict of a poet about the best way of making his influence felt, whether personally or by the power of song. Browning said of it:—

The historical decoration was purposely of no more importance than a background requires; and my stress lay on the incidents in the development of a soul; little else is worth study. I, at least, always thought so.

Tennyson's reference to Sordello is well known. He said he had done his best with it, but there were only two lines he understood—the first and the last—and they were both untrue. These are:—

Who will, may hear Sordello's story told.

Who would has heard Sordello's story told.

Sortes (sôr' ítz). A "heaped-up" (Gr. soros a heap) or cumulative syllogism, the predicate of one forming the subject of that which follows, the subject of the first being ultimately united with the predicate of the last. The following will serve as an example:—

All men who believe shall be saved.

All who are saved must be free from sin.

All who are free from sin are innocent in the sight of God.

All who are innocent in the sight of God are meet for heaven.

All who are meet for heaven will be admitted into heaven.

Therefore all who believe will be admitted into heaven.

The famous Sortes of Themistocles was: That his infant son commanded the whole world, proved thus:—

My infant son rules his mother.

His mother rules me.

I rule the Athenians.

The Athenians rule the Greeks.

The Greeks rule Europe.

And Europe rules the world.

Sorrow. The Seven Sorrows of the Virgin. See MARY.

Sort. Out of sorts. Not in good health and spirits. The French être dérangé explains the metaphor. If cards are out of sorts they are deranged, and if a person is out of sorts the health or spirits are out of order.

In printers' language sorts is applied to particular pieces of type considered as part of the fount, and a printer is out of sorts when he has run short of some particular letters, figures, stops, etc.

To run upon sorts. In printing, said of work which requires an unusual number of certain letters, etc.; as an index, which requires a disproportionate number of capitals.

Sortes (sôr' tēz) (Lat. sors, sortis, chance, lot). A species of divination performed by selecting passages from a book haphazard. Virgil's Aeneid was anciently the favourite work for the purpose (Sortes Virgilianæ), but the Bible (Sortes Biblicæ) has also been in common use.

The method is to open the book at random, and the passage you touch by chance with your finger is the oracular response. Severus consulted Virgil, and read these words: "Forget not thou, O Roman, to rule the people with royal sway." Gordianus, who reigned only a few days, hit upon this verse: "Fate only showed him on the earth, but suffered him not to tarry"; and Dr. Wellwood gives an instance respecting King Charles I and Lord Falkland. Falkland, to amuse the king, suggested this kind of augury, and the king hit upon iv, 615-620, the gist of which is that "evil wars would break out, and the king lose his life." Falkland, to laugh the matter off, said he would show his Majesty how ridiculously the "lot" would foretell the next fate, and he lighted on xi, 152-181, the lament of Evander for the untimely death of his son Pallas. King Charles soon after mourned over his noble friend who was slain at Newbury (1643).

In Rabelais (III, x) Panurge consults the Sortes Virgilianæ et Homerice on the burning question, whether or not he should marry. In Cornelius Agrippa's De Vanitate Scientiarum, c. iv, there is a passage violently reprobating the Sortes.

Sotadic Verse. See PALINDROME.

Soter (sô' tēr). Ptolemy I of Egypt (d. 283 B.C.) was given this surname, meaning the Preserver by the Rhodians because he compelled Demetrius to raise the siege of Rhodes (304 B.C.).

Sothic Period, Year. The Persian year consists of 365 days, so that a day is lost in four years, amounting in the course of 1,460 years to a year. This period of 1,460 years is called a sothic period (Gr. sothis, the dog-star, at whose rising it commences), and the reclaimed year made up of the bits is called a sothic year. See CANICULAR PERIOD.

Soul. Among the ancient Greeks the soul was the seat of the passions and desires, which animals have in common with man, and the spirit the highest and distinctive part of man. In 1 Thess. Paul says; "I pray God your whole spirit, soul, and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." See also Heb. iv, 12; 1 Cor. ii, 14 and 15; xv, 45, 46.

Heraclitus held the soul to be a spark of the stellar essence; scintilla stellaris essentia (Macrobius: Somnium Scipionis, i, 14).

Vital spark of heavenly flame!

Quit, oh quit this mortal frame.

POPE: The Dying Christian to his Soul.

Both the Greeks and Romans seemed to think that the soul made its escape with life out of the death-wound.

The Moslems say that the souls of the faithful assume the forms of snow-white birds, and nestle under the throne of Allah until the resurrection, and hold that it is necessary, when a man is bow-strung, to relax the rope a little before death occurs to let the soul escape.

In Egyptian hieroglyphics the soul is represented by several emblems, as a basket of fire, a heron, a hawk with a human face, and a ram.

All Souls' Day. November 2nd, the day following All Saints' Day, set apart by the Roman Catholic Church for a solemn service for the repose of the departed. In England it was formerly observed by ringing the soul bell (or passing-bell), by making and distributing soul cakes, blessing beans, etc.

Soul cakes. Cakes formerly given in Staffordshire, Cheshire, and elsewhere on All Souls' Day, to the poor who go a-souling, i.e. begging for soul cakes. The words used were—

Soul, soul, for soul-cake

Pray you, good mistress, a soul cake.

Sourdough (sour' dō). A miner, especially a prospector, in Alaska or Canada; an old-timer.

Sour Grapes. See GRAPES.

South-Sea Scheme or Bubble. A stock-jobbing scheme devised by Sir John Blunt, a lawyer, in 1710, and floated by the Earl of Oxford in the following year. The object of the company was to buy up the National Debt, and to be allowed the sole privilege of trading in the South Seas. Spain refused to give trading facilities, so the money was used in other speculative ventures and, by careful "rigging" of the market, £100 shares were run up to over ten times that sum. The bubble burst in 1720 and ruined thousands. The term is applied to any hollow scheme which has a splendid promise, but whose collapse will be sudden and ruinous. Cp. MISSISSIPPI BUBBLE.

Southcottians. The followers of Joanna Southcott (1750-1814), a domestic servant who became a religious fanatic and gave herself out as the "woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars." —(Rev. xii, 1).

Although 64 years old she was to be delivered of a son, the Shiloh of Gen. xlix, 10—

The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be

October 19th, 1814, was the date fixed for the birth; but no birth took place, and the expectant mother died of brain fever ten days later. She left a locked wooden box that was not to be opened until the time of a national crisis, and then only in the presence of all the bishops in England. Various attempts were made to persuade the episcopate to assemble for this purpose, during the Crimean War and again in World War I. At last it was opened in 1928 in the presence of one reluctant prelate, and found to contain some odds and ends including a horse pistol and a few unimportant papers. Among her 60 publications was The Book of Wonders (1813-14) containing her prophecies. The sect she founded still exists.

South Paw (U.S.A.). In baseball, a left-handed pitcher or any left-handed player in games generally. A boxer who puts up his guard with his right forward.

Sovereign. A strangely misspelled word (from Lat. superanus, supreme), the last syllable being assimilated to reign. French souverain is nearer the Latin; Ital., sovano; Span. soberano.

A gold coin of this name, value 22s. 6d., was issued by Henry VIII, and so called because he was represented on it in royal robes; but the modern sovereign of 20s. value was not issued till 1817. Just a hundred years later, during World War I, its issue was suspended in Britain and its place taken by paper Treasury Notes.

Sow (sou). A pig of my own sow. Said of that which is the result of one's own action.

A still sow. A cunning and selfish man; one wise in his own interest; one who avoids talking at meals that he may enjoy his food the better. So called from the old proverb, "The still sow eats the wash" or "draff."

We do not act that often jest and laugh,

'Tis old, but true, "Still swine eat all the draught."

Merry Wives of Windsor, iv, 2.

As drunk as David's sow. Very drunk indeed.

To get the wrong sow by the ear. To capture the wrong individual, to take the wrong end of the stick, hit upon the wrong thing.

To send a sow to Minerva. To teach your grandmother how to suck eggs, to instruct one more learned in the subject than yourself. From the old Latin proverb, Sus Minervam docet (a pig teaching Minerva), which meant the same thing.

You cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. See SILK.

See also PIG-IRON.

Spade. The spade of playing cards is so called from Span. espada, a sword, the suit in Spanish packs being marked with short swords; in French and British cards the mark—largely through the similarity in name—has been altered to something like the blade of a sharp-pointed spade.

Spade guinea. An English gold coin value 21s., minted 1787-99, so called because it bears a shield like the "spade" on playing cards on the reverse. The legend is M. B. F. et H. Rex F. D. B. L. D. S. R. I. A. T. et E.—Magnæ Britanniæ, Franciæ, et Hiberniæ Rex; Fidei Defensor; Brunsvicensis, Lunenburgensis Dux; Sacri Romani Imperii Archi Thesaurarius et Elector.

To call a spade a spade. To be straightforward, outspoken, and blunt, even to the point of rudeness; to call things by their proper names without any beating about the bush.

I have learned to call wickedness by its own terms: a fig a fig; and a spade a spade—JOHN KNOX.

This is a translation of Erasmus's rendering of the old Latin proverb—ficus ficus, ligonem ligonem vocat.

Spagyric (spà jir' ik). Pertaining to alchemy; the term seems to have been invented by Paracelsus. Alchemy is "the spagyric art," and an alchemist a "spagyrist."

Spagyric food. Cagliostro's name for the elixir of immortal youth.

Spain. See HISPANIA.

Castles in Spain. See CASTLE.

Patron saint of Spain. St. James the Greater, who is said to have preached the Gospel in Spain, where his relics are preserved at Compostella.

Spanish fly. The cantharis, a coleopterous insect used in medicine. Cantharides are dried and used externally as a blister and internally as a stimulant to the genito-urinary organs; they were formerly considered to act as an aphrodisiac.

Spanish moss. A plant of the family Bromeliaceæ which hangs in long grey festoons from the branches of trees, especially the live oak, in tropical and sub-tropical American forests.

Spanish worm. An old name for a nail concealed in a piece of wood, against which a carpenter jars his saw or chisel.

The Spanish Main. Properly, the northern coast of South America, going westward from the mouth of the Orinoco to the Isthmus of Panama, or a bit farther; the main-land bordering the Caribbean Sea, called by the Spanish conquerors Tierra Firme. The term is often applied, however, to the curving chain of islands forming the northern and eastern boundaries of the Caribbean Sea, beginning from Mosquito, near the isthmus, and including Jamaica, St. Domingo, the Leeward Islands, and the Windward Islands, to the coast of Venezuela in South America.

To walk Spanish. To walk on tiptoe, being lifted and pushed by a more powerful person. From the behaviour of the pirates of the Spanish Main towards their captives.

Span New. See SPICK.

Spaniel. The Spanish dog, from español, through the French.

Spanker. Used of a fast horse, also—colloquially—of something or someone that is an exceptionally fine specimen, a "stunner."

In nautical language the spanker is the fore-and-aft sail set upon the mizen-mast of a three-masted vessel, and the jigger-mast of a four-masted vessel. There is no spanker in a one- or two-masted vessel of any rig.

Spare the rod, etc. See ROD.

Spartacists. An extreme Socialist group in Germany that flourished between 1916 and 1919. It was founded by Karl Liebknecht who, with Rosa Luxemburg led an attempted revolution in January of the latter year, in the suppression of which they were both killed. The movement was finally crushed by Ebert's government in the April. The original Spartacus was a Thracian who commanded a band of insurgents in the third Servile war of Rome, 71 B.C.

Spartan. The inhabitants of ancient Sparta, one of the leading city-states of Greece, were noted for their frugality, courage, and stern discipline; hence, one who can bear pain unflinchingly is termed "a Spartan," a very frugal diet is "Spartan fare," etc. It was a Spartan mother who, on handing her son the shield he was to carry into battle, said that he must come back either with it or on it.

Spartan dog. A blood-hound; a blood-thirsty man.

O Spartan dog

More fell than anguish, hunger or the sea.

Othello, v. 2.

Spasmodic School. The. A name applied by Professor Aytoun to certain authors of the 19th century, whose writings were distinguished by forced conceits and unnatural style. The most noted are Bailey (author of Festus), Gerald Massey, Alexander Smith, and Sydney Dobell.

Spats. Short cloth or leather gaiters. The word comes from

Spatterdashes. Long gaiters, usually of cloth, worn to protect the stockings or trousers from mud. In military uniform they are generally waterproof and button or lace to some inches above the ankle.

Speak-easy. A place where alcoholic liquors are sold without a licence, or in some illegal way.

Speaker. The title of the presiding officer and official spokesman of the British House of Commons, the United States House of Representatives, and of some other legislative assemblies.

The Speaker of the House of Commons has autocratic and almost absolute power in the control of debates and internal arrangements of the House, etc.; he is elected by the members irrespective of party, and ceases to be a "party man," having no vote—except in cases of a tie, when he can give a casting vote. He holds office for the duration of that Parliament, but by custom (not law) is re-appointed unless he wishes to resign (in which case he goes to the House of Lords).

The Lord Chancellor is ex officio Speaker of the House of Lords.

To catch the Speaker's eye. The rule in the House of Commons is that the member whose rising to address the House is first observed by the Speaker is allowed precedence.

Speaking. A speaking likeness. A very good and lifelike portrait; one that makes you imagine that the subject is just going to speak to you.

Speaking heads. Fables and romance tell of a good many artificial heads that could speak (CP. BRAZEN HEAD); among the best known are:—

The statue of Memnon, in Egypt, which uttered musical sounds when the morning sun darted on it.

That of Orpheus, at Lesbos, which is said to have predicted the bloody death that terminated the expedition of Cyrus the Great into Scythia.

The head of Minos, fabled to have been brought by Odin to Scandinavia, and to have uttered responses.

The Brazen Head (q.v.) of Roger Bacon, and that of Gerbert, afterwards Pope Sylvester II (10th cent.).

An earthen head made by Albertus Magnus in the 13th century, which both spoke and moved. Thomas Aquinas broke it, whereupon the mechanist exclaimed; "There goes the labour of thirty years!"

Alexander's statue of Esculapius; it was supposed to speak, but Lucian says the sounds were uttered by a concealed man, and conveyed by tubes to the statue.

The "ear of Dionysius" communicated to Dionysius, Tyrant of Syracuse, whatever was uttered by suspected subjects shut up in a state prison. This "ear" was a large black opening in a rock, about 50 ft. high, and the sound was communicated by a series of channels not unlike those of the human ear.

They are not on speaking terms. Said of friends who have fallen out.

Spear. If a knight kept the point of his spear forward when he entered a strange land, it was a declaration of war; if he carried it on his shoulder with the point behind him, it was a token of friendship. In Ossian (Temora, i) Cairbar asks if Fingal comes in peace, to which Mor-annal replies: "In peace he comes not, king of Erin, I have seen his forward spear."

The spear of Achilles. See ACHILLES' SPEAR; ACHILLEA.

The spear of Ithuriel. See ITHURIEL.

The spear-side. The male line of descent, called by the Anglo-Saxons spere-healfe. CP. SPINDLE-SIDE.

To break a spear. To fight a tournament.

To pass under the spear. To be sold by auction, sold "under the hammer." Writing to Pepys (Aug. 12th, 1689) Evelyn speaks of "the noblest library that ever passed under the speare." The phrase is from the Latin sub hasta vendere.

Special Pleading. Quibbling; making your own argument good by forcing certain words or phrases from their obvious and ordinary meaning. A pleading in law means a written statement of a cause pro and con, and "special pleaders" are persons who have been called to the bar, but do not speak as advocates. They advise on evidence, draw up affidavits, state the merits and demerits of a cause, and so on. After a time most special pleaders go to the bar, and many get advanced to the bench.

Specie, Species, means literally "what is visible" (Lat. species, appearance). As things are distinguished by their visible forms, it has come to mean kind or class. As drugs and condiments at one time formed the most important articles of merchandise, they were called species—still retained in the French épices, and English spices. Again, as bank-notes represent money, money itself is called specie, the thing represented.

Spectacles. In cricket, when a player scores a "duck's egg" (i.e. nothing at all) in each of his two innings of one match, he is said to make "a pair of spectacles."

Spectre of the Brocken. An optical illusion, first observed on the Brocken (the highest peak of the Hartz range in Saxony), in which shadows of the spectators, greatly magnified, are projected on the mists about the summit of the mountain opposite. In one of De Quincey's opium-dreams there is a powerful description of the Brocken spectre.

Spectrum, Spectra, Spectre (Lat. specto, I behold). In optics a spectrum is the image of a sunbeam beheld on a screen, after refraction by one or more prisms. Spectra are the images of objects left on the eye after the objects themselves are removed from sight. A spectre is the apparition of a person no longer living or not bodily present.

Speculate (spek' ū lāt) means to look out of a watch-tower, to spy about (Lat. speculari). Metaphorically, to look at a subject with the mind's eye, to spy into it; in commerce, to purchase articles or shares which you expect will prove profitable.

Specularis lapis, what we should now call window-glass, was some transparent stone or mineral, such as mica.

Speculum Humanæ Salvationis (The Mirror of Human Salvation). A kind of extended Biblia Pauperum (q.v.) telling pictorially the Bible story from the fall of Lucifer to the Redemption of Man, with explanations of each picture in Latin rhymes. MS copies of the 12th century are known; but its chief interest is that it was one of the earliest of printed books, having been printed about 1467.

Speech. Parts of speech. See PART. Speech is silver (or silvern), silence is golden. An old proverb, said to be of oriental origin, pointing to the advantage of keeping one's own counsel. The Hebrew equivalent is "If a word be worth one shekel, silence is worth two."

Speech was given to man to disguise his thoughts. This epigram was attributed to Talleyrand by Barrère in his Memoirs; but though Talleyrand no doubt used it he was not its author. Voltaire, in his XIVth Dialogue (Le Chapon et la Poularde), had said—

Men use thought only as authority for their injustice, and employ speech only to conceal their thoughts.

Goldsmith, in The Bee, iii (1759), has—

The true use of speech is not so much to express our wants as to conceal them.

And Robert South (1634-1716) preaching on April 30th, 1676, said in his sermon—

Speech was given to the ordinary sort of men, whereby to communicate their mind, but to wise men, whereby to conceal it.

Spell. A turn of work done by a man or group of men in relief of another man or group; hence, the period of one's turn of work. The word was formerly applied to the gang itself, and is probably the A.S. spala, a substitute. Spell, in the sense of saying or writing the letters forming a word, is often used with the meaning to hint very broadly, especially of children.

A pretty good spell. A long bout or pull, as a "spell at the capstan," etc.

Spell ho! An exclamation to signify that the allotted time has expired, and men are to be relieved by another set.

To spell is to relieve another at his work.

Spellbinders. Orators who hold their audience spellbound, that is, fascinated, charmed, as though bound by a spell or magic incantation.

Potent was the spell that bound thee

Not unwilling to obey.

WORDSWORTH: Poems of the Imagination, xxxv.

The word came into use in America in the presidential election of 1888, and has been used of British political orators of persuasive eloquence.

Spencean Philanthropists. Disciples of Thomas Spence (1750-1814) who, in 1775, devised a system of land nationalization. The inhabitants of each parish would form a corporation and appoint local officials to collect rents, deduct expenses, and divide what was left among the parishioners. No tax or toll would be required beyond the rent. A day of rest would be allowed every five days. "Whether the title of King, President, Consul or the like is assumed by the head of the country is quite indifferent to me." A number of hot-headed and woolly-minded persons thought that this plan heralded the Millennium and in 1816 "The Society of Spencean Philanthropists" was founded. That year they arranged the Spa Fields Meeting, Bermondsey, which ended in a riot. The Cato Street Conspirators and other dangerous demagogues were disciples of Spence.

Spencer. Now applied to a close-fitting bodice worn by women, but formerly the name of an outer coat without skirts worn by men; so named from the second Earl Spencer (1758-1834.)

Spencerian Handwriting is the name given to a style of calligraphy introduced by Platt Rogers Spencer (1800-61), an American calligrapher. Written with a fine pen, with the down-strokes tapering from top to bottom and large loops, the writing has a forward slope and marked terminal flourishes. Spencer taught this style in many parts of U.S.A. and it is said to have had a marked influence on American calligraphy.

Spenserian Metre. The metre devised by Spenser (1592), founded on the Italian ottava rima, for his Faerie Queene. It is a stanza of nine iambic lines, all of ten syllables except the last, which is an Alexandrine. Only three different rhymes are admitted into a stanza, and these are disposed: a b a b b c b c c.

The stanza was used by Thomson (Castle of Indolence), Shenstone (Schoolmistress), Byron (Childe Harold), etc.

Spheres. In the Ptolemaic system of astronomy (q.v.) the earth, as the centre of the universe, was supposed to be surrounded by nine spheres of invisible space, the first seven carrying the "planets" as then known, viz., (1) Diana or the Moon, (2) Mercury, (3) Venus, (4) Apollo or the Sun, (5) Mars, (6) Jupiter, and (7) Saturn; the eighth, the Starry Sphere, carrying the fixed stars, and the ninth, the Crystalline Sphere, added by Hipparchus in the 2nd century B.C. to account for the precession of the equinoxes. Finally, in the Middle Ages, was added a tenth sphere, the Primum mobile (q.v.), a solid barrier which enclosed the universe and shut it off from Nothingness and the Empyrean. These last two spheres carried neither star nor planet.

They pass the planets seven, and pass the fixed [starry sphere],
And that crystalline sphere . . . and that First-Moved. MILTON: Paradise Lost, iii, 482.

The music, or harmony, of the spheres. Pythagoras, having ascertained that the pitch of notes depends on the rapidity of vibrations, and also that the planets move at different rates of motion, concluded that the planets must make sounds in their motion according to their different rates; and that, as all things in nature are harmoniously made, the different sounds must harmonize; whence the old theory of the "harmony of the spheres." Kepler has a treatise on the subject.

There's not the smallest orb which thou beholdest
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims.

Merchant of Venice, v, 1.

Plato says that a siren sits on each planet, who carols a most sweet song, agreeing to the motion of her own particular planet, but harmonizing with all the others. Hence Milton speaks of the "celestial syrens' harmony that sit upon the nine enfolded spheres." (Arcades.)

Sphinx (sfinks). A monster of ancient mythology; in Greece represented as having the head of a woman, the body of a lion, and winged; in Egypt as a wingless lion with the head and breast of a man.

The Grecian Sphinx was generally said to be the daughter of Typhon and Chimæra; she infested Thebes, setting the inhabitants a riddle and devouring all those who could not solve it. The riddle was—

What goes on four feet, on two feet, and three,
But the more feet it goes on the weaker it be?

and it was at length solved by Œdipus (q.v.) with the answer that it was a man, who as an infant crawls upon all-fours, in manhood goes erect on his two feet, and in old age supports his tottering legs with a staff. On hearing this correct answer the Sphinx slew herself, and Thebes was delivered.

The Egyptian sphinx is a typification of Ra, the sun god. The colossal statue of the reclining monster was old in the days of Cheops, when the Great Pyramid, near which it lies, was built. It is hewn out of the solid rock; its length is 140 ft., and its head 30 ft. from crown to chin.

Spick and Span New. Quite and entirely new. A spic is a spike or nail, and a span is a chip. So that a spick and span new ship is one in which every nail and chip is new. According to Dr. Johnson, who, in recording the term says it is one which he "should not have expected to have found authorized by a polite writer," span new is from A.S. spannan, to stretch, and was originally used of cloth newly extended or dressed at the cloth-maker's, and spick and span is newly extended on the spikes or tenters. He gives quotations from Samuel Butler, Bishop Burnet, and Dean Swift, but cannot help adding "it is however a low word."

Spider. There are many old wives' fables about spiders, the most widespread being that they are venomous. Shakespeare alludes to this more than once—

Let thy spiders, that suck up thy venom,
And heavy-gated toads lie in their way.
Richard II, iii, 2.

There may be in the cup
A spider steep'd, and one may drink, depart,
And yet partake no venom. Winter's Tale, ii, 1.
and in the examination into the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, one of the witnesses deposed "that the countess wished him to get the strongest poison that he could . . ." Accordingly he brought seven great spiders.

Other tales were that spiders would never spin a web on a cedar roof, and that fever could be cured by wearing a spider in a nutshell round the neck.

Spiders were credited with other medicinal virtues. A common cure for jaundice in country parts of England was to swallow a large live house-spider rolled up in butter, while in the south of Ireland a similar remedy was given for ague.

Yet another story was that spiders spin only on dark days:—

The subtle spider never spins
But on dark days, his slimy gins.

S. BUTLER: On a Nonconformist, iv.

Bruce and the spider. In 1305 Robert Bruce was crowned at Scone king of Scotland, but, being attacked by the English, retreated to Ireland, and all supposed him to be dead. While lying perdu in the little island of Rathlin he one day noticed a spider try six times to fix its web on a beam in the ceiling. "Now shall this spider (said Bruce) teach me what I am to do, for I also have failed six times." The spider made a seventh effort and succeeded; whereupon Bruce left the island (1307), collected 300 followers, landed at Carrick, and at midnight surprised the English garrison in Turnberry Castle; he next overthrew the Earl of Gloucester, and in two years made himself master of well-nigh all Scotland, which Edward III declared in 1328 to be an independent kingdom.

Frederick the Great and the spider. While Frederick II was at Sans Souci, he one day went into his ante-room, as usual, to drink a cup of chocolate, but set his cup down to fetch his handkerchief from his bedroom. On his return he found a great spider had fallen from the ceiling into his cup. He called for fresh chocolate, and next moment heard the report of a pistol. The cook had been suborned to poison the chocolate, and, supposing his treachery had been found out, shot himself. On the ceiling of the room in Sans Souci a spider has been painted (according to tradition) in remembrance of this story.

Mohammed and the spider. When Mohammed fled from Mecca he hid in a certain cave, with the Koreishites close upon him. Suddenly an acacia in full leaf sprang up at the mouth of the cave, a wood-pigeon had its nest in the branches, and a spider had woven its net between the tree and the cave. When the Koreishites saw this, they felt persuaded that no one could have entered recently, and went on.

Spigot. Spare at the spigot and spill at the bung. To be parsimonious in trifles and wasteful in great matters, like a man who stops his beer-tub at the vent-hole and leaves it running at the bung-hole.

Spike. Slang for the workhouse; to go on the spike is to become a workhouse inmate.

To get the spike. To get the needle. See NEEDLE.

To spike one's guns for him. To render his plans abortive, frustrate the scheme he has been laying, "draw his teeth." The allusion is to the old way of making a gun useless by driving a spike into the touch-hole.

To spike a drink. To add strong spirits to increase the alcoholic content.

Spill the Beans, To. To reveal a secret prematurely; to let the cat out of the bag, to upset the applecart.

Spilt milk. See CRY.

Spindle-side. The female line of descent (cp. SPEAR-SIDE). The spindle was the pin on which the thread was wound from the spinning-wheel.

Spinster. An unmarried woman.

The fleece which was brought home by the Anglo-Saxons in summer, was spun and woven into clothing by the female part of each family during the winter. King Edward the Elder commanded his daughters to be instructed in the use of the distaff. Alfred the Great, in his will, calls the female part of his family the spindle side; and it was a regularly received axiom with our forefathers, that no young woman was fit to be a wife till she had spun for herself a set of body, table, and bed linen. Hence the maiden was termed a spinner or spinster.

It is said that the heraldic lozenge, in which the armorial bearings of a woman are depicted instead of, in the case of a man, on a shield, originally represented a spindle. Among the Romans the bride carried a distaff, and Homer tells us that Kryseis was to spin and share the king's bed.

Spirit. Properly, the breath of life, from Lat. spiritus (spirare, to breathe, blow):—

And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul.—Gen. ii, 7.

Hence, life or the life principle, the soul; a disembodied soul (a ghost or apparition), or an immaterial being that never was supposed to have had a body (sprite), as a gnome, elf, or fairy; also, the temper or disposition of mind as animated by the breath of life, as in good spirits, high-spirited, a man of spirit.

The mediæval physiological notion (adopted from Galen) was that spirit existed in the body in three kinds, viz., (1) the Natural spirit, the principle of the "natural functions"—growth, nutrition, and generation, said to be a vapour rising from the blood and having its seat in the liver; (2) the Vital spirit, which arose in the heart by mixture of the air breathed in with the natural spirit and supplied the body with heat and life; and (3) the Animal spirit, which was responsible for the power of motion and sensation, and for the rational principle generally; this was a modification of the vital spirit, effected in the brain.

Spirit also came to mean any volatile or airy agent of essence; and hence, through the old alchemists, is still used of solutions in alcohol of a volatile principle and of any strong distilled alcoholic liquor. The alchemists named four substances only as "spirits," viz., mercury, arsenic, sal ammoniac, and sulphur:—

The first spirit quiksilver called is:

The second orpiment; the third I wis

Sal armoniac; and the ferth breemstoon.

CHAUCER: Canon's Yeoman's Prologue.

The Elemental spirits of Paracelsus and the Rosicrucians, i.e. those which presided over the four elements, were—the Salamanders (of fire), Gnomes (earth), Sylphs (air), and Undines (water).

To spirit away. To kidnap, abduct; to make away with speedily and secretly. The phrase first came into use in the 17th century, in connexion with kidnapping youths and transporting them to the West Indian plantations.

Spiritualism. The belief that communication between the living and the spirits of the departed can and does take place, usually through the agency of a specially qualified person (a medium) and often by means of rapping, table-turning, or automatic writing; the system, doctrines, practice, etc., arising from this belief. Hence Spiritualist, one who maintains or practises this belief.

In Philosophy Spiritualism—the antithesis of materialism—is the doctrine that the spirit exists as distinct from matter, or as the only reality.

Spit. Spitting for luck. Spitting was a charm against enchantment among the ancient Greeks and Romans. Pliny says it averted witchcraft, and availed in giving an enemy a shrewder blow.

Thrice on my breast I spit to guard me safe

From fascinating charms. Theocritus.

Countrymen spit for luck on a piece of money given to them; boxers spit on their hands, and costermongers on the first money they take in the day for the same reason.

Spital or Spittle. A hospital.

A spittle or hospitall for poore folks diseased; a spittle hospitall, or lazharhouse for lepers.—BARET: Alveaire (1580).

Hence Spitalfields, the site in London where, in 1197, a spital or almshouse was built in the fields by Walter Brune and his wife Rosia.

Spittle Sermons. Sermons preached formerly on Easter Monday and Tuesday at St. Mary Spital, Spitalfields, in a pulpit erected expressly for the purpose. Subsequently they were given at St. Bride's, and later at Christchurch, Newgate Street. Ben Jonson alludes to them in his Underwoods, lx.

Spitfire. An irascible person, whose angry words are like fire spit from the mouth of a fire-eater.

Spiv. A word that came into general usage during World War II. It is applied to a flashy fellow who lives by his wits without working, and, if possible, without committing actual crime. The word was sometimes used by race-course gangs in the 1890s; it comes from the slang "spiff," meaning smart and is still used in the word "spiffing."

Splay is a contraction of display (to unfold; Lat. dis-plico). A splay window is one in a V-shape, the external opening being very wide, to admit as much light as possible, but the inner opening being very small. A splay-foot is a foot displayed or turned outward. A splay-mouth is a wide mouth, like that of a clown.

Spleen, the soft vascular organ placed to the left of the stomach and acting on the blood, was once believed to be the seat of melancholy and ill-humour. The fern spleenwort was supposed to remove splenic disorders.

Splice. To marry. Very strangely, "splice" means to split or divide (Ger. speltssen, to split). The way it came to signify unite is this: Ropes' ends are first untwisted or split before the strands are interwoven. Joining two ropes together by interweaving their strands is "splicing" them. Splicing wood is joining two boards together, the term being borrowed from the sailor.

To splice the main brace. See MAIN BRACE.

Split. To give away one's accomplices, betray secrets, "peach."

To split hairs. See HAIR.

To split with laughter. To laugh uproariously or unrestrainedly; to "split one's sides."

To split the infinitive. To interpose some word between to and the verb, as "to thoroughly understand the subject." This construction is branded as a solecism by pedants, but it is as old as the English language, and there are few of our best writers who have not employed it.

Without permitting himself to actually mention the name.—MATTHEW ARNOLD: On Translating Homer, iii.

It becomes a truth again, after all, as he happens to newly consider it.—BROWNING: A Soul's Tragedy.

Implore them to partially enlighten her.—GEO. MEREDITH: The Egoist.

Spoils System. The practice in the United States by which the victorious party in an election rewards its supporters by appointments to public office. Adopted and approved by Andrew Jackson at his election as President in 1829. "To the victors belong the spoils."

Spoke. To put a spoke in one's wheel. To interfere with his projects and frustrate them; to thwart him. When solid wheels were used, the driver was provided with a pin or spoke, which he thrust into one of the three holes made to receive it, to skid the cart when it went down-hill.

Sponge. To throw up the sponge. Give up; confess oneself beaten. The metaphor is from boxing matches, for when a second tossed a sponge into the air it was a sign that his man was beaten.

To sponge on a man. To live on him like a parasite, sucking up all he has as a dry sponge will suck up water.

A sponger is a mean parasite who is always accepting the hospitality of those who will give it and never make any adequate return.

Sponging House. A house where persons arrested for debt were kept for twenty-four hours, before being sent to prison. They were generally kept by a bailiff, and the person lodged was "sponged" of all his money before leaving.

Sponsored Programme. A wireless programme which is sponsored, i.e. chosen and paid for, by a commercial company, which utilizes a few moments at the beginning and the end of the programme for advertising its own product.

Spoon. A simpleton, a shallow prating duffer used to be called a spoon, and hence the name came to be applied to one who indulged in foolish, sentimental love-making, and such a one is said to be spoony, and to be spoons on the girl.

In nautical phrase to spoon is to scud before the wind; and in sculling to dip the sculls so lightly in the water as to do little more than skim the surface.

Apostle spoons. See APOSTLE.

He hath need of a long spoon that eateth with the devil. You will want all your wits about you if you ally yourself with evil. Shakespeare alludes to this proverb in the Comedy of Errors, iv, 3; and again in the Tempest, ii, 2, where Stephano says: "Mercy! mercy! this is a devil . . . I will leave him, I have no long spoon."

Therefor behoveth hire a ful long spoon
That schal ete with a feend.

CHAUCER: Squire's Tale, 594.

To be born with a silver spoon in one's mouth.
See BORN.

Spoonerism. A ludicrous form of metathesis (q.v.) that consists of transposing the initial sounds of words so as to form some laughable combination; so called from the Rev. W. A. Spooner (1844-1930), Warden of New College, Oxford. Some of the best attributed to him are—"We all know what it is to have a half warmed fish within us" (for "half-formed wish"); "Yes, indeed; the Lord is a shoving leopard"; and "Kingkering Kongs their titles take." Sometimes the term is applied to the accidental transposition of whole words, as when the tea-shop waitress was asked for "a glass bun and a bath of milk."

Sport. To sport one's oak. See OAK.

The figurative meaning of to sport is to exhibit in public in a somewhat ostentatious way; a young man for instance, may sport a highly coloured pair of socks, a new fashion in hats, or a monocle.

Sporting Seasons in England. The lawful season for venery, which began at Midsummer and lasted to Holy Rood Day, used to be called the Time of Grace. The fox and wolf might be hunted from the Nativity to the Annunciation; the roebuck from Easter to Michaelmas; the roe from Michaelmas to Candlemas; the hare from Michaelmas to Midsummer; and the boar from the Nativity to the Purification.

The times are as follows: those marked thus (*) are fixed by Act of Parliament.

Black Game,* from August 20th to December 10th; but in Somerset, Devon, and New Forest, from September 1st to December 10th.

Blackcock, August 20th to December 10th.

Buck hunting, August 20th to September 17th.

Bustard,* September 1st to March 1st.

Red Deer hunted, August 20th, to September 30th.

Eels, (about) April 20th to October 28th.

Fox hunting, (about) October to Lady Day.

Fox Cubs, August 1st to the first Monday in November.

Grouse shooting,* August 12th to December 10th.

Hares, March 12th to August 12th.

Hind, hunted in October and again between April 10th and May 20th.

Oyster season, August 5th to May.

Partridge shooting,* September 1st to February 1st.

Pheasant shooting,* October 1st to February 1st.

Ptarmigan, August 12th to December 10th.

Quail, August 12th to January 10th.

Rabbits, between October and March. Rabbits, as vermin, are shot at any time.

Salmon,* February 1st to September 1st.

Salmon, rod fishing,* November 1st to September 1st.

Trout fishing, May 1st to September 10th.

Trout, in the Thames, April 1st to September 10th.

Woodcock, (about) November to January.

For Ireland and Scotland there are special game-laws.

N.B.—Game in England: hare, pheasant, partridge, grouse, and moor-fowl; in Scotland, same as England, with the addition of ptarmigan; in Ireland, same as England, with the addition of deer, black-game, landrail, quail, and bustard.

Spot. On the spot. At once; without having time to move away or do anything else; as—"He answered on the spot," immediately, without hesitation. A further colloquial meaning of on the spot is, in danger of death, in an embarrassing situation.

To knock spots off one. To excel him completely in something; originally an Americanism.

Spotting. The practice in the New Zealand settling days of buying up the land round all available creeks and streams, so that the adjoining territory would have no access to water and hence would find no buyer.

Spouse means one who has promised (Lat. sponsus, past part. of spondere to promise). In ancient Rome the friends of the parties about to be married met at the house of the woman's father to settle the marriage contract. This contract was called sponsalia (espousal); the man, sponsus, and the woman, sponsa.

The spouse of Jesus. St. Teresa of Avila (1515-82) was given this title by some of her contemporaries.

All thy good works . . . shall Weave a constellation
Of Crowns, with which the King thy spouse
Shall build up thy triumphant brows.

CRASHAW: Hymn to St. Theresa (1652).

Spout. To spout. To utter in a bombastic, declamatory manner; to declaim.

Up the spout. At the pawnbroker's. In allusion to the "spout" up which brokers send the articles ticketed. When redeemed they return down the spout—i.e. from the storeroom to the shop.

Sprat. To throw a sprat to catch a mackerel. To give a small thing in the hope of getting something much more valuable.

Spread-eagle. The "eagle displayed" of heraldry, i.e. an eagle with legs and wings extended, the wings being elevated. It is the device of the United States.

In the navy a man was said to be spread-eagled when he was lashed to the rigging for flogging, with outstretched arms and legs.

Spread-eaglesm in a United States citizen is very much the counterpart of the more aggressive and bombastic forms of Jingoism (q.v.) in the Briton.

Spread-eagle oratory. "A compound of exaggeration, effrontery, bombast, and extravagance, mixed with metaphors, platitudes, threats and irreverent appeals flung at the Almighty." (North American Review, November, 1858.)

Springers. The Wiltshire Regiment, raised in 1758, and so nicknamed from its speed of movement during the American War of Independence.

Spring Tide. The tide that springs or leaps or swells up. These full tides occur a day or two after the new and full moon, when the attraction of both sun and moon act in a direct line.

Spruce. Smart, dandified. The word is from the old Fr. Pruce (Ger. Preussen), Prussia, and was originally (16th cent.) applied to Prussian leather of which particularly neat and smart-looking jerkins were made.

And after them, came, syr Edward Haward, then admiral, and with him sir Thomas Parre, in doublets of Crimosin velvet, voyded lowe on the backe, and before to the cannell bone, laced on the breastes with chaynes of silver, and over that shorte clokes of Crimosyn satyne, and on their heades hattes after dauncers fashion, with fesauntes fethers in theim; They were appareyled after the fashion of Prusia or Spruce.—Hall's Chronicle: Henry VIII, year 1 (1542).

Spruce beer is made from the leaves of the spruce fir, this being a translation of the German name of the tree, Sprossen-fichte, literally "sprouts-fir."

Spunging House. See SPONGING.

Spur. On the spur of the moment. Instantly; without stopping to take thought.

Spur money. A small fine formerly imposed on those who entered a church wearing spurs, because of the interruption caused to divine service by their ringing. It was collected by the choir-boys or the beadles.

The Battle of Spurs. A name given to the battles of Guinegate (1513) and Courtrai (1302). The former, between Henry VIII and the Duc de Longueville, was so called because the French used their spurs in flight more than their swords in fight; and the battle of Courtrai because the victorious Flemings gathered from the field more than 700 gilt spurs, worn by French nobles slain in the fight.

To dish up the spurs. In Scotland, during the times of the Border feuds, when any of the great families had come to the end of their provisions the lady of the house sent up a pair of spurs for the last course, to intimate that it was time to put spurs to the horses and make a raid upon England for more cattle.

To ride whip (or switch) and spur. To ride with all possible speed: to trample down obstacles ruthlessly.

To win his spurs. To gain the rank of knighthood. When a man was knighted, the person who dubbed him presented him with a pair of gilt spurs.

Spy Wednesday. A name given in Ireland to the Wednesday before Good Friday, when Judas bargained to become the spy of the Jewish Sanhedrin (Matt. xxvi, 3-5, 14-16).

Squab. Short and fat; plump; a person, cushion, etc., like this (a fat woman is squabba in Swedish). A young pigeon—especially an unfledged one—is called a squab, and a pie of mutton, apples, and onions is called a squab pie in some parts of the country.

Cornwall squab-pie, and Devon white-pot brings,
And Leicester beans and bacon, fit for kings.

KING: Art of Cookery.

Poet Squab. So Rochester called Dryden, who was very corpulent.

Squad, Squadron. See AWKWARD SQUAD.

Squalls. Look out for squalls. Expect to meet with difficulties. A nautical term, a squall being a succession of sudden and violent gusts of wind (Ice. skvata).

Square. On the square. Straight and above board, honest. Also said of a Freemason, with allusion to the Masonic emblem of a square and compasses.

To square a person. To bribe him, or to pay him for some extra trouble he has taken.

To square the circle. To attempt an impossibility. The allusion is to the impossibility of exactly determining the precise ratio between the diameter and the circumference of a circle, and thus constructing a circle of the same area as a given square. Popularly it is 3.14159 . . . the next decimals would be 26537, but the numbers would go on ad infinitum.

To square up to a person. To put oneself in a fighting attitude.

Are you such fools

To square for this?

Titus Andronicus, ii, 1.

Squatter. Used first in the U.S.A. of a person settling on land without a legal title. Thence went to Australia in the early 19th century to describe ex-convicts who established themselves on unoccupied land and stole cattle from their more honest neighbours to enrich themselves.

A squatter . . . is the horror of all his honest neighbours.—CHARLES DARWIN: Voyage of the Beagle.

Squeers. See DOTHEBOYS HALL.

Squib. A political joke, printed and circulated especially at election times against a candidate, with intent to bring him into ridicule, and to influence votes.

Allowing that the play succeeds, there are a hundred squibs flying all abroad to show that it should not have succeeded.—GOLDSMITH: Polite Learning.

Squinancy. See QUINSY.

Squintum, Doctor. George Whitefield (1714-70), so called by Foote in his farce The Minor.

Theodore Hook applied the sobriquet to Edward Irving the preacher (1792-1834), who had an obliquity of the eyes.

Squire. In mediæval times a youth of gentle birth attendant on a knight (see ESQUIRE); now a landed proprietor, the chief country gentleman of a place.

Squire of dames. Any cavalier who is devoted to ladies. Spenser, in his Faerie Queene, introduces the "squire," and records his adventures.

Stabat Mater (sta' bāt ma' ter (Lat., The Mother was standing). The Latin hymn reciting the Seven Sorrows of the Virgin at the Cross, so called from its opening words, forming part of the service during Passion week, in the Roman Catholic Church. It was composed by the Franciscan Jacopone da Todi (1220-1306), and has been set to music by Pergolese, Rossini, Haydn, etc.

Stable. Locking the stable door after the horse is stolen. Taking precautions after the mischief is done.

Staff. I keep the staff in my own hand. I keep possession; I retain the right. The staff was the ancient sceptre, and therefore, figuratively, it means power, authority, dignity, etc.

Give up your staff, sir, and the king his realm.

2 Henry VI, ii, 3.

The staff of life. Bread, which is the support of life.

"Bread," says he, "dear brothers, is the staff of life."—SWIFT: Tale of a Tub, iv.

Shakespeare says, "The boy was the very staff of my age." The allusion is to a staff which supports the feeble in walking.

To put down one's staff in a place. To abide for a while, to set down one's staff, as a traveller at an inn. The phrase was first used by Thomas Adams (fl. 1612-53) "the prose Shakespeare of Puritan theologians."

To strike staff. To lodge for the time being.

Stafford. He has had a treat in Stafford Court. He has been thoroughly cudgelled, a pun on the word staff, a stick. The French have a similar phrase: Il a été au festin de Martin Baston (he has been to Jack Drum's entertainment).

Similarly, Stafford law is club law—a good beating.

Stag. The reason why a stag symbolizes Christ is from the ancient idea that by its breath it draws serpents from their holes, and then tramples them to death. (Pliny: Natural History, viii, 50.)

Stag in Christian art. The attribute of St. Julian Hospitaller, St. Felix of Valois, and St. Aidan. When it has a crucifix between its horns it alludes to the legend of St. Hubert. When luminous it belongs to St. Eustachius.

Stag Line. At American dances, a number of extra men guests who stand at the edge of the dance-floor, without partners, but having the privilege of breaking in on any dancing couple and claiming the girl as a partner.

Stag party. A gathering of men only.

Stags. In Stock Exchange phraseology, are persons who apply for new shares, etc., on allotment, not because they wish to hold the shares, but because they hope to sell the allotment at a premium.

Stagirite or Stagyrīte (stāj' i rīt). Aristotle, who was born at Stagira, in Macedon (4th cent. B.C.).

In one rich soul

Plato, the Stagyrīte, and Tully joined.

THOMSON: Summer, 1541.

And rules as strict his laboured work confine

As if the Stagirite o'erlooked each line.

POPE: Essay on Criticism.

Stakhanovism (stāk ān 'ō vizm). Alexei Stakhanov, a Donetz coal miner, discovered in the 1930s that by concentrating on one aspect of his job and rationalizing the distribution of his work he could increase his daily output of coal by a substantial quantity. This aroused enthusiastic emulation among the younger and more skilled workers of his own and other trades, and was raised into a serious cult by the government.

Stalemate. To stalemate a person. To bring him to a standstill, render his projects worthless or abortive. The phrase is from chess, stalemate being the position in which the king is the only movable piece and he, though not in check, cannot move without becoming so. Stale in this word is probably from O.Fr. estal (our stall), a fixed position.

Stalingrad (sta' lin grad), formerly Tsaritsyn, an important railway centre and manufacturing town on the Volga, in the S.E. Soviet Union. In 1917 Stalin defended Tsaritsyn against the White Army and its name was changed to commemorate the incident. In World War II Stalingrad was attacked by the Germans in their Caucasus drive in August 1942, but the Russians made a gallant defence that ended (Feb., 1943) in the capitulation of the Germans under Field-Marshal Paulus. From that time onward the Nazi offensive in Russia was turned into a retreat and eventually a rout.

Stalking-horse. A mask to conceal some design; a person put forward to mislead; a sham. Sportsmen often used to conceal themselves behind horses, and go on stalking step by step till they got within shot of the game.

He uses his folly like a stalking-horse, and under the presentation of that he shoots his wit.—As You Like It, v, 4.

Stammerer, The. Louis II of France, le Bègue (846, 877-9).

Michael II, Emperor of the East (820-829).
Notker of St. Gall (830-912).

Stamp. 'Tis of the right stamp.—has the stamp of genuine merit. A metaphor taken from current coin, which is stamped with a recognized stamp and superscription.

I weigh the man, not his title; 'tis not the king's stamp can make the metal heavier or better.—WYCHERLY: The Plain Dealer, i, 1 (1677).

The rank is but the guinea stamp;

The man's the gold for a' that!

BURNS: Is There, for Honest Poverty?

Stand. To be at a stand. To be in doubt as to further progress, perplexed at what to do next.

To let a thing stand over. To defer consideration of it to a more favourable opportunity.

To stand by. To be ready to give assistance in case of need. A stand-by is a person or thing on which one can confidently rely.

To stand for a child. To be sponsor for it; to stand in its place and answer for it.

To stand in with. To go shares; also, to have an understanding or community of interests with.

To stand it out—persist in what one says. A translation of "persist" (Lat. per-sisto or per-sto).

To stand off and on. A nautical phrase for tacking in and out along the shore.

To stand Sam, stand to reason, stand treat, etc. See these words.

To stand to one's guns. To persist in a statement; not to give way. A military phrase.

To stand up for. Support, take his (or its) part.

To stand up for one's privilege or on punctilios. Quietly to insist on one's position, etc., being recognized; this is the Latin insisto.

Stand-in. In motion-picture parlance a substitute for a film star who takes his or her place during the preparations for lighting, etc.; performs any really dangerous stunts the part demands; and in general relieves the star of all but the glamorous, romantic, or publicity-value work of the part.

Standing orders. Rules or instructions constantly in force, especially those by-laws of the Houses of Parliament for the conduct of proceedings which stand in force till they are rescinded or suspended. Their suspension is generally caused by a desire to hurry through a Bill with unusual expedition.

The Standing Fishes Bible. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Stand-offish. Unsociable, rather contemptuously reserved.

Standard. A banner as the distinctive emblem of a Royal House, an army, or a nation, etc. The word first came into use in England in connexion with the Battle of the Standard (see below), in telling of which Richard of Hexham (about 1139) says that the standard (a ship's mast with flags at the top) was so called because "it was there that valour took its stand to conquer or die." The word is, however, from Lat. extendere, to stretch out, through O.Fr. estandard.

Standards were formerly borne by others than royalties and nations, and varied in size according to the rank of the bearer. Thus, that of an emperor was 11 yards in length; of a king, 9 yards; of a prince, 7 yards; of a marquis, 6½ yards; of an earl, 6 yards; of a viscount or baron, 5 yards; of a knight-banneret, 4½ yards; of a baronet, 4 yards. They generally contained the arms of the bearer, his cognizance and crest, his motto or war-cry, and were fringed with his livery.

Standard is also applied to a measure of extent, weight, value, etc., which is established by law or custom as an example or criterion for others; and, in figurative use from this, to any criterion or principle, as "The standard of political rectitude." The weights and measures were formerly known as "the king's standard," as being official and recognized by royal authority.

In uses such as an electric-light standard (the lamp-post), standard rose (i.e. one that stands on its own stem and is not trained to a wall or espalier), etc., the word is the result of confusion with stand.

The Battle of the Standard, between the English and the Scots, at Cuton Moor, near Northallerton, in 1138. Here David I, fighting on behalf of Matilda, was defeated by King Stephen's army under Raoul, Bishop of Durham, and Thurstan, Archbishop of York. It received its name from a ship's mast erected on a wagon, and placed in the centre of the English army; the mast displayed the banner of St. Peter of York, St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfred of Ripon. On the top was a little casket containing the consecrated Host.

The gold standard. A monetary standard based only on the value of gold.

The standard of living. A conventional term to express the supposed degree of comfort or luxury usually enjoyed by a man, a family, or a nation: this may be high or low according to circumstances.

Stang. To ride the stang. At one time a man who ill-treated his wife was made to sit on a stang (A.S. stæng, a pole) hoisted on men's shoulders. On this uneasy conveyance the "stanger" was carried in procession amidst the hootings and jeerings of his neighbours. Cp. SKIMMINGTON.

Stanhope (stän'öp). The Stanhope lens, a cylindrical lens with spherical ends of different radii, and the Stanhope press, the first iron printing press to be used (1798), are so called from the inventor, Charles, 3rd Earl of Stanhope (1753-1816).

The light open-seated carriage, with two or four wheels, called a Stanhope, gets its name from Fitzroy Stanhope (1787-1864), for whom the first of these conveyances was made.

Stannaries, The. The tin-mining districts of Cornwall and Devon (Lat. stannum, tin), which, from the earliest times to 1752 had their own parliament, consisting of twenty-four stannators, convened by the Lord Warden to the Duke of Cornwall. Until 1896 the administration of justice among the miners and others of these districts was in the hands of Stannary Courts, but at this date the business was transferred by Act of Parliament to the ordinary County Court.

Star. Figuratively applied to a specially prominent film or other actor, of either sex, etc., hence star part, the part taken by a leading actor, star turn, etc.

In ecclesiastical art a number of saints may be recognized by the star depicted with them; thus, St. Bruno bears one on his breast; St. Dominic, St. Humbert, St. Peter of Alcantara, one over their head, or on their forehead, etc.

A star of some form constitutes part of the insignia of every order of knighthood; the Star and Garter, a common inn sign, being in reference to the Most Noble Order of the Garter.

The stars were said by the old astrologers to have almost omnipotent influence on the lives and destinies of man (cp. Judges v, 20—"The stars in their courses fought against Sisera"), and to this old belief is due a number of phrases still common, as—Bless my stars! You may thank your lucky stars, star-crossed (not favoured by the stars, unfortunate), to be born under an evil star, etc.

She made it plain, that Human Passion
Was order'd by Predestination;
That, if weak women went astray,
Their Stars were more in Fault than They.

PRIOR: Hans Carvel.

His star is in the ascendant. He is in luck's way; said of a person to whom some good fortune has fallen and who is very prosperous. According to astrology, those leading stars which are above the horizon at a person's birth influence his life and fortune; when those stars are in the ascendant, he is strong, healthy, and lucky; but when they are in the descendant below the horizon, his stars do not shine on him, he is in the shade and subject to ill-fortune. Cp. HOUSES, ASTROLOGICAL.

I'll make you see stars! "I'll put you through it"; literally, will give you such a blow in the eye with my fist that, when you are struck, you'll experience the optical illusion of seeing brilliant streaks, radiating and darting in all directions.

Star Chamber. A court of civil and criminal jurisdiction at Westminster, abolished in 1641, and notorious for its arbitrary proceedings, its chief activity being the punishment of such offences as the law had made no provision for.

So called either because the ceiling or roof was decorated with gilt stars, or because it was the chamber where the "starrrs" or Jewish documents were kept.

It is well known that, before the banishment of the Jews by Edward I, their contracts and obligations were denominated . . . starra or stars. . . . The room in the exchequer where the chests . . . were kept was . . . the star-chamber—BLACKSTONE: Commentaries, vol. ii, bk. iv, p. 266.

Star of Bethlehem. A bulbous plant of the lily family (Ornithogallum umbellatum), with star-shaped white flowers. The French peasants call it La dame d'onze heures, because it opens at eleven o'clock.

Star of David. A large yellow cloth star which Jews and persons of Jewish descent were forced to wear on their clothes under the Nazi and Fascist regimes. To express his disapproval of this racial indignity King Christian X of Denmark himself wore a Star of David during the German occupation of his country.

Star of India. A British order of knighthood, The Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, instituted in 1861 by Queen Victoria as a reward for services in and for India and a means of recognizing the loyalty of native rulers. Its motto is "Heaven's Light our Guide."

Stars and Bars. The flag of the eleven Confederate States of America who broke away from the Union in 1860. It consisted of two broad horizontal red bars with a narrow white bar between them; in the top left corner a blue union bearing eleven white stars arranged in a circle.

Stars and Stripes or the Star-spangled Banner, the flag of the United States of North America. The stripes are emblematic of the original thirteen States, and the stars—of which there are now forty-eight—of the States that now constitute the Union.

The first flag of the United States, raised by Washington June 2, 1776, consisted of thirteen stripes, alternately red and white, with a blue canton emblazoned with the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew.

In 1777 Congress ordered that the canton should have thirteen white stars in a blue field.

In 1794 (after the admission of Vermont and Kentucky) the stripes and stars were each increased to fifteen.

In 1818 it was decided that the original thirteen stripes should be restored, and stars added to signify the States in the union.

The flag preceding 1776 represented a coiled rattlesnake with thirteen rattles, and the motto Don't tread on me. This was an imitation of the Scotch thistle and the motto Nemo me impune lacessit.

Oh! say, does that star-spangled banner yet wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?
F. S. KEY.

Starboard and Larboard. Star- is the Anglo-Saxon steor, rudder, bord, side; meaning the right side of a ship (looking forwards). Lar- board, for the left-hand side, is now obsolete, and "port" is used instead. The word was earlier leereboard (A.S. lære, empty) that side being clear as the steersman stood on the star (steer) board.

Starvation Dundas. Henry Dundas, Horace Lord Melville (1740-1811) was so called by Walpole, because when the Opposition denounced the Bill for restraining trade and commerce with the New England colonies (1775) on the ground that it would cause a famine in which the innocent would suffer with the guilty, he said that he was "afraid" the Bill would not have this effect. The word "starvation" was first used by Dundas.

Starved With Cold. Half dead with cold (A.S. steorfan, to die).

States, The. A common term for the United States of America.

States General. The supreme legislative assembly of France before the Revolution of 1789. It was only summoned as a last resort, prior to 1789 not having been called since 1614. It consisted of the three Estates of the realm, nobles, clergy, and the Third Estate (Tiers état) or commoners. The name is still applied to the parliament of the kingdom of the Netherlands.

Station. This word with the meaning of a place where people assemble for a specific duty or purpose has many applications; e.g. a railway station (U.S.A. depot); a police station, lifeboat station, etc. In Australia it was used as early as 1830 in the sense of a cattle farm or ranch. Thus, station black, an aboriginal; station super, a manager; station mark, a brand; station jack, a sort of meat pudding.

The Stations of the Cross; known as the via Calvaria or via Crucis. Each station represents, by fresco, picture, or otherwise, some incident in the passage of Christ from the judgment hall to Calvary, and at each prayers are offered up in memory of the event represented. They are as follows:—

- (1) The condemnation to death.
- (2) Christ is made to bear His cross.
- (3) His first fall under the cross.
- (4) The meeting with the Virgin.
- (5) Simon the Cyrenean helps to carry the cross.
- (6) Veronica wipes the sacred face.
- (7) The second fall.
- (8) Christ speaks to the daughters of Jerusalem.
- (9) The third fall.
- (10) Christ is stripped of His garments.
- (11) The nailing to the cross.
- (12) The giving up of the Spirit.
- (13) Christ is taken down from the cross.
- (14) The deposition in the sepulchre.

Stator (stā' tōr) (Lat., the stopper or arrester). When the Romans fled from the Sabines, they stopped at a certain place and made terms with the victors. On this spot they afterwards built a temple to Jupiter, and called it the temple of Jupiter Stator or Jupiter who caused them to stop in their flight.

Here, Stator Jove and Phœbus, god of verse
The votive tablet I suspend. PRIOR.

Statute (Lat. statutum, from statuere, to cause to stand, the same word, etymologically, as statue). A law enacted by a legislative body, an Act of Parliament; also laws enacted by the king and council before there were any regular parliaments. Hence, a statute mile, a statute ton, etc., is the measure as by law established and not according to local custom.

On the statute book. Included among the laws of the nation: the statute book is the whole body of the laws.

Statute fair. A mop fair. See MOP.

Steaks, Sublime Society of the. See BEEFSTEAK CLUB, THE.

Steal. One man may steal a horse, but another must not look over the hedge. See HORSE.

To steal a march on one. To obtain an advantage by stealth, as when an army appears unexpectedly before an enemy.

Stolen sweets are always sweeter. Things procured by stealth, and game illicitly taken, have the charm of illegality to make them the more palatable. Solomon says, "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant" (Prov. ix, 17).

From busie cooks we love to steal a bit
Behind their backs and that in corners eat;
Nor need we here the reason why entreat;
All know the proverb, "Stolen bread is sweet."
History of Joseph, n. d.

In one of the songs in Act iii, sc. iv, of Randolph's Amyntos (1638) are the lines:—

Furto cuncta magis bella,
Furto dulcor Puella,
Furto omnia decora,
Furto poma dulciora, which were translated by Leigh Hunt as:—

Stolen sweets are always sweeter,
Stolen kisses much completer,
Stolen looks are nice in chapels,
Stolen, stolen, be your apples.

Steelyard. A place (formerly a yard or enclosure) on the Thames just above London Bridge, where the Hanse merchants had their depot. The name is a mistranslation of Ger. staalhof, sample yard, staal meaning both sample and steel.

Steelyard, the weighing machine with unequal arms, in which the article to be weighed is hung from the shorter arm and a weight moved along the other till they balance, is named from the metal and the measure (A.S. gyrd, gerd, a stick).

Steenie. A nickname given by James I to the handsome George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. The allusion is to Acts vi, 15, where those who looked on Stephen the martyr "saw his face as it had been the face of an angel."

Steeplechase. A horse-race across fields, hedges, ditches, and other obstacles. The term arose in the late 18th century from a party of foxhunters agreeing, on their return from an unsuccessful chase, to race in a direct line to the village church, the steeple of which was in sight, regardless of anything that happened to lie in the way.

For the principal English steeplechases, see RACES.

Steeple house. The old Puritan epithet for a church.

Stentor (sten' tōr). The voice of a Stentor. A very loud voice. Stentor was a Greek herald in the Trojan war. According to Homer (Iliad

v. 783), his voice was as loud as that of fifty men combined; hence stentorian, loud voiced.

Step-. A prefix used before father, mother, brother, sister, son, daughter, etc., to indicate that the person spoken of is a relative only by the marriage of a parent, and not by blood (A.S. stéop, connected with astieped, bereaved). Thus, a man who marries a widow with children becomes stepfather to those children, and if he has children by her these and those of the widow's earlier marriage are stepbrothers or stepsisters. The latter are also called half-brothers and half-sisters; but some make a distinction between the terms, half-brother being kept for what we have already defined as a stepbrother, this latter term being applied only between the children of former marriages when both parents have been previously married.

I feel like a stepchild. Said by one who is being left out of the fun or getting none of the titbits. Step-children are proverbially treated by the step-parent with somewhat less consideration than the others.

Stephen, St. The first Christian martyr—the "protomartyr." He was accused of blasphemy and stoned to death (Acts vii, 58). He is commemorated on December 26th; the name means "wreath" or "crown" (Gr. stephanos).

Fed with St. Stephen's bread. Stoned.

The Crown of St. Stephen. The crown of Hungary, this St. Stephen being the first king of Hungary (1000-38). He was a pagan, born at Gran about 969, and was converted to Christianity about 995. During his reign the faith became firmly established in his kingdom. He was canonized by Benedict IX shortly after his death, and is commemorated on September 2nd.

If Hungarian independence should be secured through the help of Prince Napoleon, the Prince himself should receive the crown of St. Stephen.—Kossuth: Memoirs of my Exile (1880).

Sterling, when applied to coins and metal, denotes that they are of standard value (92.5 parts of silver to 7.5 of copper or other metal), genuine; hence applied figuratively to anything of sound, intrinsic worth, as A man of sterling qualities. The word—first met with about the early 12th century—has been held to be a corruption of Easterlings, the Hanse merchants trading with England; but this is unlikely, and the suggestions are that it is either steorling, the coin with a star, some of the early Norman coins having a small star on them, or the bird starling, some of Edward the Confessor's coins bearing four martlets.

Stern. To sit at the stern; At the stern of public affairs. Having the management of public affairs. The stern is the steorne, or steering-place, hence the helm.

Sit at chiefest stern of public weal.

1 Henry VI, i, 1.

Sternhold and Hopkins. The old metrical version of the Psalms that used to be bound up with the Book of Common Prayer and sung in churches. They were mainly the work of Thomas Sternhold (d. 1549) and John Hopkins (d. 1570). The completed version appeared in 1562.

Mistaken choirs refuse the solemn strain
Of ancient Sternhold.—CRABBE: Borough.

Stet (Lat., let it stand). An author's or editor's direction to the printer to cancel a correction previously made in a MS., proof, etc.

Stew. In a stew. In a fix, a flurry; in a state of mental agitation.

Irish stew. A dish made by stewing together meat, onions, and potatoes. Called "Irish" from the predominance of potatoes.

To stew in one's own juice. To suffer the natural consequences of one's actions, to reap as you have sown. Chaucer has:—

In his own gress I made him frie,
For anger and for very jealousy.

Wife of Bath's Tale (Prologue).

The Russian ambassador, when Louis Philippe fortified Paris, remarked, if ever again Paris is in insurrection, it "can be made to stew in its own gravy (jus)"; and Bismarck, at the siege of Paris, in 1871, said, the Germans intend to leave the city "to seethe in its own milk."

Stick. An old stick-in-the-mud. A dull, unprogressive old fogey.

It sticks out a mile! Said to one who is trying to conceal some very obvious fault, disability, undesirable characteristic, etc., concerning that; as, "Anyone can see he's a welsher—it sticks out a mile!"

Over the sticks. Over the hurdles; hence, a hurdle-race, or steeplechase.

The policy of the big stick. Threats, with some show of warlike attitude to back them up; and the same as "rattling the sword in the scabbard." The phrase was a favourite one with President Theodore Roosevelt.

The sticking-place. The point at which a screw becomes tight; hence, the point aimed at. Shakespeare's use of the word is probably an allusion from the peg of a musical instrument, which is not much use unless it is actually at the "sticking-place."

We fail!

But screw your courage to the sticking-place,
And we'll not fail. Macbeth, i, 7.

The wrong end of the stick. Not the true facts; a distorted version. To have got hold of the wrong end of the stick is to have misunderstood the story.

To cut one's stick. See CUT.

To stick at nothing. To be heedless of all obstacles in accomplishing one's desire; to be utterly unscrupulous.

To stick it up. Old slang for leaving one's "score" at the tavern to be paid later; a note of it was stuck, or chalked up, at the back of the door.

To stick up. Australian for to waylay and rob a coach, etc.; also in common use for rarding a bank and so on in daylight, the raiders closing the doors and covering all present with revolvers telling them to "stick 'em up," or hold up their hands above their heads.

Stuck up. Said of pretentious people who give themselves airs, nobodies who assume to be somebodies. The allusion is to the peacock, which sticks up its train to add to its "importance" and "awe down" antagonists.

To stare like a stuck pig. See PIG.

Stickit. A Scotticism for "stuck (stick-ed) half-way," as a stickit job, one that is unfinished or unsatisfactory; hence, applied to persons who have given up their work through lack of means or capacity or some other reason, as a stickit minister, one who has failed to get a pastoral charge, or to obtain preferment.

Stickler. A stickler over trifles. One particular about things of no moment. Sticklers were the umpires in tournaments, or seconds in single combats, very punctilious about the minutest points of etiquette. The word is connected with A.S. stihhtan, to arrange, regulate.

Stiff. Slang for a corpse; also for a horse that is sure to lose in a race; also (with reference to the stiff interest exacted by moneylenders) an I O U, a bill of acceptance.

His "stiff" was floating about in too many directions, at too many high figures.—OUIDA: Under Two Flags, ch. vii.

Stigmata (stig'mā tā). Marks developed on the body of certain persons, which correspond to some or all of the wounds received by our Saviour in His trial and crucifixion. It is a well-known psychological phenomenon and has been demonstrated in many modern instances. From Gr. stigma, the brand with which slaves and criminals in ancient Greece and Rome were marked; hence our verb stigmatize, to mark as with a brand of disgrace.

Among those who are said to have been marked with the stigmata are—

(1) MEN. St. Paul, who said "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus" (Gal. vi, 17); Angelo del Paz (all the marks); Benedict of Reggio (the crown of thorns), 1602; Carlo di Saeta (the lance-wound); Francis of Assisi (all the marks), September 15th, 1224; and Nicholas of Ravenna.

(2) WOMEN. Bianca de Gazeran; Catharine of Siena; Catharine di Raconiscon (the crown of thorns), 1583; Cecilia di Nobili of Nocera 1655; Clara di Pugny (mark of the spear), 1514; "Estatica" of Caldaro (all the marks), 1842; Gabriella da Piezolo of Aquila (the spear-mark), 1472; Hieronyma Carvaglio (the spear-mark, which bled every Friday); Joanna Maria of the Cross; Maria Razzi of Chio (marks of the thorny crown); Maria Villani (ditto); Mary Magdalen di Pazzi; Mechtildis von Stanz; Ursula of Valencia; Veronica Giuliani (all the marks) 1694; Vincenza Ferreri of Valencia; Anna Emmerich, of Dülmen, Westphalia (d. 1824); Maria von Mörl (in 1839); Louise Lateau (1860), and Anne Girling, the foundress of the English "Shakers" (q.v.). Theresa Neumann, of Kennerseuth, Germany, (b. 1898) received her first stigmata on the tops of her hands and feet, on Good Friday, 1926. In subsequent years more marks appeared, on her side, shoulders, and brow. Stigmata, as studied in her case, never heal and never suppurate.

Stilo Novo (stī' lō nō' vō) (Lat., in the new style). Newfangled notions. When the calendar was reformed by Gregory XIII (1582), letters used to be dated stilo novo, which grew in time to be a cant phrase for any innovation.

And so I leave you to your stilo novo,
BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER: Woman's Prize, iv, 4.

Stir Up Sunday. The last Sunday in Trinity. So called from the first two words of the collect. "Stir up, we beseech Thee, O Lord, the wills of Thy faithful people . . ." It was an old custom to stir the Christmas plum pudding on this day, hence the old schoolboy rhyme beginning, "Stir up, we beseech thee, the pudding in the pot."

Stirrup. Literally, a rope to climb by (A.S. stirap, from stugan, to climb, and rāp, a rope).

Stirrup cup. A "parting cup," given, especially in the Highlands, to guests on leaving when their feet are in the stirrups. Cp. DOCH-AN-DOROCH.

Lord Marmion's bugles blew to horse;
Then came the stirrup-cup in course;
Between the baron and his host
No point of courtesy was lost.

SCOTT: Marmion, i, 21.

Among the ancient Romans a "parting cup" was drunk in honour of Mercury to insure sound sleep. See Ovid, Fasti, ii, 635.

Stirrup oil. A beating; a variety of "strap oil" (q.v.).

Stiver (stī' vēr). Not a stiver. Not a penny, not a cent. The stiver (staver) was a Dutch coin, equal to about a penny.

Set him free,
And you shall have your money to a stiver
And present payment.

FLETCHER: Beggars' Bush, i, 3.

Stock. Originally, a tree-trunk, or stem (connected with stick); hence, in figurative uses, something fixed, also something regarded as the origin of families, groups, etc.; as He comes of a good stock, from a good stem, of good line of descent, Languages of Indo-Germanic stock, etc. To worship stocks and stones is to worship idols, stock here being taken as a type of a motionless, fixed thing, like a tree-stump. The village stocks, in which petty offenders were confined by the wrists and ankles, are so called from the stakes or posts at the side. In its financial meaning stock in the sense of a fund or capital derives from that part of the old wooden tally which the creditor took with him as evidence of the king's debt, the other portion, known as the counterstock remaining in the Exchequer. The word was applied to the money which this tally represented, i.e. money lent to the government.

It is on the stocks. It is in hand, but not yet finished. The stocks is the frame in which a ship is placed while building and so long as it is in hand it is said to be or to lie on the stocks.

Live stock. The cattle, sheep, pigs, horses, etc., belonging to a farmer; that part of his "stock in trade" which is alive. In slang use, lice or other parasitical vermin.

Lock, stock, and barrel. See LOCK.

Stock-broker, stock-jobber. The broker is engaged in the purchase of stocks and shares for clients on commission; the jobber speculates in stocks and shares so as to profit by market fluctuations, and acts as an intermediary between buying and selling brokers. The jobber must be a member of a Stock Exchange; but a broker need not necessarily be; if he is not he is known as an "outside broker" or a "kerbstone operator." Cp. BUCKET-SHOP.

Stock in trade. The fixed capital of a business; the goods, tools, and other requisites of a trade or profession.

Stock-rider. The Australian term for one in charge of cattle, i.e. stock. He uses a stock-whip, and herds his beasts in a stock-yard.

To take stock. To ascertain how one's business stands by taking an inventory of all goods and so on in hand, balancing one's books, etc.; hence, to survey one's position and prospects.

Stockdove. The wild pigeon; so called because it nests in the stocks of hollow trees.

Stockfish. Dried cod, cured without salt. In Shakespeare's day the word was often used as a contemptuous epithet of abuse; thus Falstaff shouts at Prince Henry—

Away, you starveling, you elf-skin, you dried neat's tongue, bull's pizzle, you stock-fish!—1 Henry IV, ii, 4.

I will beat thee like a stock-fish. Moffat and Bennet, in their Health's Improvement (p. 262), inform us that dried cod, till it is beaten, is called buffhorn, because it is so tough; but after it has been beaten on the stock, it is termed stockfish.

Peace! thou wilt be beaten like a stockfish else.—JONSON: Every Man in his Humour, iii, 2.

Stocking. Used of one's savings or "nest-egg," because formerly money used to be hoarded up in an old stocking, which was frequently hung up the chimney for safety.

Blue stocking. See under BLUE.

Stockwell Ghost. A supposed ghost that created a great sensation in Stockwell, London, in 1772. The author of the strange noises was Anne Robinson, a servant. Cp. COCK LANE.

Stoga, Stogy (U.S.A.). An abbreviation of Conestoga. Applied to farmers' rough shoes, and to common cigars.

Stoic (stō' ik). A school of Greek philosophers (founded by Zeno, about 308 B.C.) who held that virtue was the highest good, and that the passions and appetites should be rigidly subdued. It was so called because Zeno gave his lectures in the Stoa Poikile, the Painted Porch (see PORCH) of Athens.

Epictetus was the founder of the New Stoic school (1st cent. A.D.).

The ancient Stoics in their porch
With fierce dispute maintained their church,
Beat out their brains in fight and study
To prove that virtue is a body,
That bonum is an animal,
Made good with stout polemic bawl.

BUTLER: Hudibras, ii, 2.

Stole (Lat. stola). An ecclesiastical vestment, also called the Orarium. Deacons wear the stole over the left shoulder, and loop the two parts together, that they may both hang on the right side. Priests wear it over both shoulders and hanging loose in front.

Stole, Groom of the. Formerly, the first lord of the bedchamber, a high officer of the Royal Household ranking next after the vice-chamberlain. The office was allowed to lapse on the accession of Queen Victoria; in the reign of Queen Anne it was held by a woman.

Stole, here, is not connected with Lat. stola, a robe, but refers to the king's stool, or privy. As late as the 16th century, when the king made a royal progress his close-stool formed part of the baggage and was in charge of a special officer or groom.

Stolen Things. See under STEAL.

Stomach. Used figuratively of inclination, appetite, etc.

He who hath no stomach for this fight.—SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, iv, 3.

Wolsey was a man of an unbounded stomach.—Henry VIII, iv, 2.

Let me praise you while I have the stomach.—Merchant of Venice, iii, 5.

To stomach an insult. To swallow it and not resent it.

If you must believe, stomach not all.—SHAKESPEARE: Antony and Cleopatra, iii, 4.

Stone. Used in a figurative sense in many ways when some characteristic of a stone is to be pointed out; as, stone blind, stone cold, stone dead, stone still, etc., as blind, cold, dead, or still as a stone.

I will not struggle; I will stand stone still.

King John, iv, 1.

In all ages stones, especially those of meteoric origin or those fabled to have "fallen from heaven," have been set up and worshipped by primitive peoples, and the great stone circles of Stonehenge, Avebury, the Orkneys, Carnac, etc., are relics of religious rites. Anaxagoras mentions a stone that fell from Jupiter in Thrace, a description of which is given by Pliny. The Ephesians asserted that their image of Diana came from Jupiter. The stone at Emessa, in Syria, worshipped as a symbol of the sun, was a similar meteorite. At Abydos and Potidæa similar stones were preserved. At Corinth was one venerated as Zeus. At Cyprus was one dedicated to Venus, a description of which is given by Tacitus and Maximus Tyrius. Herodian describes one in Syria, and the famous "black stone" (see HAJAR AL-ASWAD), set in the Kaaba of the Moslems, is a similar meteorite.

After the Moslem pilgrim has made his seven processions round the Kaaba, he repairs to Mount Arafat, and before sunrise enters the valley of Mena, where he throws seven stones at each of three pillars, in imitation of Abraham and Adam, who thus drove away the devil when he disturbed their devotions.

A rolling stone gathers no moss. One who is always "chopping and changing" and won't settle down will never become wealthy. So says the proverb (which is common to many languages), but it is not always borne out by facts—and its reverse does not hold true.

Tusser, in his Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandrie (1573) has—

The stone that is rolling can gather no moss,
For master and servant oft changing is loss.

Hag-stones. Flints naturally perforated, used in country places as charms against witches, the evil eye, etc. They are hung on the key of an outer door, round the neck for luck, on the bed-post to prevent nightmare, on a horse's collar to ward off disease, etc.

Stone soup or St. Bernard's soup. The story goes that a beggar asked alms at a lordly mansion, but was told by the servants they had nothing to give him. "Sorry for it," said the man, "but will you let me boil a little water to make some soup of this stone?" This was so novel a proceeding, that the curiosity of the servants was aroused, and the man was readily furnished with saucepan, water, and a spoon. In he popped the stone, and begged for a little salt and pepper for flavouring. Stirring the water and tasting it, he said it would be the better for any fragments of meat and vegetables they might happen to have. These were supplied, and ultimately he asked for a little ketchup or other sauce. When ready the servants tasted it, and declared that "stone soup" was excellent.

This story, which was a great favourite in the 16th and 17th centuries, was told with many variations, horseshoes, nails, ramshorns, etc., taking the place of the stone as narrated above.

Stone of stumbling. An obstacle, stumbling-block, or an occasion for being hindered. The phrase is from Isa. viii, 14:—

He shall be . . . for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel.

The Standing Stones of Stennis, in the Orkneys, resemble Stonehenge, but are unlikely to have been Druidical. The custom of constructing these circles was prevalent in Scandinavia as well as in Gaul and Britain, and as common to the mythology of Odin as to Druidism. They were places of public assembly, and in the Eyrbyggja Saga is described the manner of setting apart the Helga Feli (Holy Rocks) by the pontiff Thorolf for solemn meetings.

The Stone Age. The period when stone implements were used by primitive man. It preceded the Bronze Age; and some peoples, such as certain tribes in Papua, have not yet emerged from it. See PALÆOLITHIC.

The stone jacket or jug. Slang for prison. See JUG.

To cast the first stone. To take the lead in criticizing, fault-finding, quarrelling, etc. The phrase is from John viii, 7:—

He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her.

To kill two birds with one stone. See BIRD.

To leave no stone unturned. To spare no trouble, time, expense, etc., in endeavouring to accomplish your aim. After the defeat of Mardonius at Platea (477 B.C.), a report was current that the Persian general had left great treasures in his tent. Polycrates the Theban sought long but found them not. The Oracle of Delphi, being consulted, told him "to leave no stone unturned," and the treasures were discovered.

You have stones in your mouth. Said to a person who stutters or speaks very indistinctly. Demosthenes cured himself of stuttering by putting pebbles in his mouth and declaiming on the seashore.

The orator who once
Did fill his mouth with pebble stones
When he harangued.—BUTLER. Hudibras, i, 1.

See also ÆTITES, PHILOSOPHERS' STONE, PRECIOUS STONES, TOUCHSTONE, etc.

Stonebrash. A name given in Wiltshire to the subsoil of the north-western border, which consists of a reddish calcareous loam, mingled with flat stones; a soil made of small stones or broken rock.

Stony Arabia. A mistranslation of Arabia Petraea, where Petraea is supposed to be an adjective formed from the Greek petros (a stone). The name is really taken from the city of Petra, the capital of the Nabathæans. Cp. YEMEN.

Stonehenge. The great prehistoric (Neolithic or early Bronze Age) monument on Salisbury Plain, originally consisting of two concentric circles of upright stones, enclosing two rows of smaller stones, and a central block of blue marble (18 ft. by 4 ft.), known as the Altar Stone. The Friar's Heel (q.v.) stands outside the circle to the NE. Many theories as to its original purpose and original builders have been propounded. It was probably used (if not built) by the Druids, and from its plotting, which had an astronomical basis, it is thought to have been the temple of a sun god and to have been built about 1680 B.C.

The -henge of the name seems to refer to something hanging (A.S. hengen) in, or supported in, the air, viz., the huge transverse stones; but Geoffrey of Monmouth connects it with Hengist, and says that Stonehenge was erected by Merlin to perpetuate the treachery of Hengist in falling upon Vortigern and putting him and his 400 attendants to the sword. Aurelius Ambrosius asked Merlin to devise a memento of this event, whereupon the magician transplanted from Ireland the "Giant's Dance" stones which had been brought thither from Africa by a race of giants and all of which possessed magic properties.

Stonewall, To. A cricketer's term for adopting purely defensive measures when at the wicket, blocking every ball and not attempting to score. It was originally Australian political slang and was used of obstructing business.

Stonewall Jackson. Thomas J. Jackson (1824-63), one of the Confederate generals in the American Civil War; so called because at the Battle of Bull Run (1861) General Bee, of South Carolina, observing his men to waver, exclaimed, "Look at Jackson's men; they stand like a stone wall!"

Stooge (stooj). The second partner in a comic music-hall act whose role is to be stupid, ask questions, and make the comedian say everything twice and very distinctly so that the jokes get over to the audience. Hence the term has passed into common parlance for a confederate or a decoy.

Stool Pigeon. A police spy or informer; also a person employed by gamblers, etc., as a decoy or secret confederate.

Stool of Repentance. The cutty stool, a low stool placed in front of the pulpit in Scottish churches, on which persons who had incurred ecclesiastical censure were placed during divine service. When the service was over the penitent had to stand on the stool and receive the minister's rebuke.

Store. Store cattle. Beasts kept on a farm for breeding purposes, or thin cattle bought for fattening.

Store is no sore. Things stored up for future use are no evil. Sore means grief as well as wound, our sorrow.

To set store by. To value highly.

Stork. According to the Swedish legend, the stork received its name from flying round the cross of the crucified Redeemer, crying Styrka! styrka! (Strengthen! strengthen!).

Many fables and legends have grown up around this bird. Lyly refers to it more than once in his Euphues (1850), as—

Ladies use their lovers as the stork doth her young ones who pecketh them till they bleed with her bill, and then healeth them with her tongue.

And again—

Constasy is like unto the stork, who wheresoever she fly cometh into no nest but her own.

And—

It fareth with me . . . as with the stork, who, when she is least able carrieth the greatest burden.

Dutch and German mothers tell their children that babies are brought by storks; and another common belief was that the stork, like the secretary bird, will kill snakes "on sight";

'Twill profit when the stork, sworn foe of snakes,
Returns, to show compassion to thy plants.

PHILIPS: Cyder, Bk. i.

King Stork. A tyrant that devours his subjects, and makes them submissive with fear and trembling. The allusion is to the fable of The Frogs desiring a King. See LOG.

Storks' law or Lex ciconaria. A Roman law which obliged children to maintain their necessitous parents in old age, "in imitation of the stork." Also called "Antipelargia."

Storm (Austr.). Young grass which has grown after a rainfall in dry areas. Travelling from storm to storm is to storm along.

A brain-storm. A sudden and violent upheaval in the brain, causing temporary loss of control, or even madness. Nerve-storm is used in much the same way of the nerves.

A storm in a teacup. A mighty-to-do about a trifle; making a great fuss about nothing.

Storm and stress. See STURM UND DRANG.

The Cape of Storms. So Bartholomew Diaz named the south cape of Africa in 1486, but John II of Portugal (d. 1495) changed it to the Cape of Good Hope.

To take by storm. To seize by a sudden and irresistible attack; a military term used figuratively, as of one who becomes suddenly famous or popular; an actor, suddenly springing to fame, "takes the town by storm."

Stormy Petrel. See PETREL.

Stornello Verses (stôr nel' ô) are those in which certain words are harped on and turned about and about. They are common among the Tuscan peasants. The word is from tornare (to return).

I'll tell him the white, and the green, and the red,
Mean our country has flung the vile yoke from her head;

I'll tell him the green, and the red, and the white,
Would look well by his side as a sword-knot so bright;
I'll tell him the red, and the white, and the green,
Is the prize that we play for, a prize we will win.

Notes and Queries.

Storthing (stôr' ting). The Norwegian Parliament, elected every three years (stor, great; thing, assembly).

Stoush (stoush). Australian, a brawl. World War I was known by Australian troops as the Big Stoush. Probably from English stashie an uproar.

Stovepipe Hat. An old-fashioned tall silk hat, a chimney-pot hat (q.v.).

High collars, tight coats, and tight sleeves were worn at home and abroad, and, as though that were not enough, a stovepipe hat.—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News, Sept. 1891.

Strad. A colloquial name for a violin made by the famous maker Antonio Stradivarius (1644-1737) of Cremona. His best period was about 1700 to 1725; he sold his violins for about £4 each; they have since realized as much as £3,000, and one of his 'cellos £4,000.

Strafe (straf) (Ger. strafen, to punish). A word borrowed in good-humoured contempt from the Germans during World War I. One of their favourite slogans was Gott strafe England! The word was applied to any sharp and sudden bombardment.

Strain. The quality of mercy is not strained (Merchant of Venice, iv, 1)—constrained or forced, but cometh down freely as the rain, which is God's gift.

To strain a point. To go beyond one's usual, or the proper, limits; to give way a bit more than one has any right to.

To strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. To make much fuss about little peccadilloes, but commit offences of real magnitude. The proverb comes from Matt. xxiii, 24, which in Tyndale's, Coverdale's, and other early versions reads to strain out, etc., meaning to filter out a gnat before drinking the wine. The Revised Version also adopts this form, but the Authorized Version's rendering (to strain at) was in use well before the date of its issue (1611), so the at is not—as has been sometimes stated—a misprint or mistake for out. Greene in his Mamillia (1583) speaks of "straining at a gnat and letting pass an elephant."

To strain courtesy. To stand upon ceremony. Here, strain is to stretch, as parchment is strained on a drum-head.

Strand, The. One of the most famous of London thoroughfares, leading from the City of London to that of Westminster, along the Riverside, whence its name. It was little more than a country road until 1532 when it was paved. Nobles and no fewer than nine bishops had their inns or houses in the Strand, and no street in the metropolis has more historical or social associations, though within the last fifty years it has been widened and altered beyond recognition.

Stranger. Originally, a foreigner; from O.Fr. estrangier (Mod. Fr. étranger), which is the Latin extraneus, one without (extra, without).

It is said that Busiris, King of Egypt, sacrificed to his gods all strangers who set foot on his territories. Diomed (q.v.) gave strangers to his horses for food.

Floating tea-leaves in one's cup, charred pieces of wick that make the candle gutter, little bits of soot hanging from the bars of the grate, etc., are called "strangers," because they are supposed to foretell the coming of visitors.

I spy strangers! The recognized form of words by which a member of Parliament conveys to the Speaker the information that there is an unauthorized person in the House.

The little stranger. A new-born infant.

The stranger that is within thy gates. See PROSELYTES.

Strap. A taste of the strap, or a strapping is a flogging, properly with a leather strap.

A strapping young fellow. A big, sturdy chap; a robust, vigorous young woman is similarly termed a strapper.

Straphanger. One who cannot get a seat in a train, omnibus, etc., and so has to do his journey standing on the floor and clinging to a strap suspended from the roof for the purpose.

Strap oil. Slang for a thrashing. See above.

Strappado (strā pā' dō) (Ital. strappare, to pull). A mode of torture formerly practised for extracting confessions, retractions, etc. The hands were tied behind the back, and the victim was pulled up to a beam by a rope tied to them and then let down suddenly; by this means a limb was not infrequently dislocated.

Were I at the strappado or the rack, I'd give no man a reason on compulsion.—1 Henry IV, ii, 4.

Strassburg Goose. A goose fattened, crammed, and confined in order to enlarge its liver from which is made true paté de foie gras.

Straw. As used in phrases straw is generally typical of that which is worthless, as Not worth a straw, quite valueless, not worth a rap, a fig, etc.; to care not a straw, not to care at all.

A man of straw. A man without means, with no more substance than a straw doll; also, an imaginary or fictitious person put forward for some reason.

A straw shows which way the wind blows. Mere trifles often indicate the coming of momentous events. They are shadows cast before coming events.

I have a straw to break with you. I have something to quarrel with you about, or am displeased with you; I have a reproof to give you. In feudal times possession of a fief was conveyed by giving a straw to the new tenant. If the tenant misconducted himself, the lord dispossessed him by going to the threshold of his door and breaking a straw, saying as he did so, "As I break this straw, so break I the contract made between us." In allusion to this custom, it is said in Reynard the Fox—

The kynge toke up a straw fro the ground and pardoned and forgaif the foxe alle the mysdedes and trespases of his fader and of hym also.—Ch. xvii.

on condition that the Fox showed King Lion where the treasures were hid.

In the straw. Applied to women in childbirth. The allusion is to the straw with which beds were at one time usually stuffed, and not to the litter laid before a house to break the noise of wheels passing by.

The last straw. "'Tis the last straw that breaks the camel's back." There is an ultimate point of endurance beyond which calamity breaks a man down.

To catch at a straw. A forlorn hope. A drowning man will catch at a straw.

To make bricks without straw. To attempt to do something without the proper and necessary materials. The allusion is to the exaction of the Egyptian taskmasters mentioned in Exod. v, 6-14.

To pick straws. To show fatigue or weariness, as birds pick up straws to make their nests (or bed).

Their eyelids did not once pick straws,

And wink, and sink away;

No, no; they were as brisk as bees,

And loving things did say,

PETER PINDAR: Orson and Ellen, canto v.

To stumble at a straw. To be pulled up short by a trifle.

To throw straws against the wind. To contend uselessly and feebly against what is irresistible; to sweep back the Atlantic with a besom.

Strawberry. So called from straw, probably because the achenes with which the surface is dotted somewhat resemble finely chopped straw.

We may say of angling as Dr. Boteler said of strawberries, "Doubtless God could have made a better berry, but doubtless God never did."—ISAAC WALTON: Complete Angler, ch. v.

Strawberry mark. A birthmark something like a strawberry. In Morton's Box and Cox the two heroes eventually recognize each other as long-lost brothers through one of them having a strawberry-mark on his left arm.

Strawberry preachers. So Latimer called the non-resident country clergy, because they "come but once a yeare and tarie not long" (Sermon on the Plough, 1549).

The strawberry leaves. A dukedom; the honour, rank, etc., of a duke. The ducal coronet is ornamented with eight strawberry leaves.

Street Arab. See BEDOUIN.

Strenia (strē' nī à). The goddess who presided over the New Year festivities in ancient Rome. Tattius, the legendary Sabine king, entered Rome on New Year's Day, and received from some augurs palms cut from the sacred grove, dedicated to her. After his seizure of the city, he ordained that January 1st should be celebrated by gifts to be called strenæ, consisting of figs, dates, and honey. The French étrenne, a New Year's gift, is from this goddess.

Strephon (stref' ōn). A stock name for a rustic lover; from the languishing lover of that name in Sidney's Arcadia.

Strike. A cessation of work by a body of employees with the object of inducing the employers to grant some demand, such as one for higher wages, shorter hours, better working conditions, etc., or sometimes for no direct reason, but out of sympathy for other workers or for the furtherance of some political object. A lightning strike is one of which no notice has been given; and the converse of a strike, i.e. the refusal of the masters to allow the men to work until certain conditions are agreed upon or rules complied with, is termed a lock-out.

The word first appears in this sense in 1768, and seems to have had a nautical origin; sailors who refused to go to sea because of some grievance struck (lowered) the yards of their ship.

Strike-breaker. A "blackleg," a worker induced by the employer to carry on when the rest of the men have struck.

Strike is the name of an old grain measure, still unofficially used in some parts of England, and varying locally from half a bushel to four bushels. Probably so called because when filled the top of the measure was "struck off" and so levelled instead of being left heaped up.

It strikes me that . . . It occurs to me that . . . , it comes into my mind that . . .

Strike-a-light. The flint formerly used with tinder-boxes for striking fire; also, the shaped piece of metal used to strike the flint.

The collar of the Order of the Golden Fleece is composed of linked pieces of metal of this shape, and so is sometimes called the "collar of strike-a-lights."

Strike, but hear me! (Lat. verbera, sed audi). Carry out your threats—if you must—but at least hear what I have to say. The phrase comes from Plutarch's life of Themistocles. He strongly opposed the proposal of Eurybiades to quit the bay of Salamis. The hot-headed Spartan insultingly remarked that "those who in the public games rise up before the proper signal are scourged." "True," said Themistocles, "but those who lag behind win no laurels." On this, Eurybiades lifted up his staff to strike him, when Themistocles earnestly but proudly exclaimed, "Strike, but hear me!"

Bacon (Advancement of Learning, ii) calls this "that ancient and patient request."

Strike me dead! blind! etc. Vulgar expletives, or exclamations of surprise, dismay, wonder, and so on. Strike-me-dead is also sailor's slang for thin, wishy-washy beer.

Strike while the iron is hot. Act while the impulse is still fervent, or do what you do at the right time. The metaphor is taken from the blacksmith's forge; a horse-shoe must be struck while the iron is red-hot or it cannot be moulded into shape. Similar proverbs are: "Make hay while the sun shines," "Take time by the forelock."

To be struck all of a heap. See HEAP.

To be struck on a person. A colloquialism for to be much interested in him (or her), or to have fallen in love with the person named.

To strike an attitude. To pose; to assume an exaggerated or theatrical attitude.

To strike a balance. See BALANCE.

To strike a bargain (Lat. fedus ferire). To determine or settle it. The allusion is to the ancient custom of making a sacrifice in concluding an agreement. After calling the gods to witness, they struck—i.e. slew—the victim which was offered in sacrifice. Cp. To STRIKE HANDS below.

To strike at the foundations. To attempt to undermine the whole thing, to overthrow it utterly.

To strike camp. To lower the tents and move off; hence, to abandon one's position. A military phrase, adopted from the nautical phrase "to strike colours." See FLAG.

To strike hands upon a bargain. To confirm it by shaking or striking hands; to ratify it. Cp. To STRIKE A BARGAIN above.

To strike lucky. To have an unexpected piece of good fortune; a phrase from the miner's camps. To strike oil (see OIL) means much the same thing, and has a similar origin.

To strike one's colours, or flag. See FLAG.

To strike out in another direction. To open up a new way for oneself, to start a new method, a fresh business.

To strike sail. To acknowledge oneself beaten; to eat humble pie. A nautical expression. When a ship in fight or on meeting another ship, let down her topsails at least half-mast high, she was said to strike, meaning that she submitted or paid respect to the other.

Now Margaret
Must strike her sail, and learn awhile to serve
When kings command.

3 Henry VI, iii, 3.

To strike up. To begin, start operations; as to strike up an acquaintance, to set it going. Originally of an orchestra or company of singers, who "struck up" the music.

Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike. Said of one who dare not do the injury or take the revenge that he wishes. The "tag" is from Pope's Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (1735).

String. Always harping on one string. Always talking on one subject; always repeating the same thing. The allusion is to the ancient harpers.

To have two strings to one's bow. See Bow.

Strip. To tear a strip off a person. To give him a severe reprimand.

Strip-tease. A theatrical or cabaret performance in which an actress slowly and provocatively undresses herself.

Stroke. The oarsman who sits on the bench next the coxswain, and sets the time of the stroke for the rest.

To stroke one the wrong way. To vex him, ruffle his temper.

Strong. A strong verb is one that forms inflexions by internal vowel-change (such as bind, bound; speak, spoke); weak verbs add a syllable, or letter (as love, loved; refund, refunded).

Going strong. Prospering, getting on famously; in excellent state of health.

To come it strong. See COME.

Strontium (stron' shüm). This element, a yellowish metal resembling calcium, receives its name from Strontian, in Argyllshire, where it was discovered in 1792 by Thomas Charles Hope (1766-1844).

Struldbrugs (strüld' brügz). Wretched inhabitants of Luggnagg (in Swift's Gulliver's Travels), who had the privilege of immortality without having eternal vigour, strength, and intellect.

Stubble Geese. The geese turned into the stubble-fields to pick up the corn left after harvest.

Stuck up. See STICK.

Stuff Gown. A barrister (q.v.) who has not yet "taken silk," i.e. become a Q.C. See SILK.

Stuka (stü' kä). A German dive-bombing aeroplane in World War II, from Stutzkampf-bomber.

Stumer (stü' mer). A swindle, or a swindler, a forged banknote or "dud" cheque; a fictitious bet recorded by the bookmakers, and published in the papers, to deceive the public by running up the odds on a horse which is not expected to win.

Stump. A stump orator. A ranting, bombastic speaker, who harangues all who will listen to him from some point of vantage in the open air, such as the stump of a tree; a "thunderer," mob orator. Hence such phrases as to stump the country, to take to the stump, to go from town to town making inflammatory speeches.

Stumped out. Outwitted; put down. A term borrowed from cricket.

To stir one's stumps. To get on faster; to set upon something expeditiously.

This makes him stirre his stumps.

The Two Lancashire Lovers (1640).

The stumps are the legs, or wooden legs fastened to stumps of mutilated limbs.

For Witherington needs must I wayle,

As one in doleful dummies;

For when his leggs were smitten off,

He fought upon his stumps.

Ballad of Chevy Chase.

To stump up. To pay one's reckoning, pay what is due. Ready money is called stumpy or stumps. An Americanism, meaning money paid down on the spot—i.e. on the stump of a tree. Cp. NAIL, ON THE.

Stunt. A feat, performance; especially one of a startling or sensational nature. Hence, to stunt, to do something surprising or hazardous, an aerobatic turn or trick; a newspaper stunt, a movement, party cry, sensation, etc., worked by a newspaper and boomed by publicity men.

The word was originally American college slang for some exceptional athletic feat.

Stupor Mundi. So the Emperor Frederick II (1194-1250) was called, as being the greatest sovereign, soldier, and patron of artists and scholars during the 13th century.

Sturm und Drang (stoorm und drang) (Ger, storm and stress). The name given to the intellectual awakening of Germany towards the close of the 18th century. It had a considerable effect on our own Romantic Movement, and was so called from a drama of that name by Friedrich Maximilian von Klinger (1752-1831). Goethe and Schiller contributed to the movement.

Sty, an inflamed pimple on the eyelid, is shortened from the earlier styan (taken as meaning sty-on-eye), which is from A.S. stigend, something that rises (stigan, to rise).

Stygian (sti' ji an). Infernal, gloomy; pertaining to the river Styx (q.v.).

At that so sudden blaze the Stygian throng

Bent their aspect.—MILTON: Paradise Lost, x, 453.

Style is from the Latin stylus (a metal pencil for writing on waxen tablets, etc.). The characteristic of a person's writing is called his style. Metaphorically it is applied to composition and speech. Good writing is stylish, and, by extension, smartness of dress and deportment is so called.

Style is the dress of thought, and a well-dressed thought like a well-dressed man, appears to great advantage.—CHESTERFIELD: Letter cxxl.

The style is the man. A mistranslation of "Le style, c'est de l'homme même" from the discourse of Buffon (1707-88) on his reception into the French Academy.

New style, Old style. See CALENDAR.

To do a thing in style. To do it splendidly, regardless of expense.

Styles. Tom Styles or John a Styles, connected with John-a-Nokes (q.v.) an imaginary plaintiff or defendant in a law suit or an ancient order of ejement, like "John Doe" and "Richard Roe."

And, like blind Fortune, with a sleight

Convey men's interest and right

From Stiles's pocket into Nokes's.

BUTLER: Hudibras, iii, 3.

Stylites or Pillar Saints (sti' li' tēz). A class of early and mediæval ascetics, chiefly of Syria, who took up their abode on the tops of pillars, from which they never descended. The most celebrated are Simeon Stylites, of Syria, and Daniel the Stylite of Constantinople. Simeon (390-459) spent forty years on different pillars, each loftier and narrower than the preceding, the last being 66 feet high. Daniel (d. 494) lived thirty-three years on a pillar, and was not infrequently nearly blown from it by the storms from Thrace. This form of asceticism was in vogue as late as the 16th century.

Styx (stiks). The river of Hate (Gr. stugein, to hate)—called by Milton “abhorred Styx, the flood of burning hate” (Paradise Lost, ii, 577)—that, according to classical mythology, flowed nine times round the infernal regions.

The fables about the Styx are of Egyptian origin, and we are told that Isis collected the various parts of Osiris (murdered by Typhon) and buried them in secrecy on the banks of the Styx. Charon (q.v.), as Diodorus informs us, is an Egyptian word for a “ferryman” if the gods swore by the Styx, they dared not break their oath.

By the black infernal Styx I swear

(That dreadful oath which binds the Thunderer)

‘Tis fixed! POPE: Thebais of Statius, i.

Suaviter (swā' vi ter). Suaviter in modo, fortiter in re (Lat.), gentle in manner, resolute in action. Said of one who does what is to be done with unflinching firmness, but in the most inoffensive manner possible.

Sub hasta (süb häs' tä) (Lat.). By auction. When an auction took place among the Romans, it was customary to stick a spear in the ground to give notice of it to the public; literally, under the spear. Cp. SPEAR.

Sub Jove (Lat.). Under Jove; in the open air. Jupiter is the god of the upper regions of the air, as Juno is of the lower regions, Neptune of the waters of the sea, Vesta of the earth, Ceres of the surface soil, and Hades of the invisible or under-world.

Sub iudice. Under judicial consideration, not yet decided or awarded in a court of law.

Sub rosa. See ROSE.

Subject and Object. In metaphysics the Subject is the ego, the mind, the conscious self, the substance or substratum to which attributes must be referred; the Object is an external as distinct from the ego, a thing or idea brought before the consciousness. Hence subjective criticism, art, etc., is that which proceeds from the individual mind and is consequently individualistic, fanciful, imaginative; while objective criticism is that which is based on knowledge of the externals.

Subject-object. The immediate object of thought as distinguished from the material thing of which one is thinking.

The thought is necessarily and universally subject-object. Matter is necessarily, and to us universally, object-subject.—Lewes: History of Philosophy, II 485.

Sublapsarian (or Infralapsarian) (süb läp sār' i än). A Calvinist who maintains that God devised His scheme of redemption after he had permitted the “lapse” or fall of Adam, when He elected some to salvation and left others to run their course. The supra-lapsarian maintains that all this was ordained by God from the foundation of the world, and therefore before the “lapse” or fall of Adam.

Sublime. From Lat. sub, up to, limen, the lintel; hence, lofty, elevated in thought or tone.

From the sublime to the ridiculous is only one step. A favourite saying of Napoleon's, Du sublime au ridicule il n'y a qu'un pas; probably taken from Tom Paine, who has—

The sublime and the ridiculous are so often so nearly related that it is difficult to class them separately. One step above the sublime makes the ridiculous, and one step above the ridiculous makes the sublime again.—Age of Reason: Pt. ii (note).

The Sublime Porte. See PORTE.

The Sublime Society of Steaks. See BEEF-STEAK CLUB.

Submerged or Submerged Tenth, The. The proletariat, sunk or submerged in poverty.

All but the “submerged” were bent upon merry-making.—Society, Nov. 12th, 1892, p. 1273.

Subpœna (süb pē' nâ) (Lat., under penalty) is a writ commanding a man to appear in court usually unwillingly to bear witness or give evidence on a certain trial named. It is so called because the party summoned is bound to appear sub pœna centum librorum (under a penalty of £100). We have the verb to subpœna.

Subsidy (Lat. sub-sedere, to sit down). The subsidi of the Roman army were the troops held in reserve, the auxiliaries, supports; hence the word came to be applied to a support generally, and (in English) specially to financial support granted by Parliament to the king. It now usually means a contribution granted by the state in aid of some commercial venture of public importance.

Subsidiary, auxiliary, supplemental, is, of course, from the same word.

Subtle Doctor, The (Doctor Subtilis). The Scottish schoolman and Franciscan friar, Duns Scotus (about 1265-1308).

Succotash (U.S.A.). A dish of Indian corn and beans boiled together. Originally an Indian dish.

Succoth. The Jewish name for the Feast of Tabernacles (Heb. sukkoth, booths). See TABERNACLE.

Suck, or Suck-in. A swindle, hoax, deception; a fiasco.

Sucking is used (after sucking-pig) of a youth who is training for something, as, a sucking lawyer, an articled clerk, a sucking curate, a student at a theological college who is trying his hand at parochial work.

To suck the monkey. See MONKEY.

To teach one's grandmother to suck eggs. See EGGS.

Sudetenland (soo dā' tèn land). A mountainous region on the old Czech-German frontier, inhabited principally by Germans though the territory was—and is—actually in Czechoslovakia. The annexation of this land was claimed by the German Nazis and a European war was only averted or postponed in 1938 by its cession to Germany at the expense of Czechoslovakia. Sudetenland was restored to the latter country in 1945.

Suède (swād). Undressed kid-skin; so called because the gloves made of this originally came from Sweden (Fr. gants de Suède).

Suffering. The Meeting for Sufferings. The standing representative Committee of the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends (Quakers), which deals with questions affecting the Society; so called because when originally appointed in the 17th century its chief function was to relieve the sufferings caused to Quakers by distraint for tithes, persecution, etc.

Suffragan (sūf' rā gān). An auxiliary bishop; one who has not a see of his own but is appointed to assist a bishop in a portion of his see. In relation to a metropolitan or archbishop all bishops are suffragans; and they were so called because they could be summoned to a synod to give their suffrage.

Suffrage. One's vote, approval, consent; or, one's right to vote, especially at parliamentary and municipal elections. The word is from Lat. suffrago, the hough or ankle-bone of a horse, which was used by the Romans for balloting with, whence the voting table came to be called suffragium.

Hence Suffragette, a woman (usually more or less "militant") who in the ten years or so preceding World War I "agitated" for the parliamentary vote. The Suffragettes' campaigns of disturbance, violence, assault, wanton destruction of public property, arson, and attempted terrorism (for which many women were imprisoned and went on "hunger-strike") reached alarming proportions; but it stopped dead on the outbreak of War, and in 1918 women of 30 were not only enfranchised but made eligible for seats in Parliament. In 1928 enfranchisement was made on the same terms as for men.

The 19th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States of America enacted Woman Suffrage in August, 1920.

Sui generis (sū' i jen' er is) (Lat., of its own kind). Having a distinct character of its own; unlike anything else.

Sui juris (Lat.). Of one's own right; the state of being able to exercise one's legal rights—i.e. freedom from legal disability.

Suicides were formerly buried ignominiously on the high-road, with a stake thrust through their body, and without Christian rites. (Lat. sui, of oneself, -cidium, from cadere, to kill.)

They buried Ben at four cross roads,
With a stake in his inside.

Hood: Faithless Nelly Gray.

Suit. A suit of dittoes. See DIRTO.

To follow suit. To follow the leader; to do as those do who are taken as your exemplars. The term is from games of cards.

Sultan (Arab., king, cp. SOLDAN). The chief ruler of Turkey, and of some other Mohammedan countries, as Oman, Zanzibar, and—since 1914 (cp. KHEDIVE)—Egypt.

The wife (or sometimes the mother, sister, or concubine) of the Sultan is the Sultana, a name also given to a small, seedless raisin grown near Smyrna and to the purple gallinule (Porphyrio caruleus), a beautiful bird allied to the moorhen.

Some purple-wing'd Sultana sitting Upon a column, motionless
And glittering, like an idol-bird.

MOORE: Paradise and the Peri.

Summer. The second or autumnal summer, said to last thirty days, begins shortly before the sun enters Scorpio (Oct. 23rd). It is variously called—

St. Martin's summer, a late spell of fine weather. St. Martin's Day is Nov. 11th.

Expect St. Martin's summer, halcyon days.
1 Henry VI, i, 2.

All Saints' or All Hallows' summer (All Saints' is Nov. 1st).

Farewell, All Halloween summer.—1 Henry IV, i, 2.

St. Luke's little summer (St. Luke's day is Oct. 18th); and—especially in the United States—the Indian summer.

Summer Time. See TIME.

Summum bonum (sūm' ūm bō' nūm) (Lat., the highest good). The chief excellence; the highest attainable good.

Socrates said knowledge is virtue, and ignorance is vice.

Aristotle said that happiness is the greatest good.

Bernard de Mandeville and Helvetius contended that self-interest is the perfection of the ethical end.

Bentham and Mill were for the greatest happiness of the greatest number.

Herbert Spencer placed it in those actions which best tend to the survival of the individual and the race; and

Robert Browning (see his poem of this name) "in the kiss of one girl."

Sumptuary Laws. Laws to limit the expenses of food and dress, or any luxury. The Romans had their leges sumptuarii, and they have been enacted in many states at various times. Those of England were all repealed by 1 James I. c. 25; but during the two World Wars, with the rationing of food, coals, etc., and the compulsory lowering of the strength of beer and whisky we had a temporary return to sumptuary legislation.

Sun. The source of light and heat, and consequently of life, to the whole world; hence, regarded as a deity and worshipped as such by all primitive peoples and having a leading place in all mythologies. Shamash was the principal sun god of the Assyrians, Merodach of the Chaldees, Ormuzd of the Persians, Ra of the Egyptians, Tezcatlipoca of the Mexicans, and Helios (known to the Romans as Sol) of the Greeks. Helios drove his chariot daily across the heavens, rising from the sea at dawn and sinking into it in the west at sunset; the names of his snow-white, fire-breathing coursers are given as Brontē (thunder), Eos (day-break), Ethiops (flashing), Ethon (fiery), Erythreos (red-producer), Philogeia (earth-loving), and Pyrois (fiery).

The Scandinavian sun god, Sunna, who was in constant dread of being devoured by the wolf Fenris (a symbol of eclipses), was similarly borne through the sky by the horses Arvakur, Aslo, and Alsvidur.

Apollo was also a sun god of the Greeks, but he was the personification not of the sun itself but of its all-pervading light and life-giving qualities.

A place in the sun. A favourable position that allows room for development; a share in what one has a natural right to. The phrase was popularized by William II of Germany during the crisis of 1911. In his speech at Hamburg (Aug. 27th) he spoke of the German nation taking steps that would make them—sure that no one can dispute with us the place in the sun that is our due.

It had been used by Pascal some two hundred years before.

Heaven cannot support two suns, nor earth two masters. So said Alexander the Great when Darius (before the battle of Arbela) sent to offer terms of peace. Cp. Shakespeare:—

Two stars keep not their motion in one sphere;
Nor can one England brook a double reign,
Of Harry Percy and the Prince of Wales.

1 Henry IV, v, 4.

More worship the rising than the setting sun. More persons pay honour to ascendant than to fallen greatness. The saying is attributed to Pompey.

I should fear those that dance before me now
Would one day stamp upon me; it has been done;
Men shut their doors against a setting sun.

Timon of Athens, i, 2.

Out of God's blessing into the warm sun. One of Ray's proverbs, meaning from good to less good. When the king says to Hamlet "How is it that the clouds still hang on you?" the prince answers, "No, my lord, I am too much i' the sun," meaning, "I have lost God's blessing, for too much of the sun"—i.e. this far inferior state.

Thou out of heaven's benediction comest
To the warm sun.

King Lear, ii, 2.

The City of the Sun. See CITY.

The empire on which the sun never sets. See SET. (The setting of the sun).

The Southern Gate of the Sun. The sign Capricornus or winter solstice. So called because it is the most southern limit of the sun's course in the ecliptic.

The sun of Austerlitz. When Napoleon fought the Russians and Austrians at Austerlitz (Dec. 2nd, 1805), a brilliant sun suddenly burst through and scattered the mists, thus enabling him to gain an overwhelming victory. Napoleon ever after looked upon this as a special omen from heaven.

The Sun of Righteousness. Jesus Christ. (Mal. iv, 2.)

To have been out in the sun, or to have the sun in one's eyes. To be slightly inebriated.

To make hay while the sun shines. See HAY.

Sundowner. Australian for a tramp who times his arrival at the houses of the hospitable at sundown, so as to get a night's lodging.

Sunday (A.S. sunnendæg). The first day of the week, so called because anciently dedicated to the sun, as Monday was to the moon (see WEEK, DAYS OF THE). See also SABBATH.

Not in a month of Sundays. Not in a very long time.

One's Sunday best, or Sunday-go-to-meeting togs. One's best clothes, kept for wearing on Sundays.

Sunday saint. One who observes the ordinances of religion, and goes to church on a Sunday, but is worldly, grasping, "indifferent honest," the following six days.

When three Sundays come together. Never.

Sundew, the Drosera, which is from the Greek drosos, dew. So called from the dew-like drops which rest on the hairy fringes of the leaves.

Sunflower. What we know as the sunflower is the Helianthus, so called, not because it follows the sun, but because it resembles a conventional drawing of the sun. A bed of these flowers will turn in every direction, regardless of the sun. The Turnsole (Heliotropium), belonging to quite another order of plants, is the flower that turns to the sun.

The sunflower turns on the god, when he sets.

The same look which she turned when he rose.

T. MOORE: (Believe me if all those endearing young charms).

The Sunflower State (U.S.A.). Kansas.

Sunna (sūn'ā) (Arab., custom, divine law). Properly, the sayings and example of Mohammed and his immediate followers in so far as they conform to the Koran; hence applied to the collections of legal and moral traditions attributed to the Prophet, supplementary to the Koran as the Hebrew Mishna is to the Pentateuch.

Sunnites. The orthodox and conservative body of Moslems, who consider the Sunna as authentic as the Koran itself and acknowledge the first four caliphs to be the rightful successors of Mohammed. They form by far the largest section of Mohammedans, and are divided into four sects, viz., Hanbalites, Hanafites, Malikites, and Shafites (cp. SHITES).

Suo marte (sū'ō mar'te) (Lat.). By one's own strength or personal exertions.

Super (sū'per). In theatrical parlance, "supers" are supernumeraries, or persons employed to make up crowds, processions, dancing or singing choirs, messengers, etc., where little or no speaking is needed.

Supercilious. Having an elevated eyebrow (Lat. super, over, cilium, eyebrow); hence contemptuous, haughty.

Supererogation. Works of supererogation. The term used by theologians for good works which are performed but are not actually enjoined on Christians (Lat. super, over, above, erogare, to pay out). In common use as a phrase.

Superman. A hypothetical superior human being of high intellectual and moral attainments, fancied as evolved from the normally existing type. The term (ubermensch) was invented by the German philosopher Nietzsche (d. 1900), and popularized in England by G. B. Shaw's play, Man and Superman (1903).

The wide popularity of the term gave rise to many compounds, such as superwoman, super-critic, super-tramp, super-Dreadnought, and super-tax.

Supernaculum. The very best wine. The word is low Latin for "upon the nail" (super unguem), meaning that the wine is so good the drinker leaves only enough in his glass to make a bead on his nail. The French say of first-class wine, "It is fit to make a ruby on the nail" (faire rubis sur l'ongle). Nashe says that after a man had drunk his glass, it was usual, in the North, to turn the cup upside down, and let a drop fall upon the thumb-nail. If the drop rolled off, the drinker was obliged to fill and drink again (Pierce Penniless, 1592). Bishop Hall alludes to the same custom: "The Duke Tenterbelly . . . exclaims . . . 'Let never this goodly-formed goblet of wine go jovially through me;' and then he set it to his mouth, stole it off every drop, save a little remainder, which he was by custom to set upon his thumb-nail and lick off."

'Tis here! the supernaculum! twenty years Of age, if 'tis a day.—BYRON: Werner, i, 1.

Hence, to drink supernaculum is to leave no heel-taps; to leave just enough not to roll off one's thumb-nail if poured upon it.

Supply. One who acts as a substitute, temporarily, for the place of another; used principally of clergymen, school teachers, and domestic servants.

In Parliamentary language supplies is used of money granted for the purposes of government which is not provided by the revenue. In Britain all money bills, i.e. those authorizing expenditure, must originate in the House of Commons and must be based on resolutions passed by a Committee of Supply.

The law of supply and demand. The economic statement that the competition of buyers and sellers tends to make such changes in price that the demand for any article in a given market will become equal to the supply. In other words, if the demand exceeds the supply the price rises, operating so as to reduce the demand and so enable the supply to meet it, and vice versa.

Supralapsarian. See SUBLAPSARIAN.

Surgeon. A contraction of the earlier chirurgéon, from Gr. cheir, hand, egein, to work—one who works with his hands, or works by manual operations instead of through the agency of physic (as does the physician). The word is, etymologically, identical with manufacturer (Lat. manus, hand, facere, to work).

Surloin. See SIRLOIN.

Surname. The name added to, or given over and above, the Christian or personal name (O.Fr. sur-, from Lat. super-, over, above). English surnames (of which it is said, there are some 30,000) came into use in the latter part of the 10th century, but were not widely used till much later. In origin they are for the most part appellations denoting a trade or occupation, the place of residence, or some peculiar characteristic.

Surplice. Over the pelisse or fur robe. (Lat. super-pellicium, from pellis, skin.) The clerical robe worn over the bachelor's ordinary dress, which was anciently made of sheepskin.

Surrealism. A school of art beginning in 1924 which regarded the subconscious as the essential source of art drawing inspiration from "all that is contrary to the general appearance of reality." It falls into two groups: "hand painted dream photographs" (Dali), and an endeavour to achieve complete spontaneity of technique as well as subject matter by use of contrast. Chief exponents: Picasso, Max Ernst, Arp, Man Ray, Miró and Salvador Dali. The literary exponent was André Breton.

Susanna and the Elders. A favourite subject among Renaissance and later artists. The Story of Susanna, one of the books of the Old Testament Apocrypha, tells how Susanna was accused of adultery by certain Jewish elders who had unsuccessfully attempted her chastity, how her innocence was proved by Daniel, and the Elders put to death.

Sutor. Ne sutor, etc. See COBBLER.

Sutras (sū' trās). Ancient Hindu aphoristic manuals giving the rules of systems of philosophy, grammar, etc., and directions concerning religious ritual and ceremonial customs. They form a link between the Vedic and later Sanskrit literature, and are so called from Sansk. sūtra, a thread, the aphorisms being, as it were, threaded together.

Suttee (sūt' ē). The Hindu custom of burning the widow on the funeral pyre of her deceased husband; also, the widow so put to death (from Sansk. sati, a virtuous wife). In theory the practice, which lasted for some 2,000 years, was optional, but public opinion and the very severe form of ostracism the defaulting widow had to endure gave her practically no option. Women with child and mothers of children not yet of age could not perform suttee. The practice was declared illegal in British India in 1829, but even now it is probably not completely stamped out.

Swaddlers. An early nickname for Wesleyan Methodists; applied later (by Roman Catholics) to Dissenters and Protestants generally. Cardinal Cullen, in 1869, gave notice that he would deprive of the sacraments all parents who sent their children to mixed Model schools, where they were associated with "Presbyterians, Socinians, Arians, and Swaddlers" (Times, September 4th, 1869).

There is more than one explanation of the origin of the term. Southey's (Life of Wesley, ii, 153) is as follows:—

It happened that Cennick, preaching on Christmas Day, took for his text these words from St. Luke's Gospel: "And this shall be a sign unto you; ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger." A Catholic who was present, and to whom the language of Scripture was a novelty, thought this so ridiculous that he called the preacher a swaddler in derision, and this unmeaning word became a nickname for "Protestant," and had all the effect of the most opprobrious appellation.

Swag (connected with Norwegian svagga, to sway from side to side). One's goods carried in a pack or bundle; hence, the booty obtained by a burglary—which is often carried away in a sack. To get away with the swag is used figuratively of profiting by one's cleverness or sharp practice.

Swagman. The Australian term for a man who carries his swag about with him while on the search for work.

Swag-shop. A place kept by a "fence," where thieves can dispose of their "swag"; also, a low-class shop where cheap and trashy articles are sold.

Swagger (frequentative of SWAG). To strut about with a superior or defiant air; to bluster, make oneself out a very important person; hence, ostentatiously smart or "swell"; as a swagger dinner, a swagger car, etc.

Swagger-stick. The small cane a soldier was formerly obliged to carry when walking out.

Swainmote. See SWANMOTE.

Swallow. According to Scandinavian tradition, this bird hovered over the cross of our Lord, crying "Svala! svala!" (Console! console!) whence it was called svalow (the bird of consolation).

Ælian says that the swallow was sacred to the Penates or household gods, and therefore to injure one would be to bring wrath upon your own house. It is still considered a sign of good luck if a swallow or martin builds under the eaves of one's house.

Perhaps you failed in your foreseeing skill,
For swallows are unlucky birds to kill.

DRYDEN: Hind and Panther, Pt. iii.

Longfellow refers to another old fable regarding this bird:—

Seeking with eager eyes that wondrous stone which the swallow
Brings from the shore of the sea to restore the sight of its fledglings. Evangeline, Pt. i.

One swallow does not make a summer. You are not to suppose summer has come to stay just because you have seen a swallow; nor that the troubles of life are over because you have surmounted one difficulty. The Greek proverb, "One swallow does not make a spring" is to be found in Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics (I, vii, 16).

Swan. The fable that the swan sings beautifully just before it dies is very ancient, though baseless. Swans do not "sing" at all, in the ordinary sense of the term, and the only one for which song of any kind can be claimed is the Whistling Swan (Cygnus musicus) of Iceland, of which it is reported—during the long dark nights their wild song is often heard resembling the tones of a violin, though somewhat higher and remarkably pleasant.—NICOL: Account of Iceland.

The superstition was credited by Plato, Aristotle, Euripides, Cicero, Seneca, Martial, etc., and doubted by Pliny and Ælian.

Shakespeare refers to it more than once. Emilia, just before she dies says—

I will play the swan,
And die in music. Othello, v, 2.

In the Merchant of Venice, (iii, 2) Portia says—
He makes a swan-like end,
Fading in music.

And Lucrece (Rape of Lucrece, 1, 1611)—

And now this pale swan in her watery nest
Begins the sad dirge of her certain ending.

Spenser speaks of the swan as though it sang quite regardless of death—

He, were he not with love so ill bedight,
Would mount as high and sing as soote [sweetly] as Swanne. Shepherd's Calendar: October, 89.

And Coleridge, referring to poetasters of the time, gives the old superstition an epigrammatic turn—

Swans sing before they die; 'twere no bad thing
Did certain persons die before they sing.

One Greek legend has it that the soul of Apollo, the god of music, passed into a swan, and in the Phædo Plato makes Socrates say that at their death swans sing—not out of sorrow or distress, but because they are inspired of Apollo, and they sing as foreknowing the good things their god hath in store for them.

This idea made the Pythagorean fable that the souls of all good poets passed into swans hence, the Swan of Mantua, etc. (see below).

The male swan is called a cob, the female a pen; a young swan a cygnet.

See also FIONNUALA; LEDA; LOHENGRIN.

To swan. A word of doubtful origin much used in N.W. Europe in World War II. It denoted taking a vehicle off for a drive for one's own amusement when off duty. It came to be applied to any apparently aimless movements, e.g. one who drove his tank about without apparent purpose might be described as "swanning about the battlefield."

The Swan of Avon. Shakespeare; so called by Ben Jonson in allusion to his birthplace, Stratford-on-Avon. Swan, as applied to poets (because Apollo was fabled to have been changed into a swan), is of very old standing; thus, Virgil was known as the Mantuan Swan, Homer the Swan of Meander, etc.; and Anna Seward (1747-1809) was named the Swan of Lichfield.

The Swan of Usk. So Henry Vaughan, the Silurist (1622-95) was called, having given one of his volumes of verse this name—Olor Iscanus.

A black swan. A curiosity, a rara avis (q.v.).

All your swans are geese. All your fine promises or expectations have proved fallacious. "Hope told a flattering tale." The converse. All your geese are swans, means all your children are paragons, and whatever you do is in your own eyes superlative work.

Leda and the swan. See LEDA.

Swan-maidens. Fairies of northern folklore, who can become maidens or swans at will by means of the swan shift, a magic garment of swan's feathers. Many stories are told of how the swan shift was stolen, and the fairy was obliged to remain thrall to the thief until rescued by a knight.

Swan song. The song fabled to be sung by swans at the point of death (see above); hence, the last work of a poet, composer, etc.

Swan-umping. A taking up of swans and placing the marks of ownership on their beaks. The term is specially applied to annual expeditions for this purpose up the Thames, when the marks of the owners (viz. the Crown and the Dyers' and Vintners' Companies) are made. The royal swans are marked with five nicks—two lengthwise, and three across the bill—and the Companies' swans with two nicks. Also called Swan-hopping.

The Swan with Two Necks. The emblem of the Vintners' Company, and an old tavern sign. Necks is a corruption of Nicks.

The Knight of the Swan. Lohengrin (q.v.).

The Order of the Swan. An order of knighthood instituted by Frederick II of Brandenburg in 1440 (and shortly after in Cleves) in honour of the Lohengrin legend. It died out in the 16th century, but it is still commemorated in our White Swan public-house sign, which was first used in honour of Anne of Cleves, one of the wives of Henry VIII. The badge was a silver swan surmounted by an image of the Virgin.

Swanhild (swän' hild). An old Norse legendary heroine, daughter of Sigurd and Gudrun. She was falsely accused of adultery with the son of the king who was wooing her, and the king had him hanged and her trampled to death by horses.

Swanimote (swän' i möt). A court held thrice a year before forest verderers by the steward of the court. So called from A.S. swangemot, a meeting of swineherds, because, under the Charta de Foresta (1217), it was a meeting of the keepers of the royal forests to arrange for the depasturing of pigs in autumn, the clearance of cattle during the deer's fawning season, etc.

Swank. To behave in an ostentatious manner, to show off and "cut a dash" to impress the observers with one's cleverness, smartness, or rank, etc. It is an old dialect word adopted as modern slang.

Swap. To exchange.

To swap horses in midstream. To change leaders at the height of a crisis. Abraham Lincoln, in an address, June 9th, 1864, referring to the fact that his fellow Republicans, though many were dissatisfied with his conduct of the Civil War, had renominated him for President, said that the Convention had concluded "that it is best not to swap horses while crossing the river."

Swashbuckler. A ruffian; a swaggerer. "From swashing," says Fuller (Worthies; 1662), "and making a noise on the buckler." The sword-players used to "swash" or tap their shield, as fencers tap their foot upon the ground when they attack. Cp. SWINGE-BUCKLER.

A brave, a swashbuckler, one that for money and good cheer will follow any man to defend him, but if any danger come, he runs away the first, and leaves him in the lurch.—FLORIO: World of Words (1598).

Swastika. The gammadion, or fylfot (q.v.), an elaborated cross-shaped design used as a charm to ward off evil and bring good luck; the emblem of Nazi Germany, personally chosen as such by Adolf Hitler. The word is Sanskrit, from svasti, good fortune.

Swear, To. Originally used only of solemnly affirming, by the invocation of God or some sacred person or object as witness to the pledge, to take an oath. Swearing came later to mean using bad language by way of expletives, intensives, and in moments of sudden anger through the sacred expressions being used in a profane way in lightly and irreverently taking oaths.

The modern practice of swearing, in either its flippant or vituperative shape is derived from the break-up of the process once devised as a protection of truthfulness and fair dealing. . . . It must be remembered that the subject of vituperative swearing is interwoven with that of legal and religious ordinances.—SHARMAN: A Cursory History of Swearing, ch. ii (1884).

To swear black is white. To swear to any falsehood.

To swear like a trooper. To indulge in very strong blasphemy or profanity.—"Our armies swore terribly in Flanders," cried my Uncle Toby" (Sterne: Tristram Shandy, II, xi).

Sweat. To sweat a person is to exact the largest possible amount of labour from him at the lowest possible pay, to keep him working at starvation wages. The term is also used of bleeding, or fleecing, a man; and of rubbing down coins so that one can obtain and use the gold or silver taken from them.

Sweat-box (U.S.A.). A form of punishment of long standing which consists of imprisoning a man in a box no bigger than himself often in the sun, so that he becomes exhausted by the terrific temperature. Hence, to sweat it out of him is to extort a confession or agreement by such use of threats and violence as may be necessary until the victim breaks under the ordeal.

Sweating sickness. A form of malaria epidemic, which appeared in England about a century and a half after the Black Death (1485). It broke out amongst the soldiers of Richmond's army as a violent inflammatory fever, without boils or ulcers, after the battle of Bosworth, and lasted five weeks. Between 1485 and 1529 there were five outbreaks, the first four being confined to England and France, the fifth spreading over Germany, Turkey, and Austria.

Swedenborgians (swē' den bôr' ji ānz). Followers of Emanuel Swedenborg (1688-1772), called by themselves "the New Jerusalem Church" (Rev. xxi, 2). Their views of salvation, inspiration of Scripture, and a future state, differ widely from those of other Christians, and they believe the Trinity to be centred in the person of Jesus Christ (Col. ii, 9).

Sweep. To sweep the threshold. To announce to all the world that the woman of the house is paramount. When the procession called "Skimmington" (q.v.) passed a house where the woman "wore the breeches" everyone gave the threshold a sweep with a broom or bunch of twigs.

Sweepstakes. A race in which stakes are made by the owners of horses engaged, to be awarded to the winner or other horse in the race. Entrance money has to be paid to the race fund. If the horse runs, the full stake must be paid; but if it is withdrawn, a forfeit only is imposed.

Also a gambling arrangement in which a number of persons stake money on some event (usually a horse-race), each of whom draws a lot for every share bought, the total sum deposited being divided among the drawers of winners (or sometimes of starters). Some "sweeps" have very valuable prizes; as the "Calcutta Sweep" on the Derby (organized by the Calcutta Club), the first prize of which comes to over £100,000.

Sweet. The sweet singer of Israel. King David (about 1074-1001 B.C.).

To be sweet on. To be enamoured of, in love with.

To have a sweet tooth. To be very fond of dainties and sweet things generally.

Sweetness and light. A favourite phrase with Matthew Arnold. "Culture," he said, "is the passion for sweetness and light, and (what is more) the passion for making them prevail" (Preface to Literature and Dogma). The phrase was used by Swift (Battle of the Books, 1697) in an imaginary fable by Æsop as to the merits of the bee (the ancients) and the spider (the moderns). It concludes:—

The difference is that instead of dirt and poison, we have rather chosen to fill our hives with honey and wax, thus furnishing mankind with the two noblest of things, which are sweetness and light.

Swell. A person showily dressed; one who puffs himself out beyond his proper dimensions, like the frog in the fable; hence, a fashionable person, one of high standing or importance. In American usage as an adjective, fine, stylish, first rate, just right.

Swell mob. The better-dressed thieves and pickpockets.

Swelled head. An exaggerated sense of one's own dignity, usefulness, importance, etc.

Swim. In the swim. In a favourable position in society of any kind; a racing-man who is "in the swim" is one who mixes with the class from which he can get the best "tips"; and similarly with a diplomatist, a stockbroker, or a society lady. It is an angler's phrase. A lot of fish gathered together is called a swim, and when an angler can pitch his hook in such a place he is said to be "in a good swim."

Sink or swim. No matter what happens. Convicted witches were thrown into the water to "sink or swim"; if they sank they were drowned; if they swam it was clear proof they were in league with the Evil One; so it did not much matter, one way or the other.

To swim with the stream. To allow one's actions and principles to be guided solely by the force of public opinion.

Swindle. To cheat, defraud, gain a mean advantage by trickery. The verb is formed from the noun swindler, which was introduced into England by German Jews about 1760, from Ger. schwindler, a cheating company promoter (from schwindeln, to act heedlessly or extravagantly).

Swing. Captain Swing. The name assumed by certain persons who, about 1830, sent threatening letters to farmers who employed mechanical means, such as threshing machines, to save labour. "Captain Swing" was an entirely imaginary person but three so-called Lives of him appeared in 1830 and 1831.

The neighbours thought all was not right,
Scarcely one with him ventured to parley,
And Captain Swing came in the night,
And burnt all his beans and his barley.

BARHAM: Babes in the Wood (Ingoldsby Legends).

A type of jazz with a catchy rhythm. The word originated in Negro parlance to describe really moving music well played, but later (1930s) came to denote a debased type of popular dance music which the uninformed imagined had some connection with jazz.

I don't care if I swing for him! A remark of one very revengefully inclined; implying that the speaker will even go to the length of murdering the enemy, and getting hanged in consequence.

In full swing. Going splendidly; everything prosperous and in perfect order.

It went with a swing. Said of a ceremony, function, entertainment, etc., that passed off without a hitch and was a great success.

What you lose on the swings you get back on the roundabouts. A rough way of stating the law of averages; if you have had luck on one day you have good on another, if one venture results in loss try a fresh one—it may succeed.

Swinge-buckler. A roisterer, a rake who went a bit further than a swashbuckler (q.v.), in that he swinged (beat) his man, as well as swashed his buckler. The continuation of Stow's Annals tells us that in Elizabeth's time the "blades" of London used to assemble in West Smithfield with sword and buckler for mock fights, called "bragging" fights. They swashed and swung their bucklers with much show of fury, "but seldom was any man hurt."

There was I, and little John Doit of Staffordshire, and black George Barnes, and Francis Pickbone, and Will Squele, a Cotswold man; you had not four such swinge-bucklers in all the Inns-of-court; and, I may say to you, we knew where the bona-robas were.—2 Henry VI, ii, 2.

Swiss. The nickname of a Swiss is "Colin Tampon."

No money—no Swiss—i.e. no assistance. The Swiss were for centuries the mercenaries of Europe—willing to serve anyone for pay—and were usually called in England Switzers, as in Shakespeare's "Where are my Switzers? Let them guard the door" (Hamlet iv, 5). In France an hotel-porter—also the beadle of a church—is called un suisse.

Swithin. St. If it rains on St. Swithin's day (July 15th), there will be rain for forty days.

St. Swithin's day, gif ye do rain, for forty days it will remain;

St. Swithin's day, an ye be fair, for forty days 'twill rain nae mair.

The legend is that St. Swithin, Bishop of Winchester, who died 862, desired to be buried in the church-yard of the minster, that the "sweet rain of heaven might fall upon his grave." At canonization the monks thought to honour the saint by removing his body into the choir, and fixed July 15th for the ceremony; but it rained day after day for forty days, so that the monks saw the saint was averse to their project, and wisely abandoned it.

The St. Swithun of France is St. Gervais (q.v.; and see MÉDARD). The rainy saint in Flanders is St. Godeliève; in Germany, the Seven Sleepers.

Switzers. See SWISS.

Swollen Head. See SWELLED HEAD.

Sword. At sword's point. In deadly hostility, ready to fight each other with swords.

Fire and sword. Rapine and destruction perpetrated by an invading army.

Poke not fire with a sword. This was a precept of Pythagoras, meaning add not fuel to fire, or do not irritate an angry man by sharp words which will only increase his rage. (See Iamblichus: Protreptics, symbol ix.)

Sword and buckler. An old epithet for brag and bluster; as a sword and buckler voice. sword and buckler men, etc. Hotspur says of the future Henry V—

And that same sword and buckler Prince of Wales,

I'd have him poisoned with a pot of ale.

1 Henry IV, i, 3.

Sword and Cloak Plays. See CLOAK AND SWORD.

Sword dance. A Scottish dance performed over two swords laid crosswise on the floor, or sometimes danced among swords placed point downwards in the ground: also a dance in which the men brandish swords and clash them together, the women passing under them when crossed.

Sword dollar. A Scottish silver coin of James VI, marked with a sword on the reverse. It was worth 30s. Scots (=2s. 6d. in English contemporary money).

The sword of Damocles. See DAMOCLES.

The Sword of God. Khaled Ibn al Waled (d. 642), the Mohammedan conqueror of Syria, was so called for his prowess at the battle of Muta.

The Sword of Rome. Marcellus, who opposed Hannibal (216-14 B.C.).

The Sword of the Spirit. The Word of God (Eph. vi, 17).

To put to the sword. To slay.

Your tongue is a double-edged sword. Whatever you say wounds; your argument cuts both ways. The allusion is to the double-edged sword out of the mouth of the Son of Man—one edge to condemn, and the other to save (Rev. i, 16).

Yours is a Delphic sword—it cuts both ways. Erasmus says a Delphic sword is that which accommodates itself to the pro or con of a subject. The reference is to the double meanings of the Delphic oracles.

Some famous swords. In the days of chivalry a knight's horse and sword were his most treasured and carefully kept possessions, and his sword—equally with his horse—had its own name. The old romances, especially those of the Charlemagne and Arthurian cycles, are full of these names; we give below a list of the more noteworthy, and further particulars of these and others will be found throughout this Dictionary.

Angurvalad (stream of anguish), Frithiof's sword.

Arondight, the sword of Launcelot of the Lake.

Azoth, the sword of Paracelsus (Browning's Paracelsus, Bk. v).

Balisarda, Rogero's sword, made by a sorceress.

Balmung, one of the swords of Siegfried, made by Wieland.

Caliburn, another name of Excalibur (q.v.).

Chrysar (sword, as good as gold), Artegal's sword (Spenser's Faerie Queene).

Colada, the Cid's sword.

Corrouge, Otuel's sword.

Courtain (the short sword), one of the swords of Ogier the Dane; Sauvagine was the other, and they both took Muniñcan three years to make.

Curtana, the blunted sword of Edward the Confessor.

Durandan, Durandal, or Durandana (the inflexible), Orlando's sword.

Excalibur, the sword of King Arthur. (Ex cal[ce]-lib[er]are), to liberate from the stone.)

Flamberge or Floberge (the flame-cutter), the name of one of Charlemagne's swords, and also that of Rinaldo's and Maugis or Maligis's.

Frusberia, Rinaldo's sword.

Glorious, Oliver's sword, which hacked to pieces the nine swords made by Ansias, Galas, and Muniñcan.

Gram (grief), one of the swords of Siegfried.

Greysteel, the sword of Kolt the Thrall.

Haute-claire (very bright), both Closamont's and Oliver's swords were so called.

Joyeuse (joyous), one of Charlemagne's swords: it took Gallas three years to make.

Mervelleuse (the marvellous), Doolin's sword.

Mimung, the sword that Tutwilt lent Siegfried.

Morglay (big glaive), Sir Bevis's sword.

Nagelring (nail-ring), Dietrich's sword.

Philippian. The sword of Antony, one of the triumvirs.

Querrn-biter (a foot-breadth), both Haco I, and Thoralf Skolinson had a sword so called.

Sanglamore (the big bloody glaive), Braggadochio's sword (Spenser's Faerie Queene).

Sauvagine (the relentless): see COURTAIN above.

Sybarite (sí' bār ít). A self-indulgent person; a wanton. The inhabitants of Sybaris, in South Italy, were proverbial for their luxurious living and self-indulgence. A tale is told by Seneca of a Sybarite who complained that he could not rest comfortably at night, and being asked why, replied, "He found a rose-leaf doubled under him, and it hurt him."

Fable has it that the Sybarites taught their horses to dance to the pipe. When the Crotiens marched against Sybaris they played on their pipes, whereupon all the Sybarite horses began to dance; disorder soon prevailed in the ranks, and the victory was quick and easy.

Sycamore and Sycomore (sík' à môr). The Sycamore is the common plane-tree of the maple family (Acer pseudo-platanus, or greater maple); the sycomore is the Egyptian fig-tree, and is the tree into which Zacchæus climbed (Luke xix, 4) to see Christ pass. Coverdale's, the Geneva, and other early English Bibles, call it the "wyld figge tre." Both words are from Gr. sukon, fig, and moron, mulberry.

Sycophant (sík' ō fānt). A sponger, parasite, or servile flatterer; the Greek sukophantes (sukon, fig, phainein, to show), which is said to have meant an informer against persons who exported figs or robbed the sacred fig-trees. There is no corroboration of this, but the widely accepted story is that the Athenians passed a law forbidding the exportation of figs, and there were always found mean fellows who, for their own private ends, impeached those who violated it; hence sycophantes came to signify first a government toady, and then a toady generally.

Sycorax (sī' kô rāks). A witch, mother of Caliban, in Shakespeare's Tempest.

Syllogism (sil' ô jiz̄m). A form of argument consisting of three propositions, a major premise or general statement, a minor premise or instance, and the conclusion, which is deduced from these.

The five hexameter verses which contain the symbolic names of all the different syllogistic figures are as follow:—

Barbara, Celarent, Darii, Ferioque, prioris.
Cesare, Camestres, Festino, Baroko, secundæ.
Tertia, Darapti, Disamis, Datisi, Felapton.
Bokardo, Ferison, habet. Quarta insuper addit
Bramantip, Camenes, Dimaris, Fesapo, Fresison.

The significance of these words lies in their vowels:

A universal affirmative.
E universal negative.
I particular affirmative.
O particular negative.

Taking the first line as the standard, the initials of all the words below it show to which standard the syllogism is to be reduced; thus, Baroko is to be reduced to "Barbara," Cesare to "Celarent," and so on.

Sylph (silf). An elemental spirit of air; so named in the Middle Ages by the Rosicrucians and Cabalists, from the Greek silphe, some kind of beetle, or a grub that turns into a butterfly. Cp. SALAMANDER.

Any mortal who has preserved inviolate chastity might enjoy intimate familiarity with these gentle spirits, and deceased coquettes were said to become sylphs, "and sport and flutter in the fields of air."

Whoever, fair and chaste,
Rejects mankind, is by some sylph embraced.
POPE: Rape of the Lock, i.

Symbolists. A group of French writers who, towards the end of the 19th century revolted against Naturalism and Parnassianism. Their aim was to suggest rather than to depict or transcribe, and their watchword was Verlaine's "Pas de couleur, rien que la nuance." Their precursors were Baudelaire, Banville, G. de Nerval and Villiers de l'Île Adam. Chief Symbolists: in verse, Verlaine, Rimbaud, Mallarmé; in prose, Huysmans.

Noah .. ..	Looking out of the ark window at a dove, which is flying to the ark, olive branch in its beak.
King Saul .. ..	Arrayed in a rich tunic and crowned. A harp is placed behind him.
Solomon .. ..	In royal robes, standing under an arch.

Symplegades, The. See CYANEAN ROCKS.

Symposium (sim pō' zi ūm). Properly, a drinking together (Gr. syn, together, posis, drink); hence, a convivial meeting for social and intellectual entertainment; hence, a discussion upon a subject, and the collected opinions of different authorities printed and published in a review, etc.

The Symposium is the title given to a dialogue by Plato, and another by Xenophon, in which the conversation of Socrates and others is recorded.

Syndicalism. The doctrine in economics that all the workers in any industry should have a share in the control and in the profits arising from it, and that to compass this end the workers in the different trades should federate and enforce their demands by sympathetic strikes. The word was first used about 1907, and was coined from the French chambre syndicale (syndic, a delegate), a trade union.

Synecdoche (si nek' dō ke). The figure of speech which consists of putting a part for the whole, the whole for the part, a more comprehensive for a less comprehensive term, or vice versa. Thus, a hundred bayonets (for a hundred soldiers), the town was starving (for the people in the town).

Now will I remember you farther of that manner of speech which the Greekes call Synecdoche, and we the figure of quick conceite . . . as when one would tell how the French king was overthrown at Saint Quintans, I am enforced to think that it was not the king himself in person, but the Constable of Fraunce with the French kings power.—PUTTENHAM: Arte of English Poesie, Bk. iii (1589).

Synoptic Gospels, The. Those of Matthew, Mark, and Luke; so called because, taken together and apart from that of John, they form a synopsis (Gr., a seeing together), i.e. a general view or conspectus, of the life and sayings of Christ.

Hence, the Synoptic Problem, the questions as to the origin and relationship of these three; Mark is generally supposed to be a source of Matthew and Luke, and Luke to have borrowed from Matthew.

Syntax, Doctor (sin' tāk's). The pious, hen-pecked clergyman, very simple-minded but of excellent taste and scholarship, created by William Combe (1741-1823) to accompany a series of coloured comic illustrations by Rowlandson. His adventures are told in eight-syllabled verse in the Three Tours of Dr. Syntax (1812, 1820, and 1821).

Syrinx (sī' rings). An Arcadian nymph of Greek legend. On being pursued by Pan she took refuge in the river Ladon, and prayed to be changed into a reed; the prayer was granted, and of the reed Pan made his pipes. Hence the name is given to the Pan-pipe, or reed mouth-organ, and also to the vocal organ of birds.

T

T. The twentieth letter of the alphabet, representing Semitic taw and Greek tau, which meant "a mark." Our T is a modification of the earlier form, X. See also TAU.

It fits to a T. Exactly. The allusion is to work that mechanics square with a T-square, a ruler with a cross-piece at one end, especially useful in making right angles, and in obtaining perpendiculars and parallel lines.

Marked with a T. Notified as a felon. Persons convicted of felony, and admitted to the benefit of clergy, were branded on the thumb with the letter T (thief). The law authorizing this was abolished in 1827.

Taal (tal). The dialect of Dutch spoken in South Africa. It originated in the colloquial North Dutch of the 17th century but early underwent great changes. It is now frequently called Afrikaans.

Tabard (täb' ard). A jacket with short pointed sleeves, whole before, open on both sides, with a square collar, winged at the shoulder like a cape, and worn by military nobles over their armour. It was generally emblazoned with heraldic devices. Herald's still wear tabards.

The Tabard Inn. The inn whence pilgrims from London used to set out on their journey to Canterbury; it was on the London estate of the abbots of Hyde, and lay in the Southwark (now Borough) High Street, a little to the south of London Bridge. It and its host, Harry Baily, are immortalized in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales.

Tabardar. A scholar on the foundation of Queen's College, Oxford; so called because they wore gowns with tabard sleeves—that is, loose sleeves, terminating a little below the elbow in a point.

Tabby. Originally the name (from Arabic) of a silk material with a "watered" surface, giving an effect of wavy lines; applied to the brownish cat with dark stripes, because its markings resembled this material.

Demurest of the tabby kind,
The pensive Selima reclined.
GRAY: On the Death of a Favourite Cat.

Tabernacles, Feast of. A Jewish festival lasting eight days and beginning on the 15th Tisri (towards the end of September). Kept in remembrance of the sojourn in the wilderness, it was also the Feast of Ingathering. It was formerly a time of great rejoicing.

Table. Apelles' table. A pictured board (Lat. tabula) or table, representing the excellency of sobriety on one side and the deformity of intemperance on the other.

Table d'hôte (Fr., the host's table). The "ordinary" at an hotel or restaurant; the meal for which one pays a fixed price whether one partakes of all the courses provided or not. In the Middle Ages, and even down to the reign of Louis XIV, the landlord's or host's table was the only public dining-place known in Germany and France.

Table money or charge. A charge additional to that of the meal made at restaurants, etc., towards the cost of attendance; or a small fee charged to players at Bridge clubs; also, in the Army, Navy, and Diplomatic Service, an allowance made to assist in meeting the expense of official entertaining.

Table-talk. Small talk, chit-chat, familiar conversation.

Table-turning. The turning of tables without the application of mechanical force, which in the early days of spiritualism was commonly practised at séances, and sank to the level of a parlour trick. It was said by some to be the work of departed spirits, and by others to be due to a force akin to mesmerism.

Table of Pythagoras. The common multiplication table, carried up to ten. The table is parcelled off into a hundred little squares or cells. The name first appears in a corrupt text of Boethius, who was really referring to the abacus (q.v.).

Tables of Cebes. Cebes was a Theban philosopher, a disciple of Socrates, and one of the interlocutors of Plato's Phædo. His Tables or Tableau supposes him to be placed before a tableau or panorama representing the life of man, which the philosopher describes with great accuracy of judgment and splendour of sentiment. It is sometimes appended to the works of Epictetus.

The Round Table, or Table Round. See ROUND.

The Tables of Toledo. See TABULÆ TOLETANÆ.

The Twelve Tables. The tables of the Roman laws engraved on brass, brought from Athens to Rome by the decemvirs.

To lay on the table. The parliamentary phrase for postponing consideration of a motion, proposal, bill, etc., indefinitely. Hence, to table a matter is to defer it sine die.

To turn the tables. To reverse the conditions or relations; as, for instance, to rebut a charge by bringing forth a counter-charge. The phrase comes from the old custom of reversing the table or board, in games such as chess and draughts, so that the opponent's relative position is altogether changed.

Tableaux vivants (Fr., living pictures). Representations of statuary groups by living persons; said to have been invented by Madame de Genlis (1746-1830) while she had charge of the children of the Duc d'Orléans.

Taboo, tabu. (Maori tapu). A custom among the South Sea Islanders of prohibiting the use of certain persons, places, animals, things, etc., or the utterances of certain names and words; it signifies that which is banned, interdicted, or "devoted" in a religious sense. Thus, a temple is taboo, and so is he who violates a temple. Not only so, but everyone and everything connected with what is taboo becomes taboo also; Captain Cook was taboo because some of his sailors took wood from a Hawaiian temple to supply themselves with fuel, and being "devoted," he was slain. The whole subject of taboo is a highly complicated and technical department of sociology.

With us, a person who is ostracized, or an action, custom, etc., that is altogether forbidden by Society, is said to be taboo, or tabooed.

Women, up till this
Cramped under worse than South-sea-isle taboo,
Dwarfs of the gynæceum, fail.

TENNYSON: Princess, iii, 278.

Tabouret (täb' oo ret) (Fr.). A low stool without back or arms. In the ancient French court certain ladies had the droit de tabouret (right of sitting on a tabouret in the presence of the queen). At first it was limited to princesses; but subsequently it was extended to all the chief ladies of the queen's household; and later still the wives of ambassadors, dukes, lord chancellors, and keepers of the seals, enjoyed the privilege. Gentlemen similarly privileged had the droit de fauteuil.

Tabula rasa (tăb' ū la rā' ză) (Lat., a scraped tablet). A clean slate—literally and figuratively—on which anything can be written. Thus, we say that the mind of a person who has been badly taught must become a tabula rasa before he can learn anything properly.

Tabulæ Toletanæ (tăb' ū lē tol e tā' nē). The astronomical tables composed by order of Alphonso X of Castile, hence they are also known as the Alphonsine Tables. They were produced in 1252, being compiled by 50 astronomers working at Toledo and basing their calculations on that point.

His Tables Toletanes forth he brought,
Ful wel corrected ne ther lakked nought.

CHAUCER: Franklin's Tale, 545.

Tace. Latin for candle. Silence is most discreet. Tace is Latin for "be silent," and candle is symbolical of light. The phrase means "keep it dark," do not throw light upon it. Fielding, in Amelia (ch. x), says, "Tace, madam, is Latin for candle." There is an historical allusion worth remembering. It was customary at one time to express disapprobation of a play or actor by throwing a candle on the stage, and when this was done the curtain was immediately drawn down. W. C. Oulton's History of the Theatres of London (1796) gives us an instance of this which occurred January 25th, 1772, at Covent Garden Theatre, when the piece before the public was An Hour Before Marriage. Someone threw a candle on the stage, and the curtain was dropped at once.

There are some old stories that cannot be ripped up again with entire safety to all concerned. Tace is Latin for candle.—SCOTT: Redgauntlet, ch. xi.

Mum. William mum. Tace is Latin for candle.—W. B. YEATS: Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 205.

We have several of these phrases; see BRANDY IS LATIN FOR GOOSE.

Tack. The use of this word by sailors as meaning food is of unknown origin. Hard Tack is a large, coarse, hard biscuit baked with salt and at one time a staple of diet in the foci's mess. Soft tack is good, easily masticated food such as was served at the captain's table.

Tacky (U.S.A.). Small pony—a derogatory term.

Tactics, in the science of war is the art of manoeuvring bodies of men, ships, etc., in contact with the enemy; strategy is the art of manoeuvring before contact, so that when contact is made it will be to the enemy's disadvantage.

Tages (tā' jēz). In Etruscan mythology a mysterious boy with the wisdom of an old man who was ploughed up, or who sprang from, the ground at Tarquinii. He is said to have been the grandson of Jupiter and to have instructed the Etruscans in the arts of augury. The latter wrote down his teaching in twelve books, which were known as "the books of Tages," or "the Acherontian books."

Tāē-pings. Chinese rebels of about 1850 to 1864. The word means Universal Peace, and arose thus; Hung Hsiu-ch'uan, a man of humble birth, and an unsuccessful candidate for a government office, was converted to Christianity and gave out that he was the chosen instrument in God's hands to uproot idolatry and establish the dynasty of Universal Peace. He soon collected a numerous following, and in 1853 seized the city of Nanking. In 1864 Major Gordon ("Chinese Gordon") overthrew Hung's army, and the insurrection was put down, after the loss of over a million lives and incalculable property.

Taffeta or Taffety (tăf' e tā, tăf' e ti). A material made of silk; at one time it was watered; hence Taylor says, "No taffaty more changeable than they." The word is from the Persian taftan, to twist or cure.

The fabric has often changed its character. At one time it was silk and linen, at another silk and wool. In the eighteenth century it was lustrous silk, sometimes striped with gold.

Taffeta phrases. Smooth sleek phrases, euphemisms. We also use the words fustian, stuff, silken, shoddy, buckram, velvet, etc., to qualify phrases and literary compositions spoken or written.

Taffata phrases, silken terms precise,
Three-piled hyperboles

Love'. Labour's Lost, v, 2.

Taffy. A Welshman. So called from David, a very common name in Wales. Familiarly Davy, it becomes in Welsh Taffid, Taffy.

Tag, is the usual American name for the British children's game of "He."

Tag, rag and bobtail. See RAG, TAG AND BOBTAIL.

Tail. According to an old fable lions wipe out their footsteps with their tail, that they may not be tracked.

To tail is to follow a suspected person, keep him under observation, and prevent his escaping.

Out of the tail of one's eye. With a sidelong glance; just to see a thing "out of the corner of your eye."

To put salt on the tail. See SALT.

To turn tail. To turn one's back and run away.

Twisting the lion's tail. Seeing how far the "Britishers" will bear provocation. "To give the lion's tail another twist" is to tax the British forbearance a little further. The nation will put up with a deal rather than resort to the arbitration of arms.

With his tail between his legs. Very dejected, quite downcast. The allusion is to dogs.

Tailed men. There are no such beings as tailed men, but until the mid-19th century reports every now and then cropped up of tribes with tails having been discovered in Central Africa, New Guinea, or other little-known parts.

In the early Middle Ages it was widely believed on the Continent, especially in France, that all Englishmen had tails, and it was for long a saying that the men of Kent (the part nearest to France) were born with tails, as a punishment for the murder of Thomas à Becket.

For Becket's sake, Kent always shall have tails.

Andrew Marvell.

A Warwickshire Man will be known by his Grinn, as Roman-Catholics imagine a Kentish Man by his Tail.—ADDISON: Spectator, 173.

One account fastens the legend on the town of Strood:—

As Becket, that good saint, sublimely rode,
Thoughtless of insult, through the town of Strode,
What did the mob? Attacked his horse's rump
And cut the tail, so flowing, to the stump.
What does the saint? Quoth he, "For this vile trick
The town of Strode shall heartily be sick."
And lo! by power divine, a curse prevails—
The babes of Strode are born with horse's tails.

PETER PINDAR: Epistle to the Pope.

But in Ray's time (early 17th cent.) St. Augustine was generally credited with the miracle. He, it was said, was preaching to some pagan villagers when they, to make fun of him, fastened fish-tails to their posteriors, whereupon Augustine ordained that all the next generation should be born with tails; and it was so. This, moreover, was said to have taken place in Cerne, Dorsetshire, and not in Kent at all.

In the Middle Ages it was also popularly held that Jews were born with tails; this arose from a confusion of the word rabbi with raboin or rabuino, the devil, from Span. rabo, a tail.

Tail-end Charlie. An R.A.F. phrase in World War II for the last aircraft of a group on a mission—usually far behind the others and the recipient of spiteful attention from the enemy.

Taillefer (ti á fâr). A minstrel and warrior who accompanied William of Normandy to England in 1066. He went before the Norman army, singing of Charlemagne, Roland, and those who died at Roncevalles. He obtained permission to strike the first blow in the Battle of Hastings, where he was killed.

Tailor. Nine tailors make a man. An old expression of contempt at the expense of tailors signifying that a tailor is so much more feeble than anyone else that it would take nine of them to make a man of average stature and strength. As a fact, the occupation of a tailor, and the cramped position in which he works, are not conducive to good physique; but it has been suggested that tailor is probably a facetious transformation of teller, a teller being a stroke on the bell at a funeral, three being given for a child, six for a woman, and nine for a man.

The number mentioned is sometimes only three:—

Some foolish knave, I think, at first began

The slander that three taylors are one man.

TAYLOR: Workes, iii, 73 (1630).

The three tailors of Tooley Street. Canning says that three tailors of Tooley Street, Southwark, addressed a petition of grievances to the House of Commons, beginning—"We, the people of England." Hence the phrase is used of any pettifogging coterie that fancies it represents the nation.

Taiping. See TAEPING.

Taj Mahal (taj ma hal'). A mausoleum near Agra, built in 1650 by the great Mogul emperor Shah Jehan in memory of his favourite wife, Mumtaz Mahal. The name comes from one of her titles—Taj Mahal, Crown of the Palace. Designed by Ustad Isa, a Turk or Persian, this white marble building is the supreme achievement of the Mogul style.

Take. To be taken aback. To be quite surprised for the moment, flabbergasted. From a nautical term, used when a ship's sails are so caught by the wind that they are forced back against the mast and thus impede any way the ship may have on her.

To have a taking way with one. To be of an ingratiating disposition, able to make oneself liked at once; fetching way, winning way, mean the same thing.

To take after. To have a strong resemblance to, physically, mentally, etc. "Doesn't little Johnny take after his father?" "Most of Lawrence's paintings seem to take after Romney."

To take back one's words. To withdraw them, to recant.

To take down a peg. See PEG.

To take in. To deceive, gull. Hence, a regular take-in, a hoax, swindle.

To take into one's head. To conceive the notion that . . . ; to resolve to do so and so.

To take it out of someone. To exact satisfaction, to get one's own back; or, of oneself, to become thoroughly exhausted, as "Working after midnight does take it out of me."

To take it upon oneself. To make oneself responsible (perhaps unwarrantably) to assume control.

To take off. To mimic or ridicule; also to start, especially of an aeroplane or of one in an athletic contest, as jumping or racing.

To take on. To be upset or considerably affected. In the U.S.A., to assume, or adopt.

To take over. To assume the management, control, or ownership.

To take up. To take into custody, arrest; also used of patronizing people and getting them introductions into good society, etc.

"Yes, Lady Rockminster has took us up," said Lady Clavering.

"Taken us up, Mamma," cried Blanche, in a shrill voice.

"Well, taken us up, then," said my lady, "it's very kind of her, and I dare say we shall like it when we get used to it, only at first one don't fancy being took—well, taken up, at all."—THACKERAY: Pendennis, ch. xxxvii.

Tale. A tally; a reckoning. In Exod. v, 8, we have tale of bricks. A measure by number, as of a shepherd counting his sheep:—

And every shepherd tells his tale

Under the hawthorn in the dale.

MILTON: L'Allegro, 67.

An old wife's tale. Any marvellous legendary story. The phrase was used by George Peele as the title of a play (1595), and by Arnold Bennett as that of a novel (1908).

A tale of a tub. See TUB.

To tell tales out of school. To utter abroad affairs not meant for the public ear.

Talent. Ability, aptitude, a "gift" for something or other. The word is borrowed from the parable in Matt. xxv, 14-30, and was originally the name of a weight and piece of money in Assyria, Greece, Rome, etc. (Gr. talanton, a balance). The value varied, the later Attic talent weighing about 57 lb. troy, and being worth about £250.

The Ministry of All the Talents. The name ironically given to Grenville's coalition of 1806. It included Fox, Erskine, Fitzwilliam, Ellenborough, and Sidmouth. The term has also been applied—ironically—to later coalitions.

Tales (tāl' lēz). Persons in the court from whom selection is made to supply the place of jurors who have been empanelled, but are not in attendance. It is the first word of the Latin sentence providing for this contingency—Tales de circumstantibus, i.e., "from such (persons) as are standing about."

To serve for jurymen or tales.

BUTLER: Hudibras, Pt. iii, 8.

To pray a tales. To pray that the number of jurymen may be completed.

In the celebrated action Bardell v. Pickwick—

It was discovered that only ten special jurymen were present. Upon this, Mr. Serjeant Buzfuz prayed a tales; the gentleman in black then proceeded to press into the special jury, two of the common jurymen; and a greengrocer and a chemist were caught directly. —DICKENS: Pickwick Papers. ch. xxxiv.

Those who supplement the jury are called talesmen, and their names are set down in the talesbook.

Taliesin (tāl' iēs' in, tāl' i' sin). An ancient Welsh bard of whom very little is known. He is placed in the 6th century, is said to have been a schoolfellow of Gildas, and to have been buried at Aberystwyth. The so-called Book of Taliesin (given in the Mabinogion) is not earlier than the 13th century.

Taliesin is said to have prophesied that his nation would once again rule over England—a prophecy which was verified by the accession of Henry VII, son of Owen Tudor. Hence Gray's allusion to him—

What strings symphonious tremble in the air,
What strains of vocal transport round her play!
Hear from the grave great Taliessin, hear;
They breathe a soul to animate the clay.

The Bard.

Talisman. A charm or magical figure or word, such as the Abraxas (q.v.), which is cut on metal or stone, under the influence of certain planets; it is supposed to be sympathetic, and to receive an influence from the planets which it communicates to the wearer.

In Arabia a talisman consisting of a piece of paper, on which are written the names of the Seven Sleepers and their dog, to protect a house from ghosts and demons, is still used; and in order to free any place of vermin a talisman consisting of the figure of the obnoxious animal is made in wax or consecrated metal, in a planetary hour.

He swore that you had robbed his house,
And stole his talismanic louse

BUTLER: Hudibras, pt. iii, 1.

The word is the Arabic tlasman from the Greek telesma, mystery.

Tall anciently meant comely, fine, handsome, hence brave and valiant; and such phrases as a tall and proper man, a tall ship (i.e. one strong and well found in every respect) were used without any special reference to height.

You were good soldiers, and tall fellows. —SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii, 2.

The undaunted resolution and stubborn ferocity of Gwenwyn . . . had long made him beloved among the "Tall Men" or champions of Wales. —SCOTT: The Betrothed, ch. i.

Beyond the extreme sea-wall, and between the remotest sea-gates,

Waste water washes, and tall ships founder, and death waits. SWINBURNE: Hymn to Proserpine.

A tall tale. An incredible story.

Tally. To correspond. The tally used in the Exchequer was a rod of wood, marked on one face with notches (Fr. taille, a notch or incision) corresponding to the sum for which it was an acknowledgment. Two other sides contained the date, the name of the payer, and so on. The rod was then cleft in such a manner that each half contained one written side and half of every notch. One part was kept in the Exchequer, and the other was circulated. When payment was required the two parts were compared, and if they "tallied," or made a tally, all was right; if not, there was some fraud, and payment was refused.

The last tally was issued in 1826. In 1834 orders were issued for their destruction. Two cartloads of them were lighted as a bonfire, and the conflagration set on fire the Houses of Parliament, which, with their offices and part of the Palace of Westminster, were burnt to the ground.

Tallyman. A travelling hawkier who calls at private houses to sell wares on the tally system—that is, part payment on account, and other parts when the man calls again; so called because he keeps a tally or score of his transactions.

To live tally, or make a tally bargain. Said of a couple who live together as man and wife without being married—presumably because they do so as their tastes tally, and not from any reason of compulsion.

Tally-ho! The cry of fox-hunters on catching sight of the fox. It is the English form of the old French taiant, which was similarly used in deer-hunting, and also as a cry to the hounds when their share of the disembowelled stag was thrown to them.

Talmud, The (tāl' mūd) (Heb., instruction). The body of Jewish civil and religious law not contained in, but largely derived from, the Pentateuch. The name was originally applied only to the Gemara (q.v.), but it now usually includes also the Mishna (q.v.).

When the Talmud is spoken of without any qualification the reference is to the Babylonian Talmud, one of the two recensions of the Gemara, the other being the Palestinian Talmud, which is of only about a fourth the volume of the Babylonian, and is considered by Jews of less authority. The Babylonian codification dates from the 5th or 6th century, the Palestinian (or Jerusalem) from about a century earlier.

Talus (tā' lūs). In Greek mythology, a man of brass, made by Hephaestus (Vulcan), the guardian of Crete. Whenever he caught a stranger on the island he made himself red-hot and embraced him to death.

He is introduced by Spenser into the Faerie Queene (Bk. v) as the "yron man" attendant upon Sir Artegal, and representing executive power—"swift as a swallow, and as lion strong."

Tamasha (tā ma' shā). A Hindustani word meaning a spectacle, an entertainment on a lavish scale, a show worth seeing.

Tamburlaine, Tamerlane (tām' bērlān, tām' ērlān). Names under which the Tartar conqueror Timur, or Timur-leng, i.e. "Timur the Lame" (1333-1405), is immortalized in Elizabethan drama. He had his capital at Samarkand, was ruler of vast territories in central Asia and a great part of India, and died while preparing to invade China. Tamburlaine the Great (acted in 1587), a blank verse tragedy, was Marlowe's first play. In Rowe's play, Tamerlane (1702), the warrior appears as a calm, philosophic prince—out of compliment to William III.

Taming of the Shrew, The. Shakespeare's play (first printed in the 1623 Folio) was a re-writing of an anonymous comedy—The Taming of A Shrew—printed in 1594; its theme, a recipe for the management of wives, was very popular with contemporary audiences. See SLV.

Tammany Hall (tām' ā nī). The headquarters (in 14th Street, New York) of the controlling organization of the Democratic Party in New York City and State; hence, the Party itself, and, as this has been so frequently prosecuted and exposed for bribery and corruption, used figuratively for wholesale and systematic political or municipal malpractice.

Tammany was the name of a 17th-century Delaware chief, and the patriotic, anti-British leagues of pre-Revolutionary days adopted the name "St. Tammany" to ridicule the titles of loyalist organizations—Societies of St. George, St. Andrew, and so on. After the Revolution these leagues became anti-aristocratic clubs, but all soon died a natural death except "Tammany Society, No. 1," which was that of New York. This flourished, and was converted into a political machine by Aaron Burr in his conflict with Alexander Hamilton (about 1798), and in 1800 played a prominent part in the election of Jefferson to the Presidency.

Tammuz. See THAMMUZ.

Tam-o'-Shanter. The hero of Burns's poem of that name; the soft cloth headdress is so called from him.

Remember Tam-o'-Shanter's mare. You may pay too dear for your whistle, as Meg lost her tail, pulled off by Nannie of the "Cutty-sark," in Burns's poem.

Think, ye may buy the joys owre dear—
Remember Tam-o'-Shanter's mare.

BURNS: Tam-o'-Shanter.

Tanagra (tān' ā grā). The general name given to terracotta figurines of dancing girls, etc. Mostly of the 4th and 3rd centuries B.C., they were originally used as household gods or as ornaments, and buried in Greek tombs in Asia Minor, Greece, Sicily, and S. Italy. A great number of examples were found in 1870-72 in Tanagra, an ancient town of Boeotia.

Tancred (d. 1112). One of the chief heroes of the First Crusade, and a leading character in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. He was the son of Eudes (Otho) and Emma (sister of Robert Guiscard); Beaumont or Bohemond was his cousin. In the epic he was the greatest of all the Christian warriors except Rinaldo.

Disraeli's novel, Tancred (1846), is a fantastic romance, telling how an early-19th-century heir to a dukedom goes on a "New Crusade" to the Holy Land.

Tandem. A pair of horses harnessed one behind the other; hence applied to a bicycle ridden by two persons in this position. The word is a punning use of the Latin tandem, at length, i.e. of time; the horses being "lengthways" instead of side by side.

Tangle. A water sprite of the Orkneys; from Dan. tang, sea-weed, with which it is covered. It is fabled to appear sometimes in human form, and sometimes as a little apple-green horse.

Tangram. A Chinese puzzle consisting of a square cut into seven pieces—a square, a rhomboid, and five triangles, which can be fitted together to form a number of shapes and figures.

Tanist (Gael. tanaiste). The elected heir presumptive to an ancient Irish chieftain, chosen generally from among the chief's relations. Hence, tanistry, the ancient Irish tenure of lands and chieftainship.

Tanist stone. The monolith erected by the ancient Gaelic kings at their coronation; especially that called Liafail, which, according to tradition, is identical with the famous stone of Scone (q.v.), now forming part of the Coronation Chair in Westminster Abbey. It is said to have been set up at Icolmkil for the coronation of Fergus I of Scotland, a contemporary of Alexander the Great (about 300 B.C.), and son of Ferchard, King of Ireland.

Tank. The heavily armoured military motor fort, running on "caterpillar" wheels, enclosed, and with room in the interior for quick-firing guns and several men, was so called by the War Office before it made its first appearance to prevent information as to its real nature leaking out to the enemy. Telegrams, etc., with inquiries about tanks would cause no suspicion if they fell into enemy hands. Tanks were invented during World War I, and were first used in the British attack on the German lines at Flers, September 15th, 1916.

Tanner. Slang for a sixpenny piece. The term has been in use for over a hundred years.

Tannhäuser (tän' hoi zer). A lyrical poet, or minnesinger, of Germany, who flourished in the second half of the 13th century. He led a wandering life, and is said even to have visited the Far East; this fact, together with his Buszlied (song of repentance), and the general character of his poems, probably gave rise to the legend about him—which first appeared in a 16th-century German ballad. This relates how he spends a voluptuous year with Venus, in the Venusberg, a magic land reached through a subterranean cave; at last he obtains leave to visit the upper world, and goes to Pope Urban for absolution. "No," said His Holiness, "you can no more hope for mercy than this dry staff can be expected to bud again." Tannhäuser departs in despair; but on the third day the papal staff bursts into blossom; the Pope sends in every direction for Tannhäuser, but the knight is nowhere to be found, for, mercy having been refused, he has returned to end his days in the arms of Venus.

Tansy. A yellow-flowered perennial herb, so called from Gr. athanasia, immortality, because it is a sort of everlasting flower.

Tantalus (tän' tá lus). In Greek mythology, the son of Zeus and Pluto (daughter of Himantes). He was a Lydian king, highly honoured and prosperous; but, because he divulged to mortals the secrets of the gods, he was plunged up to the chin in a river of Hades, a tree hung with clusters of fruit being just above his head. As every time he tried to drink, the waters receded from him, and as the fruit was just out of reach, he suffered agony from thirst, hunger, and unfulfilled anticipation.

Hence our verb, to tantalize, to excite a hope and disappoint it; and hence the name tantalus applied to a lock-up spirit chest in which the bottles are visible but un-get-at-able without the key.

Tantivy Men (tän tiv' i). The High Churchmen and Tories of the post-Restoration period; so called because about 1680 they were caricatured as being mounted on the Church of England, "riding tantivy" to Rome. To ride tantivy (a hunting term) is to ride at a rapid gallop.

Tantony Pig. The smallest pig of a litter, which, according to the old proverb, will follow its owner anywhere. So called in honour of St. Anthony, who was the patron saint of swineherds and is frequently represented with a little pig at his side.

Tantony is also applied to a small church bell—or to any hand-bell—for there is usually a bell round the neck of St. Anthony's pig or attached to the Tau-cross he carries. See ANTHONY, ST.

Tantras, The (tän' träs). Sanskrit religious writings, forming the Bible of the Shaktas, a Hindu religion the adherents of which worship the divine power in its female aspect.

The Tantras consist of magical formulas for the most part in the form of dialogues between Shiva and his wife, and treat of the creation and ultimate destruction of the world, divine worship, the attainment of superhuman power, and final union with the Supreme Spirit. They are of comparatively recent date (6th or 7th cent. A.D.).

Tantra is Sanskrit for thread, or warp, and hence is used of groundwork, order, or doctrine of religion.

Taoism (tä' ō izm). One of the three great religious systems of China (Confucianism and Buddhism being the others), founded by the philosopher Lao-tsze (about 604-523 B.C.), and based on the Tao-teh-king (Book of Reason and Virtue), reputed to be by him.

Tap Dance. A quick-time dance in which the rhythm is beaten out on the floor with the dancer's toe or heel, or both alternately. On the stage shoes with a double sole are worn in order that the tap will be more readily audible.

Tap-up Sunday. An old local name for the Sunday preceding October 2nd, when a fair was held on St. Catherine's Hill, near Guildford. So called because any person, with or without a licence, might open a "tap," or sell beer on the hill for that one day.

Tapis (täp' ē). On the tapis. On the carpet; under consideration; now being ventilated. An English-French phrase, referring to the tapis or cloth with which the table of the council chamber is covered, and on which are laid the motions before the House.

My business comes now upon the tapis.—FARQUHAR: The Beaux Stratagem, iii, 3.

Tapley, Mark. Martin's servant and companion in Dickens's Martin Chuzzlewit; often taken as the type of one who is jolly under all circumstances, never downhearted, and invariably cheerful.

Tappit-hen. A Scots term, properly for a hen with a crest or tuft on its head, but generally used for a large beer or wine measure. Readers of Waverley will remember (in ch. xi) the Baron Bradwardine's tappit-hen of claret "containing at least three English quarts."

Weel she lo'ed a Hawick gill
And leugh to see a tappit-hen.

To have a tappit-hen under the belt is to have swallowed three quarts. Cp. HEN AND CHICKENS; JEROBOAM.

Tar. Jack Tar. A sailor; probably an abbreviation of tarpaulin, of which sailors' caps and overalls are made. Tarpaulins are tarred cloths, and are commonly used on board ship to keep articles from the sea-spray, etc.

To beat the tar out of. To belabour, or beat without mercy. The phrase possibly originated in the attempt to free a sheep's wool from the tar applied to heal any cuts received during shearing.

Tar-heel, the colloquial name for a native of North Carolina; that State is known as the Tar-heel State.

All tarred with the same brush. All alike to blame; all sheep of the same flock. The allusion is to the custom of distinguishing the sheep of any given flock by a common mark with a brush dipped in tar.

Tarred and feathered. Stripped to the skin, daubed with tar, and then rolled in feathers so that the feathers adhere; a common popular punishment in primitive communities, and still occasionally resorted to.

The first record of this punishment is in 1189 (1 Rich. 1). A statute was made that any robber voyaging with the crusaders "shall be first shaved, then boiling pitch shall be poured upon his head, and a cushion of feathers shook over it." The wretch was then to be put on shore at the very first place the ship came to (Rymer: Fœdera, i, 65).

Tarantella (tār'ăn tel' à). A very quick Neapolitan dance (or its music) for one couple, said to have been based on the gyrations practised by those whom the tarantula had poisoned.

Tarantula (tā răn' tū lă). A large and hairy venomous spider (so called from Taranto, Lat. Tarentum, a town in Apulia, Italy, where they abound), whose bite was formerly supposed to be the cause of the dancing mania hence known as tarantism. This was an hysterical disease, common, epidemically, in southern Europe from the 15th to the 17th centuries.

At the close of the fifteenth century we find that Tarantism has spread beyond the boundaries of Apulia, and that the fear of being bitten by venomous spiders had increased. Nothing short of death itself was expected from the wound which these insects inflicted, and if those who were bitten escaped with their lives, they were said to be seen pining away in a desponding state of lassitude.—HECKER: Epidemics of the Middle Ages (1859).

Targums. The name given to the various Aramaic (Chaldean) translations and interpretations of the Old Testament. They were transmitted orally from the period soon after the Captivity, and were not written down until about the close of the 1st century A.D.

Tariff. A table of duties or customs, payable on the importation or exportation of goods; hence, a table of charges generally, as of those at an hotel or restaurant. The word is the Arabic tarif, information, which was adopted in Old French as tariffe, for arithmetic.

Tariff reform. A political movement in Great Britain, inaugurated in 1903 by Joseph Chamberlain (1836-1914), for the extension of the tariff on imports, principally with the object of preventing "dumping" (i.e. the disposal in our own country of surplus or unsaleable goods manufactured abroad at such a price that the home markets are cut out), and for the protection of home industries.

Tarot Cards (tă' rôt). Italian playing-cards, first used in the 14th century and still occasionally employed for fortune-telling. A pack contains 78 cards; 4 suits of numeral cards with four coat-cards, i.e. king, queen, chevalier, and valet, and in addition to the four suits 22 atutti cards, or trumps, known as tarots.

Tarpaulin. See TAR.

Tarpeian Rock (tār pē' ăn). An ancient rock or peak (now no longer in existence) of the Capitoline Hill, Rome; so called from Tarpeia, a vestal virgin, the daughter of Spurius Tarpeius, governor of the citadel, who, according to the legend, agreed to open the gates to the Sabines if they would give her "what they wore on their arms" (meaning their bracelets). The Sabines, "keeping their promise to the ear," crushed her to death with their shields, and her body was hurled from the Tarpeian Rock. Subsequently, traitors were cast down this rock and so killed.

Bear him to the rock Tarpeian, and from thence Into destruction cast him.

Coriolanus, iii, 1.

Tarquin (tar' kwin). The family name of a legendary line of early Roman kings, Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth king of Rome, is dated 617-578 B.C. His son, Tarquinius Superbus, was the seventh (and last) king of Rome, and it was his son, Tarquinius Sextus, who committed the rape on Lucretia, in revenge for which the Tarquins were expelled from Rome and a Republic established.

Tarquin is also the name of a "recreant knight" figuring in the Arthurian cycle.

Tart. As applied to a harlot or girl of loose sexual morals this word dates back to Victorian times and in all probability is a contraction of "sweetheart."

Tartan Plaid. A plaid of a tartan, or chequered, pattern. A plaid is some twelve yards of narrow cloth wrapped round the waist, or over the chest and one shoulder, and reaching to the knees. It may be chequered or not; but the English use of the word in such a compound as Scotch plaids, meaning chequered cloth, is a blunder for Scotch tartans. The tartan is the chequered pattern, every clan having its own tartan. Though the thing is now typically Scottish, the word is from Tartar (Lat. Tartarus).

Tartar or Tatar. The name employed in China and in mediæval Europe for the tribes of Central Asian nomads. Under Jenghiz Khan and his successors they established the kingdom of Tartary, and from 1238 to 1462 dominated Eastern Europe. The Tatar Republic is an autonomous republic of the U.S.S.R., with its capital in Kazan.

To catch a Tartar. See CATCH.

Tartarian Lamb. See SCYTHIAN.

Tartarus. The infernal regions of classical mythology; used as equivalent to Hades (q.v.) by later writers, but by Homer placed as far beneath Hades as Hades is beneath the earth. It was here that Zeus confined the Titans. Cp. HELL.

Tartuffe (tar tuf'). The principal character of Molière's comedy so titled; a pedantic, obscene, and hypocritical poltroon, said to be drawn from the Abbé de Roquette, a parasite of the Prince de Condé. The name is from the Italian tartuffoli (truffles), and was suggested to Molière on seeing the sudden animation which lighted up the faces of certain monks when they heard that a seller of truffles awaited their orders.

Tassel-gentle. The male goshawk trained for falconry; tassel being a corruption of tiercel, a male hawk, which is a third (tierce) less in size than the female, and called gentle because of its tractable disposition.

Shakespeare uses the term figuratively for a sweetheart:—

O for a falconer's voice
To lure this tassel-gentle back again!

Romeo and Juliet, ii, 2.

Tattoo. The beat of drum at night to recall soldiers to barracks is so called from Dutch taptoe, closed or put to. In the mid-17th century, when the word came into use, it was written tap-100, tapp-100, etc.

The other tattoo, to mark the skin by rubbing indelible pigments into small punctures, is one of our very few words from Polynesian. It is Tahitian (tatau, mark), and was introduced by Captain Cook (1769).

The devil's tattoo. See DEVIL.

Torchlight tattoo. A military entertainment, carried out at night in the open air with illuminations, evolutions, and a lot of music.

Tau. The letter T in Greek and the Semitic languages. Anciently it was the last letter of the Greek alphabet (as it still is of the Hebrew); and in Middle English literature the phrase Alpha to Omega was not infrequently rendered Alpha to Tau.

Tau cross. A T-shaped cross, especially St. Anthony's cross.

Tauchnitz (touch' nits). The famous library of British and American books in English, bound in paper for circulation on the Continent of Europe, was founded by the Freiherr Christian Bernhard Tauchnitz (1816-95) in 1841, in Leipzig. He came of a family which had been in the publishing business for several generations.

Taurus (taw' rûs) (Lat., the bull). The second zodiacal constellation, and the second sign of the Zodiac, which the sun enters about April 21st.

As bees

In spring-time, when the sun with Taurus rides,
Put forth their populous youth about the hive
In clusters.—MILTON: Paradise Lost, I, 768.

Taverner's Bible. See BIBLE, THE ENGLISH.

Tawdry. A corruption of St. Audrey (Audrey itself being a corruption of Etheldrida). At the annual fair of St. Audrey, in the isle of Ely, cheap jewellery, and showy lace called St. Audrey's lace was sold; hence tawdry, which is applied to anything gaudy, in bad taste, and of little value. Cp. TANTONY.

Come, you promised me a tawdry lace and a pair of sweet gloves.—Winter's Tale, iv, 4.

Taxi, short for taximeter, is the accepted term for a motor cab. In France the taximeter for registering distances and fares was employed on horse-drawn cabs or fiacres long before motor cabs were put on the road. In Britain the taximeter became common only with the appearance of motor cabs, and the term accordingly became associated with them. An aeroplane is said to taxi when it moves along the ground under its own power.

Taylor's Institute. The University Museum at Oxford. So called from Sir Robert Taylor (1714-88), who made large bequests towards its erection.

Te Deum, The (tē dē' um). This liturgical hymn, so called from the opening words of the Latin original, Te Deum laudamus ("Thee, God, we praise"), was formerly ascribed to St. Ambrose, but is probably of later date. The story was that St. Ambrose improvised it while baptizing St. Augustine (386). In allusion to this tradition, it is sometimes called "the Ambrosian Hymn," and in some of our early psalters it is entitled "Canticum Ambrosii et Augustini."

Te Igitur. One of the service-books of the Roman Catholic Church; so called from the first words of the canon of the Mass, Te igitur ("Thee, therefore") clementissime Pater.

Oaths upon the Te Igitur. Oaths sworn on this service-book, which were regarded as especially sacred.

Tea. A nice old cup of tea. An ironical slang expression, which is applied to awkward occurrences, unpleasant situations, or muddles.

A tea-fight. A tea-party; especially a church or chapel gathering at which tea and buns, etc., are provided.

Tea-kettle broth. "Poor man's soup," consisting of hot water, bread, and a small lump of butter, with pepper and salt; the French soup maigre.

Not my cup of tea. Not at all in my line, not what I want or am suited for.

Teapoy (tē' poi). A small, three- or four-legged occasional table. Though largely used for standing a teatray upon, the teapoy has really nothing to do with tea, the name coming from the Hindustani teen, three and the Persian pae, a foot.

Teague. A contemptuous name for an Irishman (from the Irish personal name), rarely used nowadays but common in the 17th and 18th centuries.

Was't Carwell, brother James, or Teague,
That made thee break the Triple League?

ROCHESTER: History of Insidies.

Tear (târ). To tear Christ's body. To use imprecations. The common oaths of mediæval times were by different parts of the Lord's body; hence the preachers used to talk of "tearing God's body by imprecations."

Hir othes been so grete and so dampnable
That it is grisly for to heere hem swere;
Our blisid Lordes body thay to-tere.

CHAUCER: Pardoner's Tale, 144.

Tear (têr). Tear-shell. A projectile which, on bursting, liberates gases which irritate the lachrymatory glands of all within range, causing the eyes to water and rendering them temporarily useless. Also called a "lachrymatory shell."

Tears of Eos. The dewdrops of the morning were so called by the Greeks. Eos was the mother of Memnon (q.v.), and wept for him every morning.

St. Lawrence's tears. See LAWRENCE.

The Vale of Tears. This world (cp. BACA).

Tec, or 'Tec. Slang for a detective.

Teeth. See TOOTH.

Teetotal. A word expressive of total abstinence from alcoholic liquors as beverages, coined about 1833 by Dick Turner, an artisan at Preston, Lancashire.

Turner's tombstone contains the inscription: "Beneath this stone are deposited the remains of Richard Turner, author of the word Teetotal as applied to abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, who departed this life on the 27th day of October, 1846, aged 36 years."

Teetotum. A top for spinning with the fingers, having usually four or six flat sides each of which is marked with a letter, figure, or other symbol. The top is spun, and the players follow the direction indicated by the side that is uppermost when it comes to rest. The modern "Put and Take" (q.v.) is an adaptation of the teetotum, the early forms of which had four sides, marked "T" (Lat. totum, all, meaning take all the stakes), "P" (Lat. pone, put, i.e. put down, or pay in), "N" (nihil, nothing), and "H" (half), or sometimes "A" (aufer, take away).

Teian Muse, The (ti'ân). Anacreon (about B.C. 563-478), who was born at Teos, Asia Minor.

The Scian and the Teian muse,

The hero's heart, the lover's lute,

Have found the fame your shores refuse.

BYRON: The Isles of Greece.

Telamones (tel a mō' nēz). Large, sculptured male figures (cp. ATLANTES; CARYATIDES) serving as architectural columns or pilasters. So called from the Greek legendary hero Telamon (father of Ajax), who took part in the Calydonian hunt and the expedition of the Argonauts.

Telemachus (tel em' à kus). The only son of Ulysses and Penelope. After the fall of Troy he went, attended by Athene in the guise of Mentor, in quest of his father. He ultimately found him, and the two returned to Ithaca and slew Penelope's suitors.

Telemark (tel' e mark). The name of a swing or turn in ski-ing. Telemark is the district in Norway where ski-ing began as a sport, about 1860.

Telepathy (tè lep' à thi). The word invented in 1882 by F. W. H. Myers to describe "the communication of impressions of any kind from one mind to another independently of the recognized channels of sense." The term "thought-transference" is often used for this phenomenon and more nearly expresses its implications, for it indicates the communication of thought from one person to another without the medium of speech.

Telephus. See ACHILLEA.

Tell, William. The legendary national hero of Switzerland, whose deeds are based on a Teutonic myth of widespread occurrence in northern Europe.

Fable has it that Tell was the champion of the Swiss in the War of Independence against the Emperor Albert I (slain 1308). Tell refused to salute the cap of Gessler, the imperial governor, and for this act of independence was sentenced to shoot with his bow and arrow an apple from the head of his own son. He succeeded in this dangerous trial, but in his agitation dropped an arrow from his robe. The governor insolently demanded what the second arrow was for, and Tell fearlessly replied, "To shoot you with, had I failed in the task imposed upon me." Gessler now ordered him to be carried in chains across the lake, and cast into Küssnacht castle, a prey "to the reptiles that lodged there." He was, however, rescued by the peasantry, and, having shot Gessler, freed his country from the Austrian yoke.

B.D.—29

The earliest form of the legend is found in the old Norse Vilkina Saga (based on Teutonic sources).

Saxo Grammaticus tells nearly the same story respecting Toki, who killed Harald, and similar tales are told of Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough, William of Cloueslie and Henry IV, Olaf and Eindridi, etc.

Kissling's monument at Altorf (1892), has four reliefs on the pedestal: (1) Tell shooting the apple; (2) Tell's leap from the boat; (3) Gessler's death; and (4) Tell's death at Schachenbach.

Teller. Anciently, one who kept the tallies (Anglo-Fr. tallier) and counted the money; now, a bank-clerk who receives and pays out money at the counter.

Up to 1834 there were four officers of the Exchequer known as Tellers of the Exchequer, whose duty was to receive and pay out moneys. See TALLY.

When shall our prayers end?

I tell thee (priest) . . .

When proud surveyors take no parting pence,

When Silver sticks not on the Teller's fingers,

And when receivers pay as they receive.

GASCOIGNE: The Steel Glass (1876).

Temora (tem' ôr à). One of the principal poems of Ossian (q.v.), in eight books, so called from the royal residence of the kings of Connaught.

Templars or Knights Templar. Nine French knights bound themselves, at the beginning of the 12th century, to protect pilgrims on their way to the Holy Land, and received the name of Templars, because their arms were kept in a building given to them for the purpose by the abbot of the convent on the site of the old Temple of Solomon, at Jerusalem. They used to call themselves the "Poor Soldiers of the Holy City."

Their habit was a long white mantle, to which subsequently was added a red cross on the left shoulder. Their war-cry was Bauseant (an old French name for a black and white horse), from their banner, which was striped black and white, and charged with a red cross. Their seal showed two knights riding on one horse, the story being that the first Master was so poor that he had to share a horse with one of his followers.

The Order afterwards became very wealthy and corrupt, and so powerful that its suppression (effected in 1312) was necessary for the peace of Europe.

In England the Order had its first house (built about 1121) near Holborn Bars, London, but a site between Fleet Street and the Thames was given to them by 1162, and here they were settled till Edward II suppressed the English branch and confiscated its possessions. The lands and buildings went to the Knights Hospitallers who, in the reign of Edward III, granted them to the "students of the Common Laws of England" (Stow).

In Paris the stronghold of the Knights Templar was taken over in 1313 by the Knights of St. John. The old tower later became a prison where, in 1792, the royal family of France was incarcerated. Louis XVI, Marie Antoinette, and Princess Elizabeth went thence to the guillotine, and the Dauphin (Louis XVII) probably died within its walls. The tower was demolished by Napoleon in the early years of the Empire.

Temple, The. The site between Fleet Street and the Thames formerly occupied by the buildings of the Knights Templar (see TEMPLARS above), of which the Temple Church (dating from 1185) is the only portion now remaining though it was badly damaged in the air raids on London in 1940.

Since 1346 the Temple has been in the possession of doctors and students of the law, who, since 1609, have formed the two Inns of Court (q.v.) known as the Inner and Middle Temples. The badge of the former is the Winged Horse (Pegasus), that of the latter the Lamb (Agnus Dei).

The Inner Temple Hall is modern (1870), but that of the Middle Temple was one of the finest Elizabethan halls in existence. It was built in 1572, and Shakespeare's play of Twelfth Night was probably performed here in 1602. Both were destroyed in air raids, but have since been rebuilt.

Temple Bar. The old Fleet Street gateway into the City, formerly situated close to the entrance into the Temple, on the spot now marked by the monument known as the "Griffin." It was built by Wren in 1670, and was removed and re-erected in private grounds at Theobalds Park, Cheshunt, Herts, in 1878. It was long used for the exhibition of the heads of traitors and conspirators, and was hence sometimes called "the City Golgotha."

Temple. The name of the place of worship is the Lat. templum, from Gr. temenos, a sacred enclosure, i.e. a space cut off from its surroundings (Gr. temnein, to cut). The Lat. templum originally denoted the space marked out by the augurs (q.v.) within which the sign was to occur.

The temples of the forehead represent Lat. tempora (pl. of tempus, time), the fatal spot, the temples.

Temple of Solomon, The. The central place of Jewish worship, erected by Solomon and his Tyrian workmen (probably on Phœnician models) on Mount Moriah, Jerusalem, about 1006 B.C. It was destroyed at the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (588 B.C.), and some 70 years later the Temple of Zerubbabel was completed on its site. In 20 B.C. Herod the Great began the building of the last Temple—that of the New Testament—which was utterly destroyed during the siege of Jerusalem by Vespasian and Titus in A.D. 70. For many centuries the site has been covered by the Moslem mosque of Haram esh Sherif.

The chief emblems of the Jewish Temple were:—

The golden candlestick.

The shewbread. The twelve loaves representing the twelve tribes of Israel.

The incense of sweet spices. Prayer, which rises to heaven as incense.

The Holy of Holies. The nation of the Jews as God's peculiar people.

See Exod. xxv, 30-32; Rev. i, 12-20; and see also JACHIN AND BOAZ.

Tempora mutantur (Lat., the times are changed). The tag is founded on Omnia mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis (all things are changed, and we with them), a saying of Nicholas Borbonius, a Latin poet of the 16th century. Lothair, Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, had, it is stated, already said, Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis.

Ten. Ten to one. Expressive of a very strong probability; as, "It's ten to one that it will rain to-night," i.e. it's extremely likely to; a ten to one chance, one in which it is very much more likely that you will win than lose.

The Council of Ten. A secret tribunal exercising unlimited powers in the old Venetian republic. Instituted in 1310 with ten members, it was later enlarged to 17, and continued in active existence till the fall of the republic in 1797.

The Ten Commandments. A humorous expression for the ten fingers, especially when used by an angry woman for scratching her opponent's face.

Could I come near your beauty with my nails,
I'd set my ten commandments in your face.

2 Henry VI. 1, 3.

The Upper Ten. The aristocracy, the cream of society. Short for the upper ten thousand. The term was first used by N. P. Willis, (1806-67), a spirited American journalist, in speaking of the fashionables of New York.

Ten-cent Jimmy. James Buchanan (1791-1868), 15th President of the U.S.A. (1857-61) was so nicknamed on account of his advocacy of low tariffs and low wages.

Tenner. A ten-pound note; as fiveer is a five-pound note.

Tennypenny nails. Large-sized nails, originally so called because they were sold at 10d. a hundred. Smaller nails used to be known as eightpenny, sixpenny, fourpenny nails.

The submerged tenth (sometimes called the Tenth Legion). See SUBMERGED.

The Tenth Muse. A name given originally to Sappho (q.v.) there being nine true Muses (see MUSE), and afterwards applied to various literary women, as Mme de la Garde Deshoulières (1638-94), Mlle de Scudéry (1607-1701), Queen Christina of Sweden (1626-89), and the English novelist and essay-writer, Hannah More (1745-1833).

The tenth wave. See WAVE.

Tenant. One who holds property—land, house, etc.—anciently by any kind of title, in modern use from the owner or landlord for payment; the French tenant, holding (tenir, to hold; Lat. tenere). Theoretically, all land in the United Kingdom belongs to the Crown, and all landholders are therefore tenants.

Tenant at will. One who can at any moment be dispossessed of his tenancy at the will of the landlord or lessor.

Tenant by frank-marriage. One holding lands or tenements by virtue of a gift thereof made to him upon his marriage.

Tenant in chief. One who holds from the king direct.

Tenant-right. The right of an out-going tenant to claim from an incoming tenant compensation for the improvements he has made on the farm, etc., during his tenancy. In Elizabethan times the term denoted the right that certain tenants possessed of passing on the tenancy, at decease, to the eldest surviving issue; and it is now sometimes applied to the right of a well-behaved tenant to compensation if deprived of his tenancy.

Tender. See LEGAL TENDER.

Tenderfoot (pl. -foots or feet). A novice, an inexperienced person; a term originally applied to a soft, unacclimatized newcomer to the ranches or mines of the Western States of U.S.A.

Tenderloin is the tender portion of meat lying under the short ribs of beef and pork, also a cut of beef between the sirloin and ribs. The word is also used as the name of the district in American cities where vice and police corruption are at their worst, the name thus arising from such a place being the "best cut" for political graft.

Tendon of Achilles. See ACHILLES.

Tennis. The real game of tennis (from which lawn tennis takes its name) is played with a ball and rackets by two or four persons on a walled court divided across the middle by a net. The court—96 ft. by 32 ft.—is surrounded by a wall from which a sloping roof, called the penthouse, extends on three sides to an inner wall, 7 ft. high. The server hits a ball with his racket so that it strikes the penthouse or the wall above it and rebounds into the court of his opponent's side of the net. The game is extremely complicated, strokes being won or lost according to how they strike or fail to strike the walls or penthouse. The old scoring of 15, 30, etc., with deuce and advantage have been adopted into lawn tennis.

Tennis is of great age. The king of France sent Henry V a box of tennis balls; all modern courts are modelled on that in which Henry VIII played at Hampton Court. Lawn tennis first became popular in the late 1870s.

Tenson. A contention in verse between rival troubadours; a metrical dialogue consisting of smart repartees, usually on women and love. A sub-division of the troubadours' love lyrics also had the same name.

Tenterden. Tenterden steeple was the cause of Goodwin Sands. A satirical remark made when some ridiculous reason is given for a thing. The story, according to one of Latimer's sermons, is that a Mr. Moore, being sent into Kent to ascertain the cause of the Goodwin Sands, called together the oldest inhabitants to ask their opinion. A very old man said, "I believe Tenterden steeple is the cause," and went on to explain that in his early days there was no Tenterden steeple, and there were no complaints about the sands. This reason seemed ridiculous enough, but the fact seems to be that the Bishops of Rochester applied to the building of Tenterden steeple moneys raised in the county for the purpose of keeping Sandwich haven clear, so that when they found the harbour was getting blocked up there was no money for taking the necessary steps. Cp. GOODWIN SANDS.

Tenterhooks. I am on tenterhooks, or on tenterhooks of great expectation. My curiosity is on the full stretch, I am most curious or anxious to hear the issue. Cloth, after being woven, is stretched or "tentered" on hooks passed through the selvages. (Lat. tentus, stretched, hence "tent," canvas stretched.)

Teraphim (ter' a fim). The idols or images of the ancient Hebrews and other Semitic peoples, worshipped by them as household gods or individual protecting deities, it was her father Laban's teraphim that Rachel stole and hid in the camel's saddle in Gen. xxxi, 17-35.

Term. In schools and the universities, the period during which instruction is given; in the law courts, the period during which the courts are in session.

At Oxford and Cambridge there are three terms in a year; at the latter, Lent, Easter, and Michaelmas, and at Oxford, viz., Hilary, Trinity, and Michaelmas.

LENT and HILARY—

Cambridge, begins January 13th, and ends on the Friday before Palm Sunday.

Oxford, begins January 14th, and ends on the Saturday before Palm Sunday.

EASTER and TRINITY—

Cambridge, begins on the Friday of Easter-week, and ends Friday nearest June 20th.

Oxford, begins on the Wednesday of Easter week, and ends Friday before Whit Sunday. The continuation, called "Trinity term," runs on till the second Saturday of July.

MICHAELMAS—

Cambridge, begins October 1st, and ends December 16th.

Oxford, begins October 10th, and ends December 17th.

The lawyers' terms, called, since 1873, law sessions, are:—

Michaelmas Sessions begin October 12th, and end December 21st.

Hilary Sessions begin January 11th, and end the Wednesday before Easter.

Easter Sessions begin the Tuesday after Easter week, and end the Friday before Whit Sunday.

Trinity Sessions begin the Tuesday after Trinity Sunday and end August 8th.

These are of Norman origin, and the Long Vacation was intended to coincide with the time of vintage.

To bring to terms. To force a person to accept one's conditions.

To come to terms. To make an agreement with; decide the terms of a bargain.

Termagant. The name given by the Crusaders and in mediæval romances, to an idol or deity that the Saracens were popularly supposed to worship. He was introduced into the morality plays as a most violent and turbulent person in long, flowing Eastern robes, a dress that led to his acceptance as a woman, whence the name came to be applied to a shrewish violently abusive virago.

In the Romances his name was usually joined with that of Mohammed, and the -magant of Termagant may represent

Mahound, but as an early version of the name was Tervagant it has been suggested that perhaps the word is the Latin ter vagantem, the thrice wandering, with reference to Selene, or the Moon.

'Twas time to counterfeit, or that hot termagant Scot [Douglas] had paid me scot and lot too.—1 Henry IV, v, 4.

Outdoing Termagant (Hamlet, iii, 2). In old drama the degree of rant was the measure of villainy. Termagant and Herod, being considered the beau-ideal of all that is bad, were represented as settling everything by club law, and bawling so as to split the ears of the groundlings. Cp. HEROD.

That beats Termagant. Your ranting, raging pomposity, or exaggeration, surpasses that of Termagant of the old moralities.

Terpsichore (tĕrpsĭk' ōr i). One of the nine Muses (q.v.) of ancient Greece, the Muse of dancing and the dramatic chorus, and later of lyric poetry. She is usually represented seated, and holding a lyre. Hence, Terpsichorean, pertaining to dancing.

Terra firma. Dry land, in opposition to water; the continents as distinguished from islands. The Venetians so called the mainland of Italy under their sway, and the continental parts of America belonging to Spain were called by the same term.

Terracotta. Unglazed earthenware of fine fired clay, either red or yellow. The ancient Greeks employed terracotta extensively in architecture and statuary. In the 14th century terracotta revived and was made much use of in the Renaissance age. In the later years of the 19th century the material was favoured for facing and decorating important buildings, e.g. the Natural History Museum, S. Kensington (1873-80).

Terrapin War (ter' a pin) (U.S.A.). The name for the war with Britain in 1812, so called because, through the blockade of foreign vessels and trade, the U.S.A. was shut up in its shell like a terrapin.

Terrible, The. Ivan IV (or II) of Russia. (1529, 1533-84).

Terrier. A dog that "takes the earth," or unearths his prey (Fr., from Lat. terra, earth); also formerly applied to the burrows of foxes, badgers, rabbits, and so on.

Also slang for a member of the Territorial Army.

A land-roll or description of estates is called a terrier from Fr. papier terrier, a register of land.

Territorial Army. The British home defence force which, in 1908, superseded the old Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers, on a territorial basis.

The infantry regiments of the line have been known as the Territorial regiments since 1881, when, following a new scheme of organization, each became associated in name, depot, etc., with some particular county or district.

Terror, The, or the Reign of Terror. The period in the French Revolution between the fall of the Girondists and the overthrow of Robespierre. It lasted 420 days, from May 31st, 1793, to July 27th, 1794. Also applied to similar cataclysms in the history of other nations, as the Russian Revolution (the Red Terror, March-Sept., 1917).

Terry Alts. Insurgents of Clare, who appeared after the Union (1798) and committed numerous outrages. These rebels were similar to "the Thrashers" of Connaught, "the Carders," and the followers of "Captain Rock" in 1822.

Ter-Sanctus. See TRISAGION.

Tertium quid. A third party which shall be nameless; a third thing resulting from the combination of two things, but different from both. Fable has it that the expression originated with Pythagoras, who, defining bipeds, said:—

Sunt bipes homo, et avis, et tertium quid.

A man is a bipod, so is a bird, and a third thing (which shall be nameless).

Iamblichus says this third thing was Pythagoras himself.

In chemistry, when two substances chemically unite, the new substance is called a tertium quid, as a neutral salt produced by the mixture of an acid and alkali.

Terza Rima. An Italian verse-form in triplets, the second line rhyming with the first and third of the succeeding triplet. In the first triplet lines 1 and 3 rhyme, and in the last there is an extra line, rhyming with its second.

Dante's Divine Comedy is in this metre; it was introduced into England by Sir Thomas Wyatt in the 16th century, and was largely employed by Shelley, as also by Byron in The Prophecy of Dante.

Test Act. An Act of Parliament directed against Roman Catholics and Nonconformists, especially that of 1673, which decreed that all holders of public offices must take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, receive the Church of England sacrament, renounce the doctrine of Transubstantiation, etc. It was repealed in 1828.

Hence, to take the test, to comply with the requirements of the Test Act.

Test Match. In cricket, one of the matches played in a series between two national teams.

England v. Australia. First played, 1876. England has won (1951) 56 matches, Australia 68 matches, and 34 matches have been drawn.

England v. South Africa. First played, 1888. England 37 matches, South Africa 13, and 29 drawn.

England v. West Indies. First played, 1928. England 9 matches, West Indies 8, and 8 drawn.

England v. New Zealand. First played, 1929. England 3 matches, New Zealand 0, and 14 drawn.

England v. India. First played, 1932. England 6 matches, and 4 drawn.

Tester. A sixpenny piece; so-called from the teston of Henry VII, a coin which got its name from Ital. resta, head, because it was stamped on one side with the head of the reigning sovereign. Similarly, the head canopy of a bed is called its tester.

Hold, there's a tester for thee.—2 Henry IV, iii, 2.

Testers are gone to Oxford, to study at Brazenose. When Henry VIII debased the silver testers, the alloy broke out in red pimples through the silver, giving the royal likeness in the coin a blotchy appearance; hence the punning proverb.

Testudo. See TORTOISE.

Tête-à-tête (Fr., head to head). A confidential conversation, a heart to heart talk.

Tête du pont. The barbican or watch-tower placed on the head of a drawbridge.

Tether. He has come to the end of his tether. He has outrun his fortune; he has exhausted all his resources. The reference is to an animal tied to a rope (he can graze only so far as his tether can be carried out), or to a cable run out to the "bitter end" (q.v.).

Horace calls the end of life ultima linea rerum, the end of the goal, referring to the white chalk mark at the end of a racecourse.

Tethys. A sea goddess of the ancient Greeks, wife of Oceanus; hence, the sea itself.

Tetragrammaton. A word of four letters, especially the name of the Deity, JHVR (see JEHOVAH), which the ancient Jews never pronounced. The word means "I am," or "I exist" (Exod. iii, 14); but Rabbi Bechai says the letters include the three times—past, present, and future.

Pythagoras called Deity a Tetrad or Tetractys, meaning the "four sacred letters," and it is curious that in so many languages the name of the Supreme Being should be composed of four letters; thus there are the Greek Zeus and θεος, in Latin Jove and Deus; Fr. Dieu, Dutch Godt, Ger. Gott, Dan. Godh, Swed. Goth, Arab. Alla, Sansk. Deva, Span. Dios, Scand. Odin, and our Lord.

Such was the sacred Tetragrammaton.

Things worthy silence must not be revealed.

DRYDEN. Britannia Rediviva.

Tetrarch (tet' rark). Originally meaning the ruler of one of four parts of a region (Gr. tettrates, four; archein, to rule) under the Roman empire the term came to be applied to minor rulers, especially to the princes of Syria subject to the Roman Emperor. In World War II the name of a very light British Airborne tank which was landed by glider.

Teucer. In the Iliad, the son of Telamon, and step-brother of Ajax; he went with the allied Greeks to the siege of Troy, and on his return was banished by his father for not avenging on Ulysses the death of his brother.

Teutons. The Germans, and Germanic peoples; from the Latin name, Teutones, for an ancient northern tribe, their own name for themselves being Thiudans, i.e. kings or lords. Cp. A.S. theoden, a king. Our Dutch and the German Deutsch are variations of the same word, originally written Theodisk.

Teutonic Cross. A cross potent, the badge of the order of Teutonic Knights. See POTENT.

Teutonic Knights. An order which arose at the time of the Crusades. Originally only Germans of noble birth were admitted to the order. Abolished by Napoleon in 1809, it was revived again in Austria in 1840.

Texarkana (teks ar kăn' à). A community formed of two cities, one in Texas and one in Arkansas, the States' boundary line running through the centre of the place. The cities have separate municipal governments, but they are socially and commercially one, much as its various boroughs are part of London.

Texas Rangers. A constabulary force enlisted in Texas in 1835 to control the lawlessness of cattle-thieves and other outlaws, and the hostile Indians. The Rangers' headquarters were at the fort now grown into the town of Ranger. Their resourcefulness and toughness have surrounded their name with a sort of legendary splendour in the annals of the Wild West.

Th (θ, theta). The sign given in the verdict of the Areopagus of condemnation to death (thanatos).

Thais (thā' is). The Athenian courtesan who, it is said, induced Alexander the Great, when excited with wine, to set fire to the palace of the Persian kings at Persepolis.

The king seized a flambeau with zeal to destroy;

Thais led the way to light him to his prey,

And, like another Helen, fired another Troy.

DRYDEN: Alexander's Feast.

This is also the title of an historical-political novel (1890) by Anatole France.

Thales. See SEVEN SAGES.

Thalestris (thá les' tris). A queen of the Amazons, who went with 300 women to meet Alexander the Great, under the hope of raising a race of Alexanders.

Thalia (thá lí' à). One of the Muses (q.v.), generally regarded as the patroness of comedy. She was supposed by some, also, to preside over husbandry and planting, and is represented holding a comic mask and a shepherd's crook.

Thames (temz). The Latin Thamesis (the broad Isis, where isis is a mere variation of esk, ouse, uisg, etc., meaning water). It rises near Cirencester as the Isis, a name which has been applied to it as far as its junction with the Thame, near Dorchester.

Around his throne the sea-born brothers stood;

Who swell with tributary urns his flood!—

First the famed authors of his ancient name.

The winding Isis and the fruitful Thame!

POPE: Windsor Forest.

He'll never set the Thames on fire. He'll never make any figure in the world; never do anything wonderful and print his footsteps on the sands of time. The popular explanation is that the word Thames is a pun on the word temse, a corn-sieve; and that the parallel French locution He will never set the Seine on fire is a pun on seine, a drag-net; but these solutions are not tenable. There is a Latin saw, Tiberim accendere nequaquam potest, which is probably the fons et origo of other parallel sayings; and the Germans had Den Rhein anzünden (to set the Rhine on fire) as early as 1630.

Thammuz (thăm' ūz). A Sumerian, Babylonian and Assyrian god who died every year and rose again in the spring. He is identified with the Babylonian Marduk and the Greek Adonis.

In Ezek. viii, 14, reference is made to the heathen "women weeping for Tammuz."

Thammuz came next behind,
Whose annual wound on Lebanon allured
The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
In amorous ditties all a summer's day,
While smooth Adonis from his native rock
Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
Of Thammuz yearly wounded.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, iii, 446.

Thamyris (thăm' i ris). A Thracian bard mentioned by Homer (Iliad, ii, 595). He challenged the Muses to a trial of skill, and, being overcome in the contest, was deprived by them of his sight and power of song. He is represented with a broken lyre in his hand.

Blind Thamyris and blind Mæonides [Homer]
And Tiresias and Phineus, prophets old,

MILTON: Paradise Lost, iii, 35.

Thane. The name given in Anglo-Saxon England to a class of soldiers and landholders ranking between the earl and the churl. The rank of thane could be attained by a man of lower degree. After the Norman Conquest the word disappeared in England, giving place to knight. In Scotland a thane ranked with an earl's son, holding his land direct from the king; the title was given also to the chief of a clan who became one of the king's barons.

Thanksgiving Day. An annual holiday in U.S.A. usually held on the last Thursday in November and observed as an acknowledgement of the divine favours received during the year. It was first celebrated by the Plymouth Colony in 1621. After the Revolution it became general throughout the Republic, and since 1863 its observance has been annually recommended by the President.

That. Seven "thats" may follow each other, and make sense.

For be it known that we may safely write
Or say that "that that" that that man wrote was right;
Nay, e'en that that that, that "that THAT" has followed,
Through six repeats, the grammar's rule has halloved;
And that that that that "that THAT" began
Repeated seven times is right, deny't who can.

My lords, with humble submission that that I say is this; That that "that that" that that gentleman has advanced is not that that he should have proved to your lordships.—Spectator, No. 86.

Another that catch is to make sense of the following by supplying the missing punctuation:—

that that is that that is that is not is that it is.

And that's that! A colloquial way of emphatically and triumphantly making one's point, closing the argument, and so on.

Thaumaturgus (thaw ma tēr' gus) (Gr., a conjuror, or wonder-worker). A miracle-worker; applied to saints and others who are reputed to have performed miracles, especially:—

Apollonius of Tyana, Cappadocia (A.D. 3-98).
St. Bernard of Clairvaux, "the Thaumaturgus of the West" (1091-1153).

St. Filumena (q.v.).

St. Francis of Assisi, founder of the Franciscan order (1182-1226).

Gregory, Bishop of Neo-Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, called emphatically "Thaumaturgus," from the numerous miracles he is reported to have performed (died about 270).

Plotinus (died about 270), and several other Neoplatonists.

Simon Magus, of Samaria, called "the Great Power of God" (Acts viii, 10).

St. Vincent de Paul, founder of the "Sisters of Charity" (1576-1660).

Thé dansant. An afternoon tea party, with dancing.

Theagenes and Chariclea (thē äj' è nēz, chär i klē' ä). The hero and heroine of an erotic romance in Greek by Heliodorus, Bishop of Trikke (4th century).

Thebes, called The Hundred-Gated, was not Thebes of Bœotia, but the chief town of the Thebaid, on the Nile in Upper Egypt, said to have extended over twenty-three miles of land. Homer says out of each gate the Thebans could send forth 200 war-chariots.

The world's great empress on the Egyptian plain,
That spreads her conquests o'er a thousand states,
And pours her heroes through a hundred gates,
Two hundred horsemen and two hundred cars
From each wide portal issuing to the wars.

POPE: Iliad, i.

It is here that the vocal statue of Memnon stood, and here too are the tombs of the kings, including the tomb of Tutankhamun (reigned 1360-1350 B.C.) which was discovered in 1932, with its wealth and equipment almost intact. The temple of Karnak, and large numbers of sculptures, sphinxes, etc., are to be seen in the village of Luxor, which now marks the site.

The Seven against Thebes. An expedition in Greek legend fabled to have taken place against Thebes of Bœotia before the Trojan War. The Seven were the Argive chiefs Adrastus, Polynices, Tydeus, Amphiaraus, Hippomedon, Capaneus, and Parthenopæus.

When Œdipus abdicated his two sons agreed to reign alternate years; but at the expiration of the first year, the elder, Etæocles, refused to give up the throne, whereupon Polynices, the younger brother, induced the six chiefs to espouse his cause. The allied army laid siege to Thebes, but without success, and all the heroes perished except Adrastus. Subsequently, seven sons of the chiefs resolved to avenge their fathers' deaths, marched against the city, took it, and placed Terpander, one of their number, on the throne. These are known as the Epigoni (Gr., descendants). The Greek tragic poets Æschylus and Euripides dramatized the legend.

Theban Bard or Eagle, The. Pindar, born at Thebes (about 520-435 B.C.).

Theban Legion, The. Another name for the "Thundering Legion" (q.v.), which was raised in the Thebaid of Egypt, composed of Christian soldiers, and led by St. Maurice.

Thecla, St. (thek' lá). The first woman martyr, as St. Stephen is the protomartyr. All that is known of her is from the Acts of Paul and Thecla, pronounced apocryphal by Pope Gelasius. According to the legend she was born of a noble family in Iconium, and was converted by the preaching of St. Paul. Her feast day is 23rd September.

Theist, Deist, Atheist, Agnostic. A theist believes there is a God who made and governs all creation; but does not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity, nor in a divine revelation.

A deist believes there is a God who created all things, but does not believe in His superintendence and government. He thinks the Creator implanted in all things certain immutable laws, called the Laws of Nature, which act per se, as a watch acts without the supervision of its maker. Like the theist, he does not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity, nor in a divine revelation.

The atheist disbelieves even the existence of a God. He thinks matter is eternal, and what we call "creation" is the result of natural laws.

The agnostic believes only what is knowable. He rejects revelation and the doctrine of the Trinity as "past human understanding." He is neither theist, deist, nor atheist, as all these subscribe to doctrines that are incapable of scientific proof.

Thellusson Act (thel' u son). The 39th and 40th George III, cap. 98. An Act (1800) to prevent testators from leaving their property to accumulate for more than twenty-one years. It was passed in reference to the will of Peter Thellusson, a London banker who died in 1797 and left £600,000 and £4,500 a year to accumulate for the benefit of his eldest grandson after the death of all his sons and grandsons. The last grandson died in 1856, and the expense of the legal actions that followed swallowed up all the accumulated interest, so that Thellusson's eldest son's eldest grandson received barely the amount of the original legacy.

Theodomas (thē od' ō mās). A famous trumpeter at the siege of Thebes.

At every court ther cam loud menstralceye
That never tromped Joab for to heere,
Ne he Theodomas yit half so cleere
At Thebes, when the cite was in doute.

CHAUCER: Canterbury Tales, 9, 592.

Theodoric (thē od' ō rik). A king of the East Goths (d. 526), who became celebrated in German legend as Dietrich of Bern (q.v.), and also has a place in the Norse romances and the Nibelungen Saga. He invaded Italy about 490, and three years later slew Odoacer and became sole ruler.

Theodosian Table. See ITINERARY.

Theon (thē' on). A satirical poet of ancient Rome, noted for his mordant writings. Hence, Theon's tooth, the bite of an ill-natured or carping critic.

Dente Theonino circumrodi (Horace: Ep. i, 18, 82) to be nastily aspersed.

Theophany. See TIFFANY.

Theorbo (thē ōr' bō). A large bass lute with a double neck, having two sets of tuning pegs. The lower set is applied to the strings over the fretted finger-board, tuned in 4ths, with a 3rd in the middle; the upper pegs hold the bass strings, tuned in 2nds and played as open notes.

Theosophy (Gr. the wisdom of God). The name adopted by the Theosophical Society (founded in 1875 by Mme Blavatsky, Mrs. Besant, Col. Olcott, and others) to define their religious or philosophical system, which aims at the knowledge of God by means of intuition and contemplative illumination, or by direct communion. Esoteric Buddhism is another name for it; and its adherents claim that the doctrines of the great world religions are merely the exoteric expressions of their own esoteric traditions.

The Theosophist is a man who, whatever be his race, creed, or condition, aspires to reach this height of wisdom and beatitude by self-development.—OLCOTT: Theosophy, p. 144 (1885).

The name was formerly applied to the philosophical system of Boehme (d. 1624).

Theot, Catharine (tā' ō) (1725-94). A visionary born at Avranches, who gave herself out to be (like Joanna Southcott) the mother of God, and changed her name Theot into Theos (God). She preached in Paris in 1794, at the very time that the worship of the Supreme Being was instituted, and declared that Robespierre was the forerunner of the Word. The Comité de la Sureté Générale had her arrested, and she was guillotined. Catharine Theot was called by Dom Gerle la mère de dieu, and she named Maximilien Robespierre "her well-beloved son and chief prophet."

Theramanes. See SANDAL.

Therapeutæ (thēr a pū' tē) (Gr., servants, ministers). A sect of Jewish mystics described in Philo's De Vita Contemplativa. They were a branch of the Essenes (q.v.) and were settled in Egypt in the 1st century A.D.

Therm. In physics the name given to the British thermal unit of heat (B.Th.U.) which is the amount of heat required to raise 1 lb. of water at its maximum density through 1° F. The calorie is the corresponding metric unit of heat; a therm equals nearly 252 calories. The gas therm, by which gas is charged to consumers, is equal to 100,000 B.Th.U. Mr. Therm is a small gnome-like figure resembling a flame who was introduced to advertise gas in Britain in the 1930s.

Thermidor (thēr' mi dōr). The eleventh month of the French Republican calendar, containing thirty days from July 19th. So named from Gr. therme heat, doron a gift.

Thermidorians. The French Revolutionists who took part in the coup d'état which effected the fall of Robespierre, on Thermidor 9th of the second Republican year (July 27th, 1794), thus bringing the Reign of Terror (q.v.) to a close.

Thermopylæ (thēr mop' i li). In ancient geography the pass from Thessaly to Locris, being the only passage for an army from northern to southern Greece. In 480 B.C. it was heroically defended against the invading Persians under Xerxes by some 300 men under Leonidas, King of Sparta. As the result of treachery the Persians got to the rear of the Greeks, who were all slain.

Thersites (thēr sī' tēz). A deformed, scurrilous officer in the Greek army at the siege of Troy. He was always railing at the chiefs; hence the name is applied to any dastardly, malevolent, impudent railer against the powers that be. Achilles felled him to the earth with his fist and killed him.

In Troilus and Cressida he is "A slave whose gall coins slanders like a mint."

Theseus (thē' sūs). The chief hero of Attica in ancient Greek legend; son of Ægeus, and the centre of innumerable exploits. Among his deeds are the capture of the Marathonian bull, the slaying of the Minotaur (q.v.), his war against the Amazons, the Calydonian hunt, and his desertion of Ariadne in Naxos. He was foully murdered by Lycomedes in Scyros. See SINIS.

Theseus is also the name of the Duke of Athens in Chaucer's Knight's Tale. He married Hippolyta, and as he returned home with his bride, and Emily her sister, was accosted by a crowd of female suppliants who complained of Creon, king of Thebes. The duke forthwith set out for Thebes, slew Creon, and took the city by assault. Many captives fell into his hands, amongst whom were the two knights, Palamon and Arcite (q.v.).

Shakespeare gives the same name to the Duke of Athens in Midsummer Night's Dream.

Thespians (thes' pi ānz). Actors; so called from Thespis, an Attic poet of the 6th century B.C., reputed to be the father of Greek tragedy.

Thespis, the first professor of our art,
At country wakes sang ballads from a cart.
DRYDEN: Prologue to Sophonisba.

Thestylis (thes' ti lis). A stock poetic name for a rustic maiden; from a young female slave of that name in the Idylls of Theocritus.

And then in haste her bower she leaves,
With Thestylis to bind the sheaves.
MILTON: L'Allegro.

Thetis (thē' tis). The chief of the Nereids (q.v.) of Greek legend. By Peleus she was the mother of Achilles.

Thetis's hair-stone. A fancy-name given to pieces of rock-crystal enclosing hair-like filaments.

Thick. It's a bit thick! A colloquial expression used to express annoyance, as when one has had a stroke of bad luck, when things have not come up to expectation, when one has been charged more than—or received less than—one thinks fair, etc.

Those two are very thick. They are very good friends, on excellent terms with one another. As thick as thieves is a similar saying.

Through thick and thin. Through evil and through good report; under any conditions; undauntedly.

A griesly foster forth did rush . . .
Through thick and thin, both over bank and bush
In hope her to attain by hook or crook.
SPENSER: Faerie Queene, III, i, 17.

Thick and thin blocks are pulley-blocks with two sheaves of different thickness, to accommodate different sizes of ropes.

Thick-skinned. Not sensitive; not irritated by rebukes and slanders. Thin-skinned, on the contrary, means impatient of reproof or censure, having skin so thin that it is an annoyance to be touched.

Thick 'un. Slang for a sovereign.

Thief. The Penitent. See DYSMAS.

Thieves' Latin. Slang; gibberish.

Thimble. From A.S. thymel, a thumb-stall; so called because it was originally worn on the thumb, as sailors still wear their thimbles.

Just a thimbleful. A very little drop—usually of spirits. Thimble is sometimes used in place of thimbleful:—

'Tis true to her cottage still they came. . . .
And never swallow'd a thimble the less
Of something the Reader is left to guess.

HOOD: A Tale of a Trumpet.

Thimble-rigging. A form of cheating, carried on with three thimbles and a pea, principally on or about race courses. A pea is put on a table, and the manipulator places three thimbles over it in succession, and then, setting them on the table, asks you to say under which thimble the pea is. You are sure to guess wrong.

The term thimble-rigging is used allusively of any kind of mean cheating or jiggery-pokery.

Thin. It's a lot too thin! Said of an excuse, explanation, story, etc., that sounds plausible but is quite unacceptable. The idea is that it is so thin as to be transparent—it is easily seen through.

The thin red line. See LINE.

Thin-skinned. See THICK-SKINNED.

Thing. The Old Norse word for the assembly of the people, the legislature, "parliament," court of law, etc. It is etymologically the same word as our thing (an object), the original meaning of which was a discussion (from thingian, to discuss), hence a cause, an object.

The great national diet of Norway is still called a stor-thing (great legislative assembly), and the two chambers which form it are the lag-thing (law assembly) and the odels-thing (free-holders' assembly).

A poor thing. A person (or, sometimes, an inanimate object) that is regarded with pity or disparagement. Touchstone's remark about Audrey—"An ill-favoured thing, sir, but mine own" (As You Like It, v, 4)—is frequently misquoted, "A poor thing, but mine own," when employed in half ironical disparagement of one's own work.

Old thing. A familiar mode of address between friends.

One's things. One's minor belongings, especially clothes, or personal luggage.

The thing. The proper thing to do; as, "It's not the thing to play leap-frog down Bond Street in a top-hat and spats."

The very thing. Just what I was wanting; just what will meet the case.

You can have too much of a good thing. "Enough is as good as a feast."

People may have too much of a good thing—
Full as an egg of wisdom thus I sing.

PETER PINDAR: The Gentleman and his Wife.

Third. See under THREE.

Thirteen. It is said that the origin of sitting down thirteen at table being deemed unlucky is because, at a banquet in Valhalla, Loki once intruded, making thirteen guests, and Balder was slain.

In Christian countries the superstition was confirmed by the Last Supper of Christ and His twelve apostles, but the superstition itself is much anterior to Christianity.

The Italians never use the number in their lotteries; and in Paris no house bears it, and persons, called Quartorzièmes, are available to make a fourteenth at dinner parties. Sailors strongly object to leaving port on the 13th of the month—especially if it happens to be a Friday—and they always start on their thirteenth voyage with apprehension.

Thirteenpence-halfpenny. A hangman. So called because thirteenpence-halfpenny was at one time his wages for hanging a man.

Thirty. A man at thirty must be either a fool or a physician. A saying attributed by Tacitus (Annals, VI, xlv) to the Emperor Tiberius, who died at the age of 77 in A.D. 37 (Plutarch gives the story, but changes the age to sixty). The idea seems to be that if a man has not learned to look after his health by the time he is thirty he must be a fool.

The Thirty Tyrants. See TYRANT.

Thirty Years War. A series of wars between the Catholics and Protestants of Germany in the 17th century, in which France, Sweden, and other peoples participated from time to time. It began in Bohemia in 1618, and ended in 1648 with the Peace of Westphalia.

Thirty-six Line Bible, The. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Thirty-nine Articles, The. The articles of faith of the Church of England, the acceptance of which is obligatory on its clergy. They were originally issued in 1551 as forty-two, but in 1563 were modified and reduced to their present number. They received parliamentary authority in 1571.

Thisbe. See PYRAMUS.

Thistle. The heraldic emblem of Scotland; said to have been adopted at least as early as the 8th century in commemoration of an unsuccessful night attack by the Danes on Stirling Castle. Their presence was unsuspected, and was revealed through the barefooted scouts treading on thistles and suddenly crying out; the alarm was given, the Scots fell upon the party and defeated them with terrible slaughter.

With the thistle was adopted the motto Nemo me impune lacessit, "Nobody touches (or provokes) me with impunity."

The Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle. The Scottish order of Knighthood (ranking only second to the Garter in the list of British Orders), traditionally said to have been founded in 787 by Achaius, king of the Scots, who, with Hungus, king of the Picts, was fighting an English king, in commemoration of a bright cross they saw in the heavens the night before the battle. It is said to have been re-founded in 1540 by James V, and was certainly restored in 1687 by James VII and II, only to collapse in the Revolution of the following year; to be finally re-established by Queen Anne in 1703. Membership is confined to 16 Knights (beside Royalty), a Chancellor,

29*

Dean, Secretary, the Lyon King-of-Arms, and the Gentleman Usher of the Green Rod. Its insignia comprise the Badge (an elongated eight-pointed star with a figure of St. Andrew and his cross), Star, Collar of golden thistles and sprigs of rue, Mantle, and dark green Ribbon.

Thistles, especially "Our Lady's Thistle," are said to be a cure for stitch in the side. According to the doctrine of signatures Nature has labelled every plant, and the prickles of the thistle tell us the plant is efficacious for pricks or the stitch. The species called Silybum Marianum, we are told, owes the white markings on its leaves to milk from Our Lady's breast, some of which fell thereon and left a white mark behind.

Thomas, St. Thomas. The Apostle who doubted (John xxi, 25); hence the phrase, a doubting Thomas applied to a sceptic.

The story told of him in the Apocryphal Acts of St. Thomas is that he was deputed to go as a missionary to India, and, on refusing, Christ appeared and sold him as a slave to an Indian prince who was visiting Jerusalem. He was taken to India, where he baptized the prince and many others, and was finally martyred at Meliapore.

Another legend has it that Gondoforus, king of the Indies, gave him a large sum of money to build a palace. St. Thomas spent it on the poor, "thus erecting a superb palace in heaven." On account of this he is the patron saint of masons and architects, and his symbol is a builder's square.

Another legend relates that he once saw a huge beam of timber floating on the sea near the coast, and the king unsuccessfully endeavouring, with men and elephants, to haul it ashore. St. Thomas desired leave to use it in building a church, and, his request being granted, he dragged it easily ashore with a piece of packthread.

His feast day is December 21st.

Christians of St. Thomas. There are said to have been in the southern parts of Malabar some 200,000 persons who called themselves "Christians of St. Thomas" when Vasco da Gama reached India in 1498. They had been 1,300 years under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Babylon, who appointed their Materene (archbishop). In 1625 a stone was found near Siganfu with a cross on it, and containing a list of the Materenes of India and China.

Thomas the Rhymer. See RHYMER.

Thomasing. Collecting small sums of money or obtaining drink from employers on St. Thomas's Day, a custom that still exists in some districts. In London on December 21st every one of the Common Council has to be either elected or re-elected.

Thomists. Followers of St. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274)—styled "Doctor Angelicus" and, by Pius V, "the Fifth Doctor of the Church"—and opponents of the Scotists, or followers of Duns Scotus.

Scotists and Thomists now in peace remain.
POPE: Essay on Criticism, 444.

Thone or Thonis. In Greek mythology the governor of a province of Egypt to which, it is said by post-Homeric poets, Paris took Helen, who was given by Polydamnia, wife to Thone, the drug nepenthes, to make her forget her sorrows.

Not that nepenthes which the wife of Thone
In Egypt gave to love-lorn Helena,
Is of such power to stir up joy as this.

MILTON: Comus, 695-697.

Thopas, Rime of Sir (thō' pās). A burlesque on contemporary metrical romances, told as Chaucer's own tale in the Canterbury Tales.

Thor (thôr). Son of Woden, god of war, and the second god in the pantheon of the ancient Scandinavians—their Vulcan, and god of thunder. He had three principal possessions; a Hammer (Mjølhir), typifying thunder and lightning, and having the virtue of returning to him after it was thrown; a Belt (Meginjardir) which doubled his power; and Iron Gloves to aid him in throwing his hammer.

He was god of the household, and of peasants, and was married to Sif, a typical peasant woman. His name is still perpetuated in our Thursday, and in a number of place-names, as Thorsby (Cumberland), Torthorwald (Dumfries), and Thurso (Caithness).

Thorn. A thorn in the flesh. A source of constant irritation, annoyance, or affliction; said of objectionable and parasitical acquaintances, obnoxious conditions, of a "skeleton in the cupboard," etc. There was a sect of the Pharisees (q.v.) which used to insert thorns in the borders of their gaberdines to prick their legs in walking and make them bleed. The phrase is taken from St. Paul's reference to some physical complaint or misfortune, 2 Cor. xii, 7.

On thorns. In a state of painful anxiety and suspense; fearful that something is going wrong (cp. TENTERHOOKS).

The Crown of Thorns. That with which our Saviour was crowned in mockery (Matt. xxvii, 29); hence sometimes used of a very special affliction with which one is unjustly burdened.

Calvin (Admonitio de Reliquiis) gives a long list of places claiming to possess one or more of the thorns which composed the Saviour's crown. To his list may be added Glastonbury Abbey, where was also the spear of Longinus or Longinus.

The Glastonbury Thorn. See GLASTONBURY.

Thorough. The name given by the Earl of Strafford (executed 1641) to his uncompromising absolutist policy in favour of Charles I and against Parliament; especially to his harsh Irish policy, which he was determined to carry through regardless of all opposition and of all suffering.

Thoroughbred. Of pure or unmixed breed, especially said of horses and cattle. A thoroughbred is a race horse of English breed remotely derived by crossing with Arab and other strains.

Thoth. The Hermes of Egyptian mythology. He is represented with the head of an ibis on a human body. He is the inventor of the arts and sciences, music and astronomy, speech and letters. The name means "Logos" or "the Word."

Thousand. He's one in a thousand. Said of a man who is specially distinguished by his excellent qualities; similarly, a wife in a thousand, a perfect wife, or one that exactly suits the speaker's ideas of what a wife should be.

Thousand is frequently used of large indefinite numbers; as in Byron's

A small drop of ink,

Falling like dew, upon a thought, produces
That which makes thousands, perhaps millions, think.

Don Juan, III, lxxxviii.

Thread. The thread of destiny. That on which destiny depends. According to Greek mythology, Clotho, one of the Fates (q.v.), spun from her distaff the destiny of man, and as she span her sister Lachesis worked out the events which were in store, and Atropos cut the thread at the point when death was to occur.

The Triple Thread. Brahminism. The ancient Brahmins wore a symbol of three threads, reaching from the right shoulder to the left. Faria says that their religion sprang from fishermen, who left the charge of the temples to their successors on the condition of their wearing some threads of their nets in remembrance of their vocation; but Osorius maintains that the triple thread symbolizes the Trinity.

Threadneedle Street. The street in the City of London leading from Bishopsgate to the Bank of England. The name first appears—as Three needle Street—in 1598, and previously it seems to have been called Broad Street, as forming part of the present Old Broad Street. The name may have arisen from the sign of an inn, The Three Needles (though none of that name is recorded in the neighbourhood), or from some connexion with the Needle-makers' Company, whose arms are "three needles in fesse argent."

The Old Lady of Threadneedle Street. The Bank of England, which stands in this street. The term dates from the late 18th century, and there is a caricature by Gilray, dated May 22, 1797, entitled The Old Lady in Threadneedle Street in Danger, which refers to the temporary stopping of cash payments, February 26, 1797, and to the issue of one pound banknotes on March 4 the same year.

The directors of the Bank of England were called Old Ladies of Threadneedle Street by William Cobbett, because, like Mrs. Partington, they tried with their broom to sweep back the Atlantic waves of national progress.

Three. Pythagoras calls three the perfect number, expressive of "beginning, middle, and end," wherefore he makes it a symbol of Deity.

A Trinity is by no means confined to the Christian creed. The Brahmins represent their god with three heads; the world was supposed by the ancients to be under the rule of three gods, viz. Jupiter (heaven), Neptune (sea), and Pluto (Hades). Jove is represented with three-forked lightning, Neptune with a trident, and Pluto with a three-headed dog. The Fates are three, the Furies three, the Graces three, the Harpies three, the Sibylline books three times three (of which only three survived); the fountain from which Hylas drew water was presided over by three nymphs; the Muses were three times three; the pythoress sat on a three-legged stool, or tripod; and in Scandinavian mythology we hear of "the Mysterious Three," viz. "Har" (the Mighty), the "Like-Mighty," and the "Third Person," who sat on three thrones above the rainbow.

Man is threefold (body, soul, and spirit); the world is threefold (earth, sea, and air); the enemies of man are threefold (the world, the flesh, and the devil); the Christian graces are threefold (Faith, Hope, and Charity); the kingdoms of Nature are threefold (mineral, vegetable, and animal); the cardinal colours are three in number (red, yellow, and blue), etc. Cp. NINE, which is three times three.

Three acres and a cow. A phrase which came into use after the formation by the Dukes of Argyll and Westminster of the National Land Company, in 1885. The object of this concern was to acquire large tracts of land and let it out for farming in small portions.

Three Choirs Festival. Musical festival for the performance of sacred music given since 1724 by the choirs of the cathedrals of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford.

A three-cornered fight. A parliamentary (or other) contest in which there are three competitors.

A three-decker. Properly, a sailing ship having three decks, a warship carrying guns on three decks, but applied to other triplicates, such as the old-fashioned pulpit, reading-desk, and clerk's desk arranged one above the other; and to the three-volume novel—the usual way of publishing fiction in most of the 19th century up to about 1895.

In the midst of the church stands . . . the offensive structure of pulpit, reading-desk, and clerk's desk; in fact, a regular old three-decker in full sail westward.—The Christian Remembrancer, July, 1852, p. 92.

The Three Estates of the Realm. See ESTATES.

Three Kings' Day. Epiphany or Twelfth Day, designed to commemorate the visit of the "three kings" or Wise Men of the East to the infant Jesus. See MAGI.

The three-legged mare. An obsolete slang term for the gallows, which at Tyburn was a triple erection in triangular plan.

Three Mile Limit. In International Law the limit of waters around its coast under the jurisdiction of a sovereign state.

Three Musketeers. Athos, Porthos, and Aramis, the three heroes of Dumas's novels The Three Musketeers, 1844; Twenty Years Afterwards, 1845; and Vicomte de Bragelonne, 1848-50. The Musketeers were a mounted guard of gentlemen in the service of the kings of France from 1661 until the Revolution, 1791. They formed two companies, called the Grey and the Black from the colour of their horses. The uniform was scarlet, hence their quarters were known as La Maison Rouge. In peacetime the Musketeers formed the king's bodyguard, but in war they fought on foot or on horseback with the army. Their ranks included many Scots, either Jacobite exiles or mere soldiers of fortune.

The Three R.'s. See R.

Three sheets in the wind. See SHEET.

Three-tailed bashaw. See BASHAW.

The three tailors of Tooley Street. See TAILOR.

The three tongues. Those in which the inscription on the Cross were written, viz. Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. In the Middle Ages it was considered that a thorough knowledge of these was necessary before one could begin to understand theology.

Rule of Three. The rule of simple proportion; by which, given the relationship of two entities, the proportional relationship of a third can be ascertained.

The Battle of the Three Emperors. The Battle of Austerlitz (December 2nd, 1805), when Napoleon inflicted a heavy defeat on the Russians and Austrians. The Emperors of the three Empires were all present in person.

To give one three times three. To give him a rousing ovation, cheer after cheer.

We three. "Did you never see the picture of We Three?" asks Sir Andrew Aguecheek (Twelfth Night, ii, 3)—not meaning himself, Sir Toby Belch, and the clown, but referring to a public-house sign of Two Loggerheads, with the inscription, "We three loggerheads be," the third being the spectator.

"When shall we three meet again?"—the title of a picture of two asses—is a similar "joke."

Threescore years and ten. A ripe old age—not necessarily (in allusive use) exactly 70 years. The reference is to Ps. xc, 10:—

The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away.

Third Degree. The highest degree, that of Master Mason, in British Freemasonry. In U.S.A. the term is applied to the use of exhaustive questioning and cross questioning by the police in the endeavour to extort a confession or compromising information from a criminal, accomplice, or witness.

Third Estate. The Commons, as the third estate of the realm coming after the Sovereign and the Peers. The term is a translation of the French Tiers Etat, being the third and lower body of representatives in the States General (q.v.).

Throat. Clergyman's throat. Chronic inflammation of the pharynx, to which clergymen and others who habitually overstrain the vocal organs are specially liable.

To cut one's own throat. Figuratively, to adopt a policy, or take action that ruins one's own chances, plans, etc. Similarly, to cut one another's throat is to ruin one another by excessive competition.

To jump down a person's throat. To interrupt and affront him, suddenly, sharply, and decisively.

To lie in one's throat. To lie most outrageously, well knowing that you are lying, and meaning to do so.

Throgmorton Street. The financial world at large, or the Stock Exchange, which is situated in this narrow London street. So named from Sir Nicholas Throckmorton (1515-71), head of the ancient Warwickshire family, and ambassador to France in the reign of Elizabeth I.

Throne, The. A comprehensive name for the office of King, e.g. He ascended the throne.

Thrones, principalities and powers, in the teachings of Fathers of the Church, are three choirs of the celestial hierarchy, or the assemblage of beneficent supernatural beings.

Through-stone. A flat gravestone, a stone coffin or sarcophagus; also a bond stone which extends over the entire thickness of a wall.

Throw. To throw away one's money. To spend it carelessly, recklessly, extravagantly.

To throw back. To revert to ancestral traits; hence, a throw-back is one (human or animal) who does this.

To throw oneself on someone. To commit oneself to his protection, favour, mercy, etc.

To throw the helve after the hatchet. See HELVE.

To throw in one's hand. To abandon one's projects. A metaphor from card-playing.

Thruns. The fringe of warp threads left when the web has been cut off; weavers' ends and fag-ends of carpet, used for common rugs.

Thread and thrum. Everything, good and bad together.

Come, sisters, come, cut thread and thrum;

Quail, crush, conclude, and quell!

Midsummer Night's Dream, v, 1.

The town immortalized by Sir James Barrie in A Window in Thrums (1889) is Kirriemuir, Forfarshire, his birthplace.

Thug. A member of a religious body of northern India, worshippers of Kali (g.v.), who could be propitiated only by human victims who had been strangled. Hence, the Thugs became a professional fraternity of stranglers, and supported themselves by the plunder obtained from those they strangled. Their native name is P'hansigars (stranglers); that of Thug (i.e. cheat) was given them in 1810. Their methods were rigorously suppressed under British rule, and were practically extinct by 1840. In common parlance the word is used for a violent "tough."

Thuggee. The system of secret assassination preached by Thugs; the practice of Thugs.

Thule. The name given by the ancients to an island, or point of land, six days' sail north of Britain, and considered by them to be the extreme northern limit of the world. The name is first found in the account by Polybius (about 150 B.C.) of the voyage made by Pytheas in the late 4th century B.C. Pliny says, "It is an island in the Northern Ocean discovered by Pytheas, after sailing six days from the Orcades." Others, like Camden, consider it to be Shetland, in which opinion they agree with Marinus, and the descriptions of Ptolemy and Tacitus; and still others that it was some part of the coast of Norway. The etymology of the name is unknown.

Ultima Thule. The end of the world; the last extremity.

Tibi serviat Ultima Thule.

VIRGIL: Georgics, i, 30.

Thumb. In the ancient Roman combats, when a gladiator was vanquished it rested with the spectators to decide whether he should be slain or not. If they wished him to live, they shut up their thumbs in their fists (pollice compresso favor judicabatur); if to be slain, they turned out their thumbs. See Pliny, xxviii, 2; Juvenal, iii, 36; Horace: I Epist. xviii, 66.

Influenced by the rabble's bloody will,

With thumbs bent back, they popularly kill.

DRYDEN: Third Satire.

Our popular saying, Thumbs up! expressive of pleasure or approval, is probably a perversion of this custom.

Every honest miller has a thumb of gold. Even an honest miller grows rich with what he filches; for he simply can't help some of the flour that ought to go into the loaf sticking to his thumb! Chaucer says of his miller—

Wel koude he stelen corn and tollen thries,

And yet he haddad a thombe of gold, pardee.

Canterbury Tales: Prologue, 562.

Rule of thumb. A rough, guesswork measure; practice or experience, as distinguished from theory. In some places the heat required in brewing is determined by dipping the thumb into the vat.

The pricking of one's thumb. In popular superstition, a portent of evil. The Second Witch in Macbeth (iv, 1) says:—

By the pricking of my thumbs,

Something wicked this way comes.

And Macbeth enters.

Another proverb says, My little finger told me that. When your ears tingle it is to indicate that someone is speaking about you; when a sudden fit of shivering occurs, it is because someone is treading on the place which is to form your grave; when the eye itches, it indicates the visit of a friend; when the palm itches it shows that a present will shortly be received; and when the bones ache a storm is prognosticated. Sudden pains and prickings are the warnings of evil on the road; sudden glows and pleasurable sensations are the couriers to tell us of joy close at hand.

In ancient Rome the augurs took special notice of the palpitation of the heart, the flickering of the eye, and the pricking of the thumb. In regard to the last, if the pricking was on the left hand it was considered a very bad sign, indicating mischief at hand.

Thumb index. Grooves cut in the pages of a book showing initial letters or other particulars to enable the reader to find a reference easily.

Thumb-nail. Used attributively of various things, especially sketches, portraits, and so on, that are on a very small scale.

To thumb a ride. To ask for a lift in a motor car by holding out the hand with the thumb pointing in the direction in which one wants to go.

To bite one's thumb at one. To insult him. Formerly a way of expressing defiance and contempt was by snapping the finger or putting the thumb in the mouth. Both these acts are termed a fico, whence "I don't care a fig for you" (see FIG). Dekker, describing St. Paul's Walk, speaks of the biting of thumbs to beget quarrels, and biting one's glove (see GLOVE) was a similar token.

I see Contempt marching forth, giving mee the fico with his thombe in his mouth.—Wits Miserie (1596). I will bite my thumb at them; which is a disgrace to them, if they bear it.—Romeo and Juliet, i, 1.

Tom Thumb. See TOM.

Under one's thumb. Under the influence or power of the person named.

Thumbikins, Thumbscrew. An instrument of torture used largely by the Inquisition, whereby the thumbs are compressed between two bars of iron, by means of a screw. William Carstairs (1649-1715) was the last person put to the torture in Britain; as the Law of England would not permit torture, he was sent by the Privy Council for examination in Edinburgh, to elicit the names of the accomplices in the Rye House Plot (q.v.).

Thunder. Used figuratively of any loud noise, also of vehement denunciations or threats, as, the thunders of the Vatican, meaning the anathemas and denunciations of the Pope.

Jupiter was the god of thunder in the Roman mythology; hence Dryden's allusion to the inactivity of Louis XIV:—

And threatening France, placed like a painted Jove,
Kept idle thunder in his lifted hand.

Annus Mirabilis, xxxix.

Sons of thunder. See BOANERGES.

To steal one's thunder. To forestall him; or to adopt his own special methods as one's own. The phrase comes from the anecdote of John Dennis (1657-1734) the critic and playwright who invented an effective device for producing stage thunder, for his play Appius and Virginia. The play was a failure and was withdrawn, but shortly afterwards Dennis heard his thunder used in a performance of Macbeth. "My God," he exclaimed, "The villains will play my thunder but not my plays!"

Thunderbolt. A missile or mass of heated matter that was formerly supposed on occasion to be discharged from thunder-clouds during a storm; used figuratively of an irresistible blow, a sudden and overwhelming shock (cp. BOLT FROM THE BLUE).

Be ready, gods, with all your thunderbolts;
Dash him to pieces!

Julius Cæsar, iv, 3.

Jupiter was depicted by the ancients as a man seated on a throne, holding a sceptre in his left hand and thunderbolts in his right.

The Thunderbolt of Italy. Gaston de Foix, Duc de Nemours (1489-1512), nephew of Louis XII, was so called because of his brilliant campaign in Italy (1512).

Thunderday. See THURSDAY.

Thunderer, The. A name facetiously applied to The Times newspaper in the mid-19th century, in allusion to an article by the assistant editor, Edward Sterling (d. 1847), beginning:—

We thundered forth the other day an article on the subject of social and political reform.—The Times.

Thundering Legion, The (Legio fulminans). The XIIth Legion of the Roman army; probably so called because its ensign was a representation of Jupiter Tonans.

The name dates from much earlier times than those of Marcus Aurelius, but fable relates that it arose because in this Emperor's expedition against the Sarmate, Marcomanni, etc., the XIIth Legion—stated for the purpose of the legend to have consisted of Christians—saved the whole army during a terrible drought by praying for rain. A terrible thunderstorm burst, and not only furnished a plentiful supply of water, but dispersed the enemy with lightning and thunderbolts.

What wonders, yea, what apparent miracles did the prayers of former Christians procure! hence the Christian soldiers in their Army was called the Thundering Legion; they could do more by their prayers than the rest by their arms.—BAXTER: Saints' Everlasting Rest, II, vi, 6.

The fable was long believed, but is none the less fictitious.

Thursday. The day of the god Thor (q.v.), called by the French jeudi, that is, Jove's day. Both Jove and Thor were gods of thunder, and formerly Thursday was sometimes called Thunderday. See also BLACK, HOLY, MAUNDY THURSDAY.

When three Thursdays come together. One of many circumlocutions for Never.

Thyrsus. The staff carried by Dionysus and his followers. See TORSO.

Tiara (tê a' rà). Anciently the name of the head-dress of the Persian kings; now applied to a coronet-like ornament, and especially to the triple crown of the Pope. This typifies the temporal claims of the papacy, and is composed of gold cloth encircled by three crowns and surmounted by a golden globe and cross.

Tradition has it that for the first five centuries the bishops of Rome wore a simple mitre like other bishops, and that Hormisdas (514-23) placed on his bonnet the crown sent him by Clovis. Boniface VIII (1294-1303) added a second crown during his struggles with Philip the Fair; and John XXII (1410-17) assumed the third.

There are other accounts of the original adoption of the crowns, and of their meanings; some say that the second was added in 1335 by Benedict XII, to indicate the prerogatives of spiritual and temporal power combined in the papacy; and that the third is indicative of the Trinity; and Pius IX, in 1871, spoke of it as:—

The symbol of my threefold dignity, in heaven, upon earth, and in purgatory.

Still another suggestion is that as the Pope claims to be (1) Head of the Catholic or Universal Church; (2) Sole Arbitrator of its Rights; and (3) Sovereign Father of all the kings of the earth, he wears one crown as High Priest, one as Emperor, and one as King.

The papal tiara is very richly ornamented, and contains 146 jewels of all colours, 11 brilliants, and 540 pearls.

Tib. The ace of trumps in the game of Gleeck. Tom is the knave.

That gamester needs must overcome,
That can play both Tib and Tom.

RANDOLPH: Hermaphrodite.

St. Tib's Eve. Never. A corruption of St. Ubes. There is no such saint in the calendar as St. Ubes, and therefore her eve falls on the "Greek Calends" (q.v.), neither before Christmas Day nor after it.

Tichborne Case. The most celebrated impersonation case in English law. In March, 1853, Roger Charles Tichborne, heir to an ancient Hampshire baronetcy, sailed for Valparaíso, and after travelling a while in S. America embarked on April 20th, 1854, in a sailing-ship named the Bella, bound for Jamaica. The ship went down, and nothing more was heard or seen of Roger Tichborne. In October, 1865, "R. C. Tichborne" turned up at Wagga Wagga, in Australia, in the person of a man locally known as Tom Castro. On Christmas Day, 1866, he landed in England as a claimant to the Tichborne baronetcy, asserting that he was the lost Roger. Lady Tichborne, the real Roger's mother, professed to recognize him, but the family could not be deceived. The case came into the Courts where the fellow's claims were proved to be false and he himself identified as Arthur Orton, the son of a Wapping butcher. A further trial for perjury ended in his being sentenced to 14 years penal servitude.

The Tichborne Case has been acknowledged as the greatest cause célèbre of English law; public feeling ran high, and a by-election was said to have been lost because the candidate expressed his doubts as to the claimant's genuineness.

Tick. To go on tick. To owe for what one buys. In the 17th century ticket was the ordinary term for the written acknowledgment of a debt, and one living on credit was said to be living on ticket, or tick.

If a servant usually buy for the master upon tick, and the servant buy some things without the master's order . . . the master is liable.—Chief Justice Holt (Blackstone, ch. xv, p. 468).

Tick-tack. The system of signals by which bookmakers' scouts inform their principals of the odds being offered by other bookmakers on a race course.

Ticket (U.S.A.). The list of nominees for office: "I intend to vote the straight Republican ticket."

As a seafaring term to get one's ticket is to qualify for promotion.

That's the ticket or That's the ticket for soup. That's the right thing. The ticket to be shown in order to obtain something.

Ticket of leave. A warrant given to convicts to have their liberty on condition of good behaviour; hence, Ticket-of-leave man, a convict freed from prison but obliged to report himself to the police from time to time until his sentence was completed. The system is now discontinued.

To work one's ticket. An army expression meaning to get one's discharge before the contract of service has expired.

Tide. Used figuratively of a tendency, a current or flow of events, etc., as in a tide of feeling, and in Shakespeare's—

There is a tide in the affairs of men,

Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune.

Julius Cæsar, iv, 3.

Lose not a tide. Waste no time; set off at once on the business.

Tide-waiters. Custom-house officers who board ships entering ports and see that the customs regulations are carried out. The term has been figuratively applied to those who vote against their opinions.

To tide over a difficulty, hard times, etc. Just to surmount the difficulty, just to come through the hard times, by force of circumstances and a little luck, rather than by one's own endeavours.

Tidy means in tide, in season, in time. We retain the word in eventide, springtide, and so on. Tusser has the phrase, "If the weather be fair and tidy," meaning seasonable. Things done punctually and in their proper season are sure to be done orderly, and what is orderly done is neat and well arranged. Hence we get the notion of methodical, neat, well arranged, associated with tidy.

The word is also used in the sense of a thing being worth consideration. A tidy penny, quite a good sum; a tidy fortune, an inheritance worth having.

Tied House. A retail business, especially a public-house, that is obliged by a contract to obtain its supplies from some particular firm.

There are tied houses in the drapery, grocery, dairy, boot and shoe, hardware, liquor, and book trades.—Liberty Review, 14th April, 1894.

Tiercel. See TASSEL-GENTLE.

Tiffany. A kind of thin silk-like gauze. The word is a corruption of Theophany (Gr. theos, god, ephainein, to show), the manifestation of God to man, the Epiphany; and the material was so called because it used to be worn at the Twelfth Night (Epiphany) revels.

Tiffin. An old Northern English dialect word for a small draught of liquor; it was introduced into India, where it acquired its modern meaning of a lunch, or light meal between breakfast and dinner.

Tiger. The nickname of the French statesman Georges Clemenceau (1841-1929).

A liveried servant who rides out with his master used to be called a tiger, also a boy in buttons, a page; but the expression is now obsolete. The same name is given in America to a final yell in a round of cheering.

Tight. Intoxicated.

Blow me tight! An old expression of surprise, wonder, incredulity, etc.

If there's a soul will give me food or find me in employ,
By day or night, then blow me tight! (he was a vulgar boy).

BARHAM: Misadventures at Margate (Ingoldsby Legends).

Tike. A provincial word (from Old Norse) for a dog or cur; hence used of a low fellow, as in the contemptuous insult, You dirty tike.

A Yorkshire tike. A rustic of that county.

Tilbury. A two-wheeled horse carriage without a top or cover. It was named after its designer, a London coach-maker of the early 19th century.

Tilde. The sign ~ placed over the letter n in Spanish words when this is to be pronounced like our ni in bunion, e.g. cañon (canyon). It is a relic of the small n placed over a word in Latin MSS. to indicate a contraction, and the name is a variant of Span. titulo, title.

The tilde is also occasionally placed over an l to indicate the sound in million, and in Portuguese (called til) over the first vowel of a diphthong to indicate that the diphthong is to have a nasal pronunciation. In Portuguese, too, our ni of bunion is represented by nh, not by n.

Tile. Old slang for a hat, this being to the head what the tiles are to a house.

He has a tile loose. He is not quite compos mentis, not all there.

In Freemasonry, to tile a lodge means to close and guard the doors to prevent anyone uninitiated from entering, the officer who does this being called the Tiler, sometimes spelled tyler.

Timber (U.S.A.). To take the tall timber; to depart or escape suddenly and unceremoniously.

Time. Summer time. The legal, as apart from Greenwich time during a certain portion of the year in Great Britain and some other countries. In the spring of 1916 the Summer Time Act was passed ordaining that—

During the prescribed period in each year during which this Act is in force the time for general purposes in Great Britain shall be one hour in advance of Greenwich Mean Time.

The scheme had been proposed in 1906 by William Willett, a Chelsea builder.

Until 1939 the prescribed period was "from two o'clock in the morning following the third Saturday in April . . . until two o'clock in the morning next following the first Saturday in October."

During World War II the dates were varied, and the actual period of Summer Time has since 1939 been annually prescribed by Order in Council.

Between the years 1941 and 1945 Double Summer Time was introduced, this enforcing the addition of an hour to the Summer Time, thus making legal time two hours ahead of Greenwich time.

Take time by the forelock. Seize the present moment; Carpe diem. Time called by Shakespeare "that bald sexton" (King John iii, 1), is represented with a lock of hair on his forehead but none on the rest of his head, to signify that time past cannot be used, but time present may be seized by the forelock. The saying is attributed to Pittacus of Mitylene, one of the Seven Sages of Greece.

Time and tide wait for no man. One of many sayings pointing the folly of procrastination. It appears in Ray's Scottish Proverbs as "Time bides na man."

For the next inn he spits amain,
In haste alights, and scuds away—
But time and tide for no man stay.
SOMERVILLE: The Sweet-scented Miser.

Time-expired. Applied to soldiers whose term of service is completed. Also used of convicts who have served their sentences.

Time-honoured Lancaster. Old John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster (about 1340-99), so called by Shakespeare (Richard II, i, 1) because his memory had been honoured by Time. His father was Edward III, his son Henry IV, his nephew Richard II, and through his great granddaughter, Margaret Beaufort, he is the ancestor of all our sovereigns from Henry VII, Margaret's son. Shakespeare calls him "old"; he was only fifty-nine at his death.

Time is, Time was, Time's past. See BRAZEN HEAD.

Time of Grace. See SPORTING SEASONS.

Time lag, term given to the pause that elapses between a cause and its effect.

Time signal. A visual or wireless signal indicating exact noon or some other recognized hour.

Time zone. One of the 24 longitudinal divisions of the globe, corresponding mostly with meridians of 15° from the meridian of Greenwich. These divisions or zones are successively of one hour of time interval.

To have had one's time. A British soldiers' expression in World War II for being ripe for death, to expect imminent disaster.

To know the time o' day. To be smart, wide awake.

Timeo Danaos. See GREEK GIFT.

Timoleon (tí mó' lē on). The Greek general and statesman (d. about 336 B.C.) who so hated tyranny that he voted for the death of his own brother Timophanes when he attempted to make himself absolute in Corinth.

The fair Corinthian boast
Timoleon, happy temper, mild and firm,
Who wept the brother while the tyrant bled.
THOMSON: Winter.

Timon of Athens (tí' mon). An Athenian misanthrope of the late 5th century B.C., and the principal figure in Shakespeare's play so called. The play, was acted about 1607 and printed in 1623.

Macaulay uses the expression to "out-Timon Timon"—i.e. to be more misanthropical than even Timon.

Timur. See TAMBURLAINE.

Tin. Money. A depreciating synonym for silver, called by alchemists "Jupiter."

Tin fish. Naval slang for a torpedo.

Tin hat. A soldiers' name for a metal shrapnel helmet. To put the tin hat on it, to bring something to an abrupt and conclusive end.

Tin-pan Alley. The district of New York City where popular music is published. The phrase is often used generically of the composers of this type of music.

Tintype. A positive photograph taken on a sensitized sheet of enamelled tin. Tintypes were cheap and very popular at fairs, amusement parks, etc.

Tincture. The heraldic term for a colour as opposed to a metal or fur.

Tine-man, The. Archibald Douglas, 4th Earl of Douglas, who died 1424.

In old Scottish a tiner was a loser, and Douglas was said to have lost every battle or skirmish he ever took part in.

Tinker's damn. Not worth a tinker's damn. Absolutely worthless. It has been suggested that the term originated in the old-time tinker's custom of blocking up the hole in the article he was mending with a pellet of bread, thus making a dam which would prevent the solder from running through. This pellet was, of course, thrown away as useless when the job was finished.

Tintagel (tin tāj' ēl). The castle on the north coast of Cornwall where, according to tradition, Uther died and King Arthur was born. Its ruins still exist, on a rocky headland jutting into the sea.

Tip. A small present of money, such as that given to a waiter, porter, or schoolboy; from the cant verb (common in the 16th and 17th centuries) to tip, meaning to hand over, which also gives rise to the other signification of the verb, viz., private warning, such secret information as may guide the person tipped to make successful bets or gain some other advantage. A straight tip comes straight or direct from the owner or trainer of a horse, or from one in a position to know.

Tip and Run Raid. A phrase used in World War II when hostile aircraft flew in across the sea, hurriedly—and often indiscriminately—dropped their bombs, and immediately sped homewards. So called from the light-hearted form of holiday cricket in which the batsman is forced to run every time he touches the ball.

Tip off. To warn or give a hint, especially timely warning of a police raid.

Tip-top. First rate, capital, splendid.

To have a thing on the tip of one's tongue. To have it so pat that it comes without thought; also, to have it on the verge of one's memory, but not quite perfectly remembered.

To tip one the wink. To make a signal to another by a wink.

Tiphany. The name given in the old romances to the mother of the Magi. It is a corruption of Epiphany. See TIFFANY.

Tiphys. The pilot of the Argonauts (q.v.); hence a generic name for pilots.

"Tipperary." This song, that will be forever associated with World War I, was composed by Jack Judge (d. 1938), of Oldbury, Birmingham. The words were by Harry J. Williams, of Temple Balsall, Warwickshire, and the first line of the song is engraved on his tombstone. "Tipperary" was composed in 1912 and was already popular on the music-hall stage by 1914. It was sung by troops embarking for France, by men "going over the top," by WAACS and WRENS. The refrain was:—

Goodbye Piccadilly; farewell Leicester Square
It's a long, long way to Tipperary.
My heart's right there.

Tipperary Rifle. A shillelagh or stick made of blackthorn.

Tippling House. A contemptuous name for a tavern or public-house. A tippler was formerly a tavern-keeper or tapster, and the tavern was called a tippling house. At Boston, Lincolnshire, in 1577, five persons were appointed "tipplers of Lincoln beer," and no "other tippler [might] draw or sell beer . . ." under penalties.

Tipstaff. A constable, bailiff, or sheriff's officer; so called because he carried a staff tipped with a bull's horn or with metal. In the documents of Edward III allusion is often made to his staff.

Tirant lo Blanch. A romance of chivalry by Johannot Martorell and Johan de Galba, written in Catalan and published at Valencia in 1490. A favourite book of Cervantes, and one which figures in Don Quixote's library.

Tiresias (tī rē' si às). A Theban of Greek legend, who by accident saw Athene bathing, and was therefore struck with blindness by her splashing water in his face. She afterwards repented, and, as she could not restore his sight, conferred on him the power of sooth-saying and of understanding the language of birds, and gave him a staff with which he could walk as safely as if he had his sight. He found death at last by drinking from the well of Tilphosa.

Tirl. A Scottish variant of twirl.

He tirlt at the pin. He twiddled or rattled with the latch before opening the door. The pin was not only the latch of chamber doors and cottages, but the "rasp" of castles used instead of the modern knocker. It was attached to a ring, which produced a grating sound to give notice to the warder.

Sae licht he jumped up the stair,
And tirlt at the pin;
And wha sae ready as hersel'
To let the laddie in.

Charlie is my Darling.

Tironian (tī rō' ni ăn). Pertaining to a system of shorthand said to have been invented by Tiro, the freedman and amanuensis of Cicero. Our "&" (see AMPERSAND) is still sometimes called the Tironian sign, for it represents the contraction of Lat. et introduced by Tiro.

With regard to this Maunde Thompson (Handbook to Greek and Latin Palaeography, p. 84) says, "Suetonius has it that 'Vulgaris notas Ennius primus mille et centum invenit,'" and adds that more generally the name of Cicero's freedman, Tiro, is associated with the invention, the signs being commonly named "notæ Tironianæ." See also SHORT-HAND.

Tirynthian (ti rin' thi ăn). Hercules is called by Spenser the Tirynthian Swain (Faerie Queene, VI, xii, 35), and the Tirynthian Groom (Epithalamium, 329), because he generally resided at Tiryns, an ancient city of Argolis in Greece, famous for its Cyclopean architecture, which is mentioned by Homer, and the ruins of which are still magnificent.

Tit for Tat. Retaliation; probably representing tip for tap, i.e. blow for blow. J. Bellenden Ker says this is the Dutch dit vor dat (this for that), Lat. quid pro quo. Heywood uses the phrase tit for tat, perhaps the French tant pour tant.

Titan (tí' tán). Primordial being of Greek mythology, of enormous size and strength, and typical of lawlessness and the power of force. There were twelve, six male (Oceanus, Coeus, Crius, Hyperion, Japetus, and Cronus) and six female (Theia, Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phoebe, and Tethys), children of Uranus and Ge (Heaven and Earth). Legends vary, but one states that Cronus swallowed the rest of them, and that when liberated by Zeus (son of Cronus), they dethroned and emasculated their father, Uranus; whereupon they made war on Zeus, who, after defeating them, imprisoned them all—Oceanus alone excepted—in Tartarus.

By Virgil and Ovid the Sun was sometimes surnamed Titan; hence Shakespeare's:—

And flecked Darkness like a drunkard reels

From forth Day's path and Titan's fiery wheels.

Romeo and Juliet, ii, 3.

Titania (ti tan' yá). Wife of Oberon (q.v.), and Queen of the Fairies in A Midsummer Night's Dream. Shakespeare was, apparently, the first to use this name.

Titanic. A White Star liner, at the time of her launching the biggest vessel in the world and reputed unsinkable. While on her maiden voyage from Southampton to New York she collided, it is believed, with a submerged iceberg and in less than three hours went to the bottom, at 2.20 a.m., April 15th, 1912. The Carpathia picked up about 700 survivors, but over 1,500 lives were lost.

Tithonus (ti thō' nūs). A beautiful Trojan of Greek legend, brother to Laomedon, and beloved by Eos (Aurora). At his prayer the goddess granted him immortality, but as he had forgotten to ask for youth and vigour he grew old, and life became insupportable. He now prayed Eos to remove him from the world; this, however, she could not do, but she changed him into a grasshopper.

Titi, Prince (tē' tē). The nickname of Frederick, Prince of Wales, eldest son of George II. In constant opposition to his father, in 1735 he wrote an Histoire du Prince Titi which contained gross and unmanly caricatures of his father and mother. Two English translations of this offensive work appeared in 1736.

Titles of Kings. See RULERS; RELIGIOUS.

Title-role, in a play, opera or film, is the part or role from which the title is taken, e.g. Carmen, Hamlet, Aida.

Titmouse. See MISNOMERS.

Titular Bishops. The Roman Catholic dignitaries formerly known as bishops in partibus. See IN PARTIBUS.

Titus (tí' tūs). An alternative name of the Penitent Thief. See DYSMAS.

The Arch of Titus. The arch built in Rome in commemoration of the capture of Jerusalem by Titus and Vespasian (A.D. 70) shortly after that event. It is richly sculptured, and the trophies taken at the destruction of the temple are shown in relief.

Tityrus (tít' i rus). A poetical surname for a shepherd; from its use in Greek idylls and Virgil's first Eclogue. In the Shepherd's Calendar (Feb., June, and Dec.) Spenser calls Chaucer by this name.

Heroes and their feats

Fatigue me, never weary of the pipe

Of Tityrus, assembling as he sang

The rustic throng beneath: his favourite beech.

COWPER: The Winter Evening, 750.

Tityre Tus. Dissolute young scapegraces of the late 17th century (cp. MOHOCKS) whose delight was to annoy the watchmen, upset sedans, wrench knockers off doors, and insult pretty women. The name comes from the first line of Virgil's first Eclogue, Tityre, tu patulæ recubans sub tegmine fagi, because the Tityre Tus loved to lurk in the dark night looking for mischief.

Tityus (tít' i ūs). A gigantic son of Zeus and Ge in Greek mythology whose body covered nine acres of land. He tried to defile Latona, but Apollo cast him into Tartarus, where a vulture fed on his liver, which grew again as fast as it was devoured. (Cp. PROMETHEUS.) He was the father of Europa.

Tiu. Son of Woden (Scandinavian mythology), and a younger brother of Thor. The wolf Fenrir bit off his hand.

Tizzy. A sixpenny-piece; a variant of tester (q.v.).

Tmesis (tme' sis). The grammatical term for the separation of the parts of a compound word by inserting between them other words, or the re-arrangement in this manner of the words of a phrase; e.g. "A large meal and rich," instead of a large, rich meal. "The greatness of his power to usward" (Eph. i, 19) instead of The greatness of his power toward us.

To-do. Here's a pretty to-do. Disturbance.

To-remain Bible. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Toads. The device of Clovis was three toads (or botes, as they were called in O.Fr.); legend relates that after his conversion and baptism the Arians assembled a large army under King Candat against him. While on his way to meet the heretics Clovis saw in the heavens his device miraculously changed into three lilies or on a banner azure. He instantly had such a banner made, and called it his oriflamme, and even before his army came in sight of King Candat, the host of the heretic lay dead, slain, like the army of Sennacherib, by a blast from the God of Battles (Raoul de Presles: Grans Croniques de France).

The toad, ugly and venomous, wears yet a precious jewel in its head. Fenton says: "There is to be found in the heads of old and great toads a stone they call borax or stelon, which, being used as rings, give forewarning against venom" (1569). These stones always bear a figure resembling a toad on their surface.

Lupton says: "A toad-stone, called crepudia, touching any part envenomed by the bite of a rat, wasp, spider, or other venomous beast, ceases the pain and swelling thereof." In the Londesborough Collection is a silver ring of the 15th century, in which one of these toad-stones is set. The stone was supposed to sweat and change colour when poison was in its proximity. Technically called the Batrachyte or Batrachos, an antidote to all sorts of poison.

Toads unknown in Ireland. It is said that St. Patrick cleared the island of all vermin by his malediction.

Toad-eater or Toady. A cringing, obsequious parasite. The old mountebanks used to take around with them a boy who ate—or pretended to eat—toads which at that time were supposed to be poisonous. This gave his master an opportunity to exhibit his skill in expelling poison.

Be the most scorn'd Jack-pudding of the pack,
And turn toad-eater to some foreign quack.

TOM BROWNE: (Works, I, 71).

Toad-in-the-hole. A piece of beef, sausage, chop, etc., baked in batter.

Toast. The person, cause, object, etc., to which guests are invited to drink in compliment, as well as the drink itself. The word is taken from the piece of toast which used at one time to be put into the tankard, and which still floats in the loving-cups at the Universities.

The story goes that in the reign of Charles II a certain beau pledged a noted beauty in a glass of water taken from her bath; whereupon another roysterer cried out he would have nothing to do with the liquor, but would have the toast—i.e. the lady herself. (Rambler, No. 24.)

Let the toast pass, drink to the lass.—SHERIDAN:
School for Scandal.

Say, why are beauties praised and honoured most,
The wise man's passion and the vain man's toast.

POPE: Rape of the Lock, canto i.

Toaster, Toasting-iron. See CHEESE-TOASTER.

Toast-master. The official who announces the after-dinner speakers at a formal banquet. He must be a man of stentorian voice and enjoy a nice knowledge of precedence.

Tobit. The principal character of the Book of Tobit, a romance included in the Old Testament Apocrypha. While sleeping outside the wall of his courtyard he was blinded by sparrows "muting warm dung into his eyes." His son Tobias was attacked on the Tigris by a fish, which leapt out of the water and which he caught at the bidding of the angel Raphael, his mentor. Tobit was cured of his blindness by applying to his eyes the gall of this fish.

Toboso (tò bō' zō). The village home of Don Quixote's lady-love, whom he renamed Dulcinea (q.v.). It is a few miles east of Ciudad Real.

Toby. The dog in the puppet-show of Punch and Judy (q.v.). He wears a frill garnished with bells, to frighten away the devil from his master.

My Uncle Toby. Captain Shandy, the uncle of Tristram Shandy in Sterne's novel of that name. He is the embodiment of the wisdom of love, as his brother is that of the love of wisdom.

The high toby, the high road; the low toby, the by-road. A highwayman is a "high tobyman"; a mere footpad is a "low tobyman." This is probably from the Shelta (i.e. tinkers' jargon) word for road, tobar.

Toby jug. A small jug in the form of a squat old man in 18th-century dress, wearing a three-cornered hat, one corner of which forms the lip. The name comes from a poem (1761) about one "Toby Philpot," adapted from the Latin by Francis Fawkes; and the design of the jug from a print sold by Carrington Bowles, a London print-seller, to Ralph Wood, the potter, who turned out a great number of Toby Jugs.

Toc H. The morse pronunciation of the letters T.H., the initials of Talbot House. The term was used in World War I, when the first Talbot House was founded, in December 1915, at Poperinghe, in memory of Gilbert Talbot, son of the Bishop of Winchester, who had been killed at Hooze in the preceding July. The Rev. P. B. Clayton, M.C. made it a famous rest and recreation centre. In 1920 he founded a similar centre in London, also known as Toc H, which developed into an interdenominational association for Christian social service.

Tocsin (tok' sin). An alarm signal given by the ringing of church bells. As tocksaine it is an old English word coming through the French toquesin, from toquer, to touch, and senh, Provençal for a bell.

Toddy. Properly the juice obtained by tapping certain palms, fermented so as to become intoxicating (Hindu tadi, from tar, a palm). It is also applied to a beverage compounded of spirits, hot water, and sugar, a kind of punch.

Tofana (to fa' nà). An old woman of Naples (d. 1730) immortalized by her invention of a tasteless and colourless poison, called by her the Manna of St. Nicola of Bari, but better known as Aqua Tofana. Above 600 persons fell victims to this insidious drug.

Toga (tō' gá). The usual outer dress of a Roman citizen when appearing in public; the Romans were hence the Gens togata (q.v.), the "togaed people."

The toga consisted of a single piece of undyed woollen cloth, cut almost in a semi-circle and worn in a flowing fashion round the shoulders and body.

Toga picta. The toga embroidered with golden stars that was worn by the emperor on special occasions, by a victorious general at his "triumph," etc.

Toga prætexta. The toga with a purple border that was worn by children, by those engaged in sacred rites, magistrates, etc.

Toga virilis. The toga worn by men (virilis, manly), assumed by boys when 15.

Toggle (U.S.A.). A verb meaning to fasten together with bits of rope. The word is a seaman's word of the 17th century, a toggle being a wooden pin passed through the eye or loop of a rope, or through a link of a chain. In World War II a toggle rope was a length of stout cord with a small bar of wood spliced into it at one end and a loop at the other; it was used for a variety of purposes and was carried by British Commandos.

Togs. Slang for clothes; hence togged out in his best, dressed in his best clothes; toggery, finery. The word may be connected with toga (see above).

Token Payment. A small payment made as a formal and binding acknowledgement of indebtedness. The word "token" is often used to describe some action or phrase used in lieu of—but acknowledging—a greater obligation.

Tokyo Rose. The name given by U.S. service men to a woman broadcaster of propaganda from Japan during World War II. Several U.S.A.-born Japanese (Nisei) girls were identified as taking part in these broadcasts, notably Iva Togori, of California, and Ruth Hayakawa.

Toledo (tó lō' dō). A sword made at Toledo in Spain, which place, long before and after the Middle Ages, was specially famous for them. I give him three years and a day to match my Toledo And then we'll fight like dragons.

MASSINGER: The Maid of Honour, ii, 2.

Tollbooth (tōl' booth). Originally a booth or stall where taxes were collected.

And whanne Jesus passide fro thennis, he saw a man, Matheu bi name, situnge in a tolbothe.—WYCLIFFE, Matt. ix, 9.

In Scotland the term was applied to the town gaol, from the custom of confining offenders against the laws of a fair or market in the booth where market dues were collected.

Tolosa (to lō' sà). He has got the gold of Tolosa. His ill-gotten wealth will do him no good. See under GOLD.

Tom, Tommy. Short for Thomas: used of the male of certain animals (especially the cat), and generically—like Jack (q.v.)—for a man. It is also a generic name for a little boy. When contrasted, Jack is usually the sharp, shrewd, active fellow, and Tom the honest dullard. No one would think of calling the thick-headed male cat a Jack, nor the pert, dexterous, thieving daw a Tom. The former is almost instinctively called a Tom-cat, and the latter a Jack-daw.

The man that haills you Tom or Jack,
And proves by thumps upon your back
How he esteems your merit
Is such a friend, that one had need
Be very much his friend indeed
To pardon or to bear it.

COWPER: Friendship.

Great Tom of Lincoln. A bell at Lincoln Cathedral weighing 5 tons 8 cwt.

Great Tom of Oxford. A bell in Tom Gate Tower (see TOM GATE) at Oxford, tolled every night. It weighs 7 tons 12 cwt.

Long Tom. A familiar name for any gun of great length; especially the naval 4-7s used on land in the Boer War.

Old Tom. A specially potent gin. The story goes that a Thomas Norris, employed in Messrs. Hodges' distillery, opened a gin palace in Great Russell Street, Covent Garden, in the late 18th century, and called the gin concocted by Thomas Chamberlain, one of the firm of Hodges, "Old Tom," in compliment to his former master.

Tom and Jerry. Types of the roistering young man about town; from Pierce Egan's Life in London; or, The Day and Night Scenes of Jerry Hawthorn, Esq., and his Elegant Friend Corinthian Tom (1821). Cp. JERRYSHOP.

Tomboy. A romping girl. The word was formerly used of a loose or immodest woman, whence the slang, Tom, applied to a prostitute.

A lady
So fair . . . to be partner'd
With tomboys.

Cymbeline, i, 6.

Tom Collins. A long drink of gin, lemon or lime, and some sparkling aerated water—in England bitter beer. Many localities claim the original Tom Collins; whoever he was or wherever he lived he deserves well of posterity.

Tom, Dick, and Harry. A Victorian term for "the man in the street," more particularly persons of no note; persons unworthy notice. "Brown, Jones, and Robinson" are far other men; they are the vulgar rich, who give themselves airs, especially abroad, and look with scorn on all foreign manners and customs which differ from their own.

Tom Fool. A clumsy, witless fool, fond of stupid practical jokes; hence, tomfoolery.

Tom Gate, The. The great gate of Christ Church, Oxford, begun by Wolsey and completed (1682) by Wren. In its tower is "Great Tom" (see above).

Tom Quad. The great quadrangle of Christ Church, Oxford.

Tom Long. Any lazy, dilatory man. To be kept waiting for Tom Long is to be kept hanging about for a wearisome time.

Tom Noddy. A puffing, fuming, stupid creature.

Tom o' Bedlam. A mendicant who levies charity on the plea of insanity. In the 16th and 17th centuries applications for admission to Bedlam (q.v.) became so numerous that many inmates were dismissed half cured. These "ticket-of-leave men" wandered about chanting mad songs, and dressed in fantastic dresses, to excite pity. Posing as these harmless "innocents," a set of sturdy rogues appeared, called Abram men (q.v.), who shammed lunacy, and committed great depredations.

With a sigh like Tom o' Bedlam.
SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, i, 2.

Tom Thumb. Any dwarfish or insignificant person is so called; from the pigmy hero of the old nursery tale, popular in the 16th century. The History of Tom Thumb was published by R. Johnson in 1621, and there is a similar tale by Perrault (Le Petit Poucet), in 1630.

The American dwarf Charles Sherwood Stratton (1838-83) was popularly called "General Tom Thumb" (see DWARFS); and Fielding wrote a burlesque (acted 1730) entitled Tom Thumb the Great. See also BOAST OF ENGLAND.

Tom Tiddler's ground. A place where it is easy to pick up a fortune or make a place in the world for oneself; from the old children's game in which a base-keeper, who is called

Tom Tiddler, tries to keep the other children who sing :—

Here we are on Tom Tiddler's ground
Picking up gold and silver.

from crossing the boundary into his base.

Tom Tiller. A hen-pecked husband.

Tom's. A noted coffee-house of the late 18th century, that was in existence in Russell Street, Covent Garden, as late as 1865. It was owned by and named after Thomas West, and here in 1764 was founded Tom's Club, which included all the literary and social notabilities of the time.

Tommy, or Tommy Atkins. A British private soldier, as a Jack Tar is a British sailor. At one time all recruits were served out with manuals in which were to be entered the name, age, date of enlistment, length of service, wounds, medals, and so on of the holder. With each book was sent a specimen form showing how the one in the manual should be filled in, and the hypothetical name selected was Thomas Atkins.

Tommy bar. This is a small bar of rounded metal used for inserting into and turning box-spanners and similar tools.

Tommy-cooker. A small individual stove using solid fuel, invented in the time of World War I and issued to Allied troops in World War II. It was also the name given by the Germans to the Sherman Tank, which caught fire very easily when hit.

Tommy Dodd. The "odd" man who, in tossing up, either wins or loses according to agreement with his confederate.

To go Tommy Dodd for drinks, etc., is to toss "odd man out," the odd man dropping out until there are only two left, who toss for who pays.

Tommy gun. A Thompson short-barrelled, sub-machine gun.

Tommy rot. Utter nonsense, rubbish; a cock-and-bull story (q.v.).

Tommy shop. A shop where vouchers, given by an employer in lieu of money, can be exchanged for goods; commonly run by large employers of labour before the truck system was made illegal.

Tomahawk (tom' à hawk). The war axe of the N. American Indians, pre-historically made of stone or deer-horn but after the coming of the white man of iron or steel with a wooden handle. Sometimes the blunt end of the head was hollowed into a pipe-bowl, the handle being bored to form a stem. It was the custom of the Indians to bury the tomahawk when making peace, and dig it up again on the outbreak of war—hence the phrase To bury the hatchet.

Tombland Fair. See MAUNDY THURSDAY.

To-morrow. To-morrow come never. Never at all—when two Sundays, or three Thursdays, meet.

To-morrow never comes. Because, when it does come it ceases to be to-morrow and becomes to-day; a reproof to those who defer till to-morrow what should be done to-day.

A similar—though more caustic—saying is :—

Treason doth never prosper; what's the reason?
For if it prosper, none dare call it treason.

SIR JOHN HARRINGTON (d. 1612).

Tone Poem, or Symphonic Poem, is a form of orchestral work which is intended to describe some literary or other subject. As with other programme music it requires an accompanying explanatory description. The term Symphonic Poem was first used by Liszt, who wrote thirteen works of this description.

Tong. A Chinese association or political party. In U.S.A. the tongs are frequently looked upon by the police with suspicion, the rigid exclusiveness of the society and the secrecy attending its meetings being suggestive of subversive intentions.

Tongue. A lick with the rough side of the tongue. A severe reprimand, a good slating.

The gift of tongues. Command of foreign languages; also the power claimed by the Early Church and by some later mystics (as the Irvingites) of conversing and understanding unknown tongues (from the miracle at Pentecost—Acts ii, 4).

The three tongues. See THREE.

The tongue of the trump. The spokesman or leader of a party.

The tongue of the trump to them a'.

BURNS: The Election Ballads, III.

To give someone the length of one's tongue. To talk to him "like a Dutch uncle"; to tell him in unmeasured language what you really think of him.

To give tongue. Properly used of a dog barking when on the scent; hence sometimes applied to people. Thus Polonius says to his son :—

Give thy thoughts no tongue,
Nor any unproportioned thought his act.
Hamlet, i, 3.

To hold one's tongue. To keep silent when one might speak; to keep a secret.

To lose one's tongue. To become tongue-tied or speechless through shyness, fear, etc.

To speak with one's tongue in one's cheek. Insincerely; saying one thing and meaning another.

Tongue-tied. Speechless, usually through bashfulness or modesty; also (literally) having an impediment of the speech through shortness of the frænum.

Tonic Sol-fa. A system of musical notation in which diatonic scales are written always in one way (the keynote being indicated), the tones being represented by syllables or initials, and time and accents by dashes and colons. Tonic is a musical term denoting pertaining to or founded on the keynote; sol and fa are two of the Aretinian Syllables (q.v.). See also DOH; GAMUT.

Tonquin Bean. See MISNOMERS.

Tonsure. The sacerdotal custom among priests of "being tonsured," i.e. having the head, or part of it, shaved (Lat. tonsura, a shearing), dates from the 5th or 6th centuries, and symbolizes Christ's crown of thorns. That of the secular clergy is a round space about the size of a half-crown at the crown of the head. In Britain, U.S.A. and other countries where it would not be in accordance with the customs of the people the tonsure is not retained after ordination. Among regulars there is a great variety of tonsure; Carthusians and Camaldolese shave the whole head except for a horizontal strip (corona) about half an inch wide; Friars Minor, Cistercians, and Benedictines have a wider corona; Dominicans shave the whole crown above the top of the ears; these are all called the great tonsure. The tonsure of Eastern monks is a cruciform cutting of part of the hair. The Celtic tonsure was made by cutting off all the hair in front of a line drawn over the head from ear to ear.

Tontine (ton' tēn). A form of annuity shared by several subscribers, in which the shares of those who die are added to the holdings of the survivors till the last survivor inherits all. So named from Lorenzo Tonti, a Neapolitan banker, who introduced the system into France in 1653. In 1765 the House of Commons raised £300,000 by way of tontine annuities at 3 per cent.; and so late as 1871 the Daily News announced a proposed tontine to raise £650,000 to purchase the Alexandra Palace and 100 acres of land.

Tool. To tool a coach. To drive one; generally applied to a gentleman driver who undertook stage-coach driving for his own amusement.

Tooley Street. A corruption of St. Olaf—i.e. 'T-olaf, Tolay, Tooley. Similarly, Sise Lane is St. Osyth's Lane.

The three tailors of Tooley Street. See TAILOR.

Toom Tabard (Scot., empty jacket). A nickname given to John Baliol (1249-1315), because of his poor spirit, and sleeveless appointment to the throne of Scotland. The honour was an "empty jacket," which he enjoyed only from 1292 to 1296. He died in Normandy.

Tooth, Teeth. Golden tooth. See GOLDEN.

Tooth and egg. An obsolete corruption of tutenag (from Arab. tutiya), an alloy rich in zinc, coming from China and the East Indies and largely used for lining tea-chests.

With tooth and nail. In right good earnest, with one's utmost power; as though biting and scratching.

By the skin of one's teeth. See SKIN.

From the teeth outwards. Merely talk; without real significance.

He has cut his eye-teeth. He is "wide awake," quite sophisticated; he has "his weather-eye open." The eye-teeth (i.e. the upper canines) are cut late:—

	Months.
First set	5 to 8,	the four central incisors.
	7 " 10 "	" lateral incisors.
	12 " 16 "	" anterior molars.
	14 " 20 "	" eye-teeth.
	Years.
Second set—	5 to 6,	the anterior molars.
	7 " 8 "	" incisors.
	9 " 10 "	" bicuspidis.
	11 " 12 "	" eye-teeth.

See also EYE-TEETH.

His teeth are drawn. His power of doing mischief is taken from him. The phrase comes from the fable of the lion in love, who consented to have his teeth drawn and claws cut, in order that a fair damsel might marry him. When this was done the girl's father fell on the lion and slew him.

In spite of his teeth. In opposition to his settled purpose or resolution; even though he snarl and show his teeth like an angry dog. Holinshed tells us of a Bristol Jew, who suffered a tooth to be drawn daily for seven days before he would submit to the extortion of King John.

In despite of the teeth of all the rhyme and reason.
—Merry Wives, v, 4.

In the teeth of the wind. With the wind dead against one, blowing in or against the teeth.

To strive with all the tempest in my teeth.
POPE: Epistles of Horace, II, ii.

To cast into one's teeth. To utter reproaches.

All his faults observed,
Set in a note-book, learned, and conned by rote,
To cast into my teeth.

Julius Caesar, iv, 3.

To set one's teeth on edge. See EDGE.

Top. See also MIZENTOP.

Over the top. One is said to go over the top when he takes the final plunge. A phrase from the trench warfare of World War I when, at zero hour, troops climbed over the parapet of the front-line trenches to advance across No-man's-land to attack the enemy front line.

The Big Top is the big circus tent in which the main performance takes place.

Top dog, the one who by skill, personality or violence obtains the mastery, as the dog who is on top of his adversary in a fight.

To blow one's top. To go mad; to lose all control of oneself.

The top o' the morning to ye! A cheery greeting on a fine day, especially in Ireland. It is about the same as "The best of everything to you!"

Top-heavy. Liable to tip over because the centre of gravity is too high; intoxicated.

Top sawyer. A first-rate fellow, a distinguished man. Literally, the sawyer who works the upper handle in a saw-pit; hence one who holds a superior position.

To sleep like a top. See SLEEP.

Topham. Take him, Topham. Catch him if you can; lay hold of him, tipstaff. Topham was the Black Rod of the House of Commons in the reign of Charles II, very active in apprehending suspects during the supposed conspiracy revealed by Titus Oates. "Take him, Topham," became a proverbial saying of the time.

Tophet (tō' fet). A valley to the south of Jerusalem, at the south-east of Gehenna (q.v.), where children were made to "pass through the fire to Moloch." Josiah threw dead bodies, ordure, and other unclean things there, to prevent all further application of the place to religious use (2 Kings xxiii, 10), and here Sennacherib's army was destroyed (Is. xxx, 31-33). A perpetual fire was kept burning in it to consume the dead bodies, bones, filth, etc., deposited there, and hence it was taken as symbolical of Sheol or Hell. The name is Hebrew, and may mean "a place to be spat upon."

Toplady Ring. See ROCK OF AGES.

Topsy. The little slave girl in Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852); chiefly remembered because when asked by "Aunt Ophelia" about her parents she maintained that she had had neither father nor mother, her solution of her existence being "I 'spects I growed."

Topsy-turvy. Upside down; probably top, with so and obsolete terve, connected with A.S. tearflian, to turn or roll over. Shakespeare says, "Turn it topsy-turvy down" (1 Henry IV, iv, 1). Cp. HALF-SEAS OVER.

Torah (tôr' à). The Hebrew term for the Pentateuch or Five Books of Moses. The word is also used collectively for the entire Scriptures and the corpus of Jewish religious literature.

Torch (U.S.A.). To carry the torch for someone means to admire or love that person—the torch being the torch of love.

Toreador (tor' e dôr). A popular misnomer for torero, a Spanish bull-fighter.

Torpid. The name given to the Lent boat races at Oxford, between the second crews of colleges. A second-class racing boat is a torpid.

Torricelli. An Italian mathematician (1608-47), noted for his explanation of the rise of mercury in a common barometer. Galileo explained the phenomenon by the ipse dixit of "Nature abhors a vacuum."

Hence Torricellian tube, the barometer, and Torricellian vacuum, the vacuum above the mercury in this.

Torso. A statue which has lost its head and limbs. The word is Ital. for a stump or stalk, from Lat. thyrsus, the attribute of Bacchus, consisting of a spear-shaft wreathed with ivy or vine branches and tipped with a fir-cone.

The Torso Belvedere, the famous torso of Hercules, in the Vatican, was discovered in the fifteenth century. It is said that Michael Angelo greatly admired it.

Tortoise. The name is given to the ancient Roman testudo, i.e. the screen formed by the overlapping shields held above their heads by soldiers when attacking a fort. The animal is frequently taken as the type of plodding perseverance—"slow but sure."

The tortoise which, according to Hindu myth, supports Maha-pudma, the elephant which, in its turn, supports the world, is Chukwa.

Achilles and the tortoise. See ACHILLES.

Like the hare and the tortoise. See HARE.

Tory (tôr' i). The name given in the 17th century to the Irish who were turned out of their holdings by English settlers, and so took to the hills and bogs and developed into brigands and outlaws (from toraidhe, a pursued person). During the Revolution it was applied to the Catholics fighting for James II; hence to those in England who refused to concur in excluding James from the throne. Until the accession of George III the party had a Stuart bias, but it then decided vigorously to uphold the Crown, the Church as by law established, and all constituted authority. As the name of the political and parliamentary party it was gradually superseded after 1830 by "Conservative" (q.v.), but it has been retained to denote the principles and policy of the party. Cp. DIE-HARDS; LIBERAL; UNIONIST.

Totalizator (tô tâl i zâ' tôr). A machine used for betting on horse races and other sporting events. Known in France as the Pari Mutuel, its use was legalized in Britain in 1928, when a number were installed on the principal race-courses. Worked by electricity the totalizator automatically records the number of bets on a given horse, etc., and registers the amount of money due to the successful backers.

Totalitarian (tô tâl i târ' i ân). An ugly neologism invented to describe an ugly thing—a form of government that neither tolerates nor recognizes any persons or parties holding views differing from its own.

Totem (tô' tem). A North American Indian (Algonkin) word for some natural object, usually an animal, taken as the emblem of a person or clan on account of a supposed relationship. Totemism, which is common among primitive peoples, has a distinct value in preventing intermarriage among near relations, for if persons bearing the same totem (as, for instance, in the case of brothers and sisters) intermarry the punishment is death. Another custom is that one is not allowed to kill or eat the animal borne as one's totem.

This very extraordinary institution, whatever its origin, cannot have arisen except among men capable of conceiving kinship and all human relationships as existing between themselves and all animate and inanimate things. It is the rule and not the exception that all savage societies are founded upon this belief. —ANDREW LANG: Myth, Ritual, and Religion.

Totem pole. The post standing before a dwelling on which grotesque and, frequently, brilliantly coloured representations of the totem were carved or hung. It is often of great size, and sometimes so broad at the base that an archway is cut through it.

Touch and Go. A very narrow escape; a metaphor derived, perhaps, from driving when the wheel of one vehicle touches that of another passing vehicle without doing mischief. It was a touch, but neither vehicle was stopped, each could go on.

Touch down. In Rugby and American football, to score by touching the ball on the ground within a certain defined area behind the opponent's goal posts.

Touchy. Apt to take offence on slight provocation. Ne touches pas, Noli me tangere, one not to be touched.

Touchstone. A dark flinty schist, jasper, or basanite (the Lapis Lydius of the ancients), so called because gold is tried by it. A series of needles are formed (1) of pure gold; (2) of 23 gold and 1 copper; (3) of 22 gold and 2 copper, and so on. The assayer selects one of these and rubs it on the touchstone, when it leaves a mark that is reddish in proportion to the quantity of alloy; the article to be tested is then similarly "touched" and the marks compared. Hence the word is often used of any criterion or standard.

Fable has it that Battus saw Mercury steal Apollo's oxen, and Mercury gave him a cow to secure his silence, but, being distrustful of the man, changed himself into a peasant, and offered him a cow and an ox if he would tell him where he got the cow. Battus, caught in the trap, told the secret, and Mercury changed him into a touchstone (Ovid: Metamorphoses, ii).

Men have a touchstone whereby to try gold; but gold is the touchstone whereby to try men.—FULLER: Holy and Profane State (The Good Judge).

Touchstone. A clown whose mouth is filled with quips and cranks and witty repartees, in Shakespeare's As You Like It. The original actor of the part was Tarlton.

Tour. The Grand Tour. In the 17th, 18th, and early 19th centuries it was the custom for families of rank and substance to finish their sons' education by sending them, under the guardianship of a tutor, on a tour through France, Switzerland, Italy, and home through western Germany. This was known as the Grand Tour and sometimes a couple of years were devoted to it. The young men were supposed to study the history, language, etc., of each country they visited.

Tour de force (Fr.). A feat of strength or skill.

Tournament (O.Fr. tornelement, from Lat. torrare, to turn). A tilt of knights; the chief art of the game being so to manœuvre or turn your horse as to avoid the adversary's blow.

The Tournament of Tottenham. A comic romance, given in Percy's Reliques. A number of clowns are introduced, practising warlike games, and making vows like knights of high degree. They ride tilt on cart-horses, fight with ploughshares and flails, and wear for armour wooden bowls and saucepan-lids.

The Eglinton Tournament. At Eglinton Castle, Ayrshire, an attempt was made to revive the mediæval tournament, on August 28th, 1839. The lists were richly decorated, the ladies wore 14th and 15th century costumes, and young society men practised how to ride a charger, in full armour and wielding a tilting-lance. The Marquess of Londonderry was King of the Tournament; Lady Seymour, later Duchess of Somerset, was Queen of Love and Beauty. Fifteen knights took part; but the affair was entirely ruined by the heavy rain that fell without ceasing throughout the day.

Tours (toor). Geoffrey of Monmouth says; "In the party of Brutus was one Turones, his nephew, inferior to none in courage and strength, from whom Tours derived its name, being the place of his sepulture." This fable is wholly worthless historically. Tours is the city of the Turones, a people of Gallia Lugdunensis.

Tout ensemble (too ton sombl) (Fr.). The whole massed together; the general effect.

Tow. To take in tow. Take under guidance. A man who takes a lad in tow acts as his guide and director. To tow a ship or barge is to guide and draw it along by tow-lines.

Too proud for bards to take in tow my name.

PETER PINDAR: Future Laureate, Pt. ii.

Tower. Tower Liberty. The Tower of London, with the fortifications and Tower Hill. This formed part of the ancient demesne of the Crown, with jurisdiction and privileges distinct from and independent of the City. Cp. Liberty of the Fleet, under LIBERTY.

Tower of London. The architect was Gundulphus, Bishop of Rochester, who also built or restored Rochester keep, in the time of William I. Tradition has it that the White Tower, the central and oldest portion, is on the site of a fort erected by Julius Cæsar to awe the ancient inhabitants; hence Gray's well-known allusion in The Bard:—

Ye Towers of Julius, London's lasting shame,
With many a foul and midnight murder fed.

In the precincts of the Tower lie buried Anne Boleyn and her brother; Catherine Howard and Lady Rochford her associate; the venerable Lady Salisbury, and Cromwell the minister of Henry VIII; the two Seymours, the admiral and the protector of Edward VI; the Duke of Norfolk and Earl of Sussex (Elizabeth I's reign); the Duke of Monmouth, son of Charles II; the Earls of Balmerino and Kilmarnock, and Lord Lovat; Bishop Fisher and his illustrious friend Sir Thomas More. The bones of the "little Princes," Edward V and his brother the Duke of York, murdered there by order of Richard III in 1483, were discovered in 1674 and removed to Westminster Abbey.

Towers of Silence. See SILENCE.

Town. A.S. tun, a plot of ground fenced round or enclosed by a hedge (connected with Ger. zaun, a hedge); a single dwelling; a number of dwelling-houses forming a village or burgh.

A man about town. See MAN.

A woman of the town. A prostitute.

The little stranger has come to town. The expected child is born.

Town and Gown. The two sections of a university town; composed of those who are not attached to the university and those who are; hence, a town and gown row, a collision, often leading to a fight, between the students and non-gownsmen. Cp. PHILISTINES.

Town bull. A bull kept by the parish, in country places, for breeding purposes.

And so, brother Toby, this poor Bull of mine . . . might have been driven into Doctors' Commons and lost his character—which to a Town Bull, brother Toby, is the very same thing as his life.—STERNE: Tristram Shandy, IX, xxiii.

Town crier. A municipal official who goes about the streets, usually in a robe, ringing a bell and crying, Oyez! Oyez! (q.v.) to attract attention to his proclamations of notices, coming events, lost property, etc.

Town house. One's residence in town as apart from that in the country.

Town is empty. The season (q.v.) is over; society has left town for the country. The few millions who live there and work do not count.

Town planning. The regulating of the ground plan or extension of a town with a view to securing the greatest advantages from the point of view of health, public amenities, convenience in transport, etc. The Town Planning Act was passed in 1909—and various amending and other Acts came into force in subsequent years. In 1943 a Ministry of Town and Country Planning was constituted, with wide powers to originate and control development.

Going to town. Full of life and high spirits. An American expression, probably originating among backwoodsmen.

Toyshop of Europe, The. So Burke called Birmingham. Here the word "toy" does not refer to playthings for children, but to trinkets, knick-knacks, and similar articles.

Tracts for the Times. A series of papers on theological and liturgical subjects, published at Oxford (hence sometimes called The Oxford Tracts) between 1833 and 1841. They were started by the Rev. J. H. Newman (afterwards Cardinal Newman) with the object of arresting "the advance of Liberalism in religious thought," and reviving "the true conception of the relation of the Church of England to the Catholic Church at large." The authors, who used the first seven letters as signatures to their contributions, were:—

A.—John Keble, M.A., author of the Christian Year fellow of Oriel, and Professor of Poetry at Oxford.

B.—Isaac Williams, Fellow of Trinity; author of The Cathedral, and other Poems.

C.—E. B. Pusey, D.D., Regius Professor of Hebrew, and Canon of Christ Church.

D.—John Henry Newman, D.D., Fellow of Oriel.

E.—Thomas Keble.

F.—Sir John Provost, Bart.

G.—R. F. Wilson, of Oriel.

The series came to an end (at the request of the Bishop of Oxford) with Newman's Tract No. xc, "On Certain Passages in the XXXIX Articles"; and later many of the Tractarians entered the Roman Catholic Church.

Tracy. All the Tracys have the wind in their faces. Those who do wrong will always meet with punishment. William de Traci was the most active of the four knights who slew Thomas à Becket, and for this misdeed all who bore the name were saddled by the Church with this ban:—

Wherever by sea or land they go

For ever the wind in their face shall blow.

Fuller, with his usual navet , says, "So much the better in hot weather, as it will save the need of a fan."

Trade. Free Trade. See FREE.

The balance of trade. See BALANCE.

The Board of Trade. A Government department—officially a Committee of the Privy Council—dealing with commercial and industrial affairs, such as bankruptcy, company matters, railways, weights and measures, harbours, patents, trade and merchandise marks, etc. Originally established by Oliver Cromwell, it has grown in scope of its duties and power.

The trade. Usually the liquor trade, more particularly those engaged in the brewing and distilling industries; but applied also to the general body of persons engaged in the particular trade that is being spoken of.

To blow trade. See TRADE WINDS, below.

To trade something off. To barter or exchange it; to sell it as a "job lot."

To trade upon. To make use of so as to obtain some advantage. The phrase is usually employed to describe the unscrupulous use of private knowledge or even of a personal affliction to arouse sympathy.

Trade board. An official council set up to regulate the conditions of labour in certain trades that otherwise might be "sweated."

Trade dollar. A United States silver dollar formerly coined specially for Oriental trade. It weighed 420 gr., instead of the 412.5 gr. of the ordinary dollar, and has not been coined since 1887.

Trade follows the flag. Wherever the flag flies trade with the mother country springs up and prospers.

Trade-last (U.S.A.). A compliment offered in exchange for another. "I have a trade-last for you," means, "I have heard something flattering about you which I will tell you after you have told me a flattering remark you have heard about me." The phrase is common among juveniles and adolescents.

Trade mark. The name or distinctive device for an article made for sale, indicating that it was produced by the holder of this device. In most countries trade marks are protected by law, it being a misdemeanour to forge or counterfeit such a mark. In Britain and U.S.A. a trade mark must be registered with the Government in order to secure full protection.

Trade Union. An association of employees in a trade or industry, formed for the promotion and protection of their common interests in regard to conditions of labour, wages, etc., and often for providing its members with payments during temporary unemployment, sickness, or strikes, and pensions in old age.

The earliest forerunner of the modern trade union was probably the combination of London cordwainers against their overseers in 1387; but until the passing of the first Trade Union Act (1871), all trade unions were, in so far as their objects could be held to be "in restraint of trade," illegal associations.

As early as the time of Henry V it was decided that a contract imposing a general restraint upon trade was void, and agreements between workmen not to take work except upon certain terms are at common law bad, and consequently any association which exists to promote such agreements or to enforce such terms is illegal. . . . By the Trade Union Act, 1871, it was declared that a Trade Union merely because its objects were in restraint of trade should not be held to be unlawful, and its agreements were made binding, so that they would be recognised in law.—The Labour Year Book, 1916 (p. 174).

The modern trade union, and the name, came into being about 1830.

Trade winds. Winds that blow trade, i.e. regularly in one track or direction (Low Ger. trade, track). In the northern hemisphere they blow from the north-east, and in the southern hemisphere from the south-east, about thirty degrees each side of the equator. In some places they blow six months in one direction, and six in the opposite. The term is sometimes applied to the Indian monsoons.

Tragedy. Literally, a goat-song (Gr. tragos, goat, ode, song), though why so called is not clear. Horace (Ars Poetica, 220) says, because the winner at choral competitions received a goat as a prize, but the explanation has no authority.

It was Aristotle (in his Poetics) who said that tragedy should move one "by pity and terror":—

The plot ought to be so constructed that, even without the aid of the eye, he who hears the tale told will thrill with horror and melt to pity at what takes place.—ARISTOTLE: Poetics, xix (Butcher).

The Father of Tragedy. A title given to Æschylus (d. 456 B.C.), author of the Oresteian trilogy and many other tragedies, and to Thespis. See THESPIANS.

Traitor's Gate, The. The gloomy water-passage leading from the Tower of London to the Thames, by which persons accused of treason entered their prison. An old proverb says:—

A loyal heart may be landed at the Traitors' Gate.

Trajan (tră'jăn). Trajan's Arch. There are two arches known by this name, commemorating the triumphs of Trajan. One, the finest ancient arch in existence, was erected in A.D. 114 over the Appian Way at Benevento, and the other in 112 at Ancona. Both are of white marble.

Trajan's Column. The great monument in Rome (dedicated A.D. 114) commemorating Trajan's victories. It is a Roman Doric column of marble, 127½ ft. high, covered with reliefs representing over 2,000 persons, besides many animals. It formed the model for the column in the Place Vendôme, Paris, and is now surmounted by a statue of St. Peter.

Trajan's Wall. A line of fortifications stretching across the Dobrudja from Czernavoda to the Black Sea.

Tram. The old "popular" derivation of this word from the name of Benjamin Outram, who ran vehicles on stone rails at Little Eaton, Derbyshire, in 1800, is discredited. The word is connected with Low Ger. traam, a baulk or beam, and was applied as early as the 16th century to trucks used in coal mines, and run on long wooden beams as rails.

Trams are a kind of sledge on which coals are brought from the place where they are hewn to the shaft. A tram has four wheels, but a sledge is without wheels.—BRAND: History of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, vol. ii, p. 681 (1789).

Tramontane (tră' mon' tăn). The north wind; so called by Italians because to them it comes from over the mountains (Lat. trans, across, montem, mountain). The Italians also apply the term to peoples, etc., north of the Alps. French lawyers, on the other hand, apply the word to Italian canonists, whom they consider too Romanistic.

Transept. An architectural term (from the Lat. trans, across; septum, enclosure) for the transverse portion of any building lying across the main body of that building. The transept became common in ecclesiastical architecture in the Middle Ages and almost universal in the Gothic period. The cross is often surmounted by a tower, spire or dome. In a basilica church the transept is the transverse portion in front of the choir.

Translator-General. So Fuller, in his Worthies (1662), calls Philemon Holland (1552-1637), who translated works by Pliny, Livy, Plutarch, and a large number of other Greek and Latin classics.

Transportation of Convicts. A system of punishment by which criminals are removed to some penal settlement outside their own country for a period of years or for life. Until the War of Independence convicts were shipped from Britain to certain districts of her American colonies; in January, 1788, the first batch of convicts were landed at Botany Bay, New South Wales. The system worked well; and successive fleets took convicted felons to Australia until 1840 when the reception area was confined to Tasmania. Transportation was abolished in British law in 1853; though it still exists in France, where the penal settlements at Cayenne are in full use.

Trap. Slang for a policeman; also for the mouth. Shut your trap, be quiet.

Traps. Luggage, one's personal belongings, and so on (as in Leave your traps at the station), are called traps as short for trappings, bits of additional finery and decoration, properly ornamental harness or caparison for a horse. The word is also used for the row of pens from which the dogs are simultaneously released in greyhound racing.

Trappists. A religious order, so called from La Trappe, an abbey founded at Soligny la Trappe (Orne, France) in 1140, by Rotron, Count de Perche. It is a branch of the Cistercian order, and is noted for the extreme austerity of its rules which include perpetual silence except in cases of strict necessity.

Traskites. A sect of Puritan Sabbatarians founded by John Trask, a Somerset man, about 1620. They believed that the law as laid down for the ancient Hebrews was to be taken literally and applied to themselves and all men. Trask was brought before the Star Chamber and pilloried. He is said to have recanted later and to have become an Antinomian, and his followers became absorbed by the Seventh-day Baptists (q.v.).

Travellers' Tales. Tall yarns; exaggerated stories of wonderful adventures and sights. Telling such tales used to be called tippling one the traveller.

Travelogue (trăv' ë log'). A lecture or running commentary delivered to accompany a moving picture of travel.

Travertine (trăv' ër tin). A limestone formed by the deposit of springs and rivers, of a brownish-grey appearance and peculiarly suitable for building purposes. The stone has been extensively used in the building of Rome in all periods; it takes its name, indeed, from the Late Latin Tiburtino, or Tibur, now known as Tivoli, near Rome.

Tre, Pol, Pen. Very common prefixes for personal and place names in Cornwall—

By their Tre, their Pol, and Pen,
Ye shall know the Cornish men.

The extreme east of Cornwall is noted for Tre (old Cornish, or Welsh, for house), the extreme west for Pol (=pool), the centre for Pen (=height, peak).

On December 19th, 1891, the following residents are mentioned by the Launceston Weekly News as attending the funeral of a gentleman who lived at Tre-hummer House, Tresmere:—Residents from Trevell, Tresmarrow, Treglith, Trebarrow, Treludick, etc., with Treleven the Mayor of Launceston.

Treacle properly means an antidote against the bite of wild beasts (Gr. theriake, from ther a wild beast). The ancients gave the name to several sorts of antidotes, but ultimately it was applied chiefly to Venice treacle (theriaca androchi), a compound of some sixty-four drugs in honey.

Sir Thomas More speaks of "a most strong treacle [i.e. antidote] against these venomous heresies"; and in the Treacle Bible, see BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED, balm (Jer. viii, 22) is translated treacle—"Is there no tryacle in Gilead? Is there no phisitian there?"

Treadmill. A wheel turned by the weight of a person or persons treading on steps fixed to the periphery. It was formerly used in prisons as a means of discipline or as a part of hard labour, the power being sometimes employed for turning machinery or grinding corn.

Treason. Betrayal of a trust or of a person. High Treason is an act of treachery against the Sovereign or the State, a violation of one's allegiance; petty treason is the same against a subject, as the murder of a master by his servant.

Treasure. These are my treasures; meaning the sick and poor. So said St. Lawrence (q.v.) when the Roman prætor commanded him to deliver up his treasures.

One day a lady from Campania called upon Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, and after showing her jewels, requested in return to see those belonging to the famous mother-in-law of Africanus. Cornelia sent for her two sons, and said to the visitor, "These are my jewels, in which alone I delight."

Treasure Trove. The term applied to coins and other valuables of gold or silver found in the ground or some other hiding-place, whose owner is unknown. In the legal sense these objects must have been originally placed there with the purpose of concealment; gold ornaments, etc., found in tombs or tumuli where they were deliberately placed with no intention of concealment are not treasure trove. Treasure trove belongs to the Crown, but in practice the finder is usually given the market value of the objects found.

Treasury. Treasury Bills are a form of British government security issued in multiples of £1,000 and repayable in 3, 6, 9 or 12 months.

Treasury Bonds are for money borrowed for a number of years.

Treasury Notes were issued by the Treasury from 1914 to 1928 for £1 and 10s. Their place was then taken by notes issued by the Bank of England.

Treasury of the Church, or Treasury of Merits. The theological term for the superabundant store of merits and satisfactions of Christ which were beyond the needs of the salvation of the human race. To these are added the excess of merits and satisfactions of the B.V.M. and the saints. It is by drawing on this treasury that the Pope grants indulgences.

Treat. To stand treat. To pay the expenses of some entertainment; especially to pay for drinks consumed by others.

Tree. For particulars of some famous and patriarchal trees see under OAK and YEW.

In the Natural History Museum, South Kensington, is the section of a Sequoia gigantea with 1,335 rings, representing that number of years. There are, however, yet older trees still in full life in the forests of America.

The eight olive-trees on the Mount of Olives are said to have been flourishing when the Turks took Jerusalem in 1187; and there is a lime-tree in the Grisons which is supposed to be over 660 years old.

The spruce will reach the age of 1,200 years.

The cross on which Our Lord was crucified is frequently spoken of in hymns and poetry as the tree. See Acts v, 30:—"... Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged on a tree"; 1 Per. ii, 24:—"Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree."

The gallows is also called the tree, Tyburn tree, the fatal tree, etc.

A tree must be bent while it is young. You can't teach an old dog tricks. The Scots say, "Thraw the wand while it is green."

At the top of the tree. At the highest position attainable in one's profession, calling, etc.

The tree is known by its fruit. One is judged by what one does, not by what one says. The saying is from Matt. xii, 33.

The tree of Buddha, or of Wisdom. The bo-tree (q.v.).

The tree of Diana. See PHILOSOPHER'S TREE, THE.

The Tree of Liberty. A post or tree set up by the people, hung with flags and devices, and crowned with a cap of liberty. In the United States poplars and other trees were planted during the War of Independence, "as symbols of growing freedom." The Jacobins in Paris planted their first trees of liberty in 1790, and used to decorate them with tri-coloured ribbons, circles to indicate unity, triangles to signify equality, and Caps of Liberty. Trees of liberty were also planted by the Italians in the revolutions of 1848.

The Tree of the Universe. Yggdrasil (q.v.).

The treeness of the tree. The essential qualities that compose a tree; in the absence of which a tree would cease to be a tree. Hence, the absolute essentials of anything. The phrase is evidently modelled on Sterne's "Corregiosity of Corregio" (Tristram Shandy III, xii).

Up a tree. In a difficulty, in a mess, non-plussed. An American phrase, from 'coon hunting. As soon as the 'coon is driven up a tree he is helpless.

It is said that Spurgeon used to practise his students in extempore preaching, and that one of his young men, on reaching the desk and opening the note containing his text, read the single word "Zacchæus." He thought a minute or two, and then delivered himself thus:—

Zacchæus was a little man, so am I; Zacchæus was up a tree, so am I; Zacchæus made haste and came down, and so do I.

You cannot judge of a tree by its bark. Don't go by appearances; an old proverb.

Tregeagle (treg ægl). A fabulous giant of Dosmary Pool, Bodmin Downs (Cornwall), whose allotted task is to bale out the water with a limpet-shell. When the wintry blast howls over the downs, the people say it is the giant roaring.

Trench Fever. A remittent or relapsing fever affecting men living in trenches, dug-outs, etc., and transmitted by the excrement of lice. It first appeared in World War I, in the static warfare on the western front.

Trencher. A good trencher-man. A good eater. The trencher is the platter on which food is cut (Fr. trancher, to cut), by a figure of speech applied to food itself.

He that waits for another's trencher eats many a late dinner. He who is dependent on others must wait, and wait, and wait, happy if after waiting he gets anything at all.

Trencher cap. The mortar-board (q.v.) worn at college; so called from the trenched or split boards which form the top.

Trencher friends. Persons who cultivate the friendship of others for the sake of sitting at their board, and the good things they can get.

Trencher knight. A table knight, a suitor from cupboard love.

Trenchmore. A popular dance in the 16th and 17th centuries.

Like one dancing the trenchmore he stamped up and downe the yard, holding his hips in his hands.—T. DELONEY: The Gentle Craft, 1597.

Tressure. A border within an heraldic shield and surrounding the bearings. The origin of the "double tressure flory-counterflory gules" in the royal arms of Scotland is traced by old heralds to the 9th century. They assert that Charlemagne granted it to King Achaius of Scotland in token of alliance, and as an assurance that "the lilies of France should be a defence to the lion of Scotland."

Treves (trêvz, trāv). The Holy Coat of Treves. A relic preserved in the cathedral of Treves. It is one of several said to be the seamless coat of our Saviour, which the soldiers would not rend, and therefore cast lots for (John xix, 23, 25), which, according to tradition, was found and preserved by the Empress Helena in the 4th century. Its written history goes back only to the 12th century, whereas the Holy Coat of Argenteuil, with similar claims, is traced to Charlemagne. There is little to choose between the two traditions.

Tria Juncta in Uno (Lat., three combined in one). The motto of the Order of the Bath. It refers to the three classes of which the order consists, viz. Knights Grand Cross, Knights Commanders, and Companions.

Triads. Three subjects more or less connected treated as a group; as the Creation, Redemption, and Resurrection; Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; Alexander the Great, Julius Cæsar, and Napoleon; Law, Physic, and Divinity.

The Welsh Triads are collections of historic facts, mythological traditions, moral maxims, or rules of poetry disposed in groups of three for mnemonic purposes.

Trials at Bar. See BAR.

Tribune (trib' ün). A chief magistrate, and very powerful official among the ancient Romans. During the revolt of the plebs in 494 B.C. they appointed two tribunes as protectors against the patricians' oppression; later the number was increased to ten and their office put on a proper footing. They were personally inviolable, and could separately veto measures and proceedings.

As a military title tribune denoted the commander of a cohort.

A tribune of the people. A democratic leader.

The Last of the Tribunes. Cola di Rienzi (1313-54).

Trice. In a trice. In an instant; in a twinkling.
To tell you what conceyte
I had then in a trice,
The matter were too nyse
SKELTON: Phyllipp Sparowe (c. 1505).

Trice is probably the same word as trice, to haul, to tie up; the idea being "at a single tug."

The older form was At a trice.

At door where this trull was,

I was at a trice.

JOHN T. HEYWOOD: Play of Love, 1534.

Trick. Besides its usual significance of a sly or mean deception, a clever device, a dodge, etc., this word denominates the cards played and won in a round; also a spell of duty as at a ship's wheel.

Tricolour. A flag of three broad strips of different colours, especially the national standard of France, blue, white, and red. The first flag of the Republicans was green. The tricolour was adopted July 11, 1789, when the people were disgusted with the king for dismissing Necker; the popular tale is that the insurgents had adopted for their flag the two colours, red and blue (the colours of the city of Paris) but that Lafayette persuaded them to add the Bourbon white, to show that they bore no hostility to the king.

Other tricolours are the flags of:—

Belgium, black, yellow, red; divided vertically.

Bulgaria, white, green, red; horizontally.

Eire, green, white, yellow; vertically.

Holland, red, white, blue; horizontally.

Italy, green, white, red; vertically.

Persia, green, white, red; horizontally.

Romania, blue, yellow, red; vertically.

Serbia, red, blue, white; horizontally.

Bolivia, red, yellow, green; horizontally.

Mexico, green, white, red; vertically.

Venezuela, yellow, blue, red; horizontally.

Yugoslavia, blue, white, red; horizontally.

Tricoteuses (trē kot ěr'z) Parisian women who, during the French Revolution, used to attend the meetings of the Convention and, while they went on with their tricotant (knitting), encouraged the leaders in their bloodthirsty excesses. They gained for themselves the additional title, Furies of the Guillotine.

Trident. In Greek mythology the three-pronged spear which Poseidon (Roman Neptune) god of the sea, bore as the symbol of his sovereignty. It has come to be regarded as the emblem of sea power and as such is borne by Britannia. In gladiatorial combats in Rome the trident was used by the retiarii, whose skill lay in entangling their opponents in nets, and then despatching them with tridents.

Trigon (tri' gon). The junction of three signs. The zodiac is partitioned into four trigons, named respectively after the four elements; the watery trigon includes Cancer, Scorpio, and Pisces; the fiery, Aries, Leo, and Sagittarius; the earthy, Taurus, Virgo, and Capricornus; and the airy, Gemini, Libra, and Aquarius.

Trilogy (tril' ð ji). A group of three tragedies. Everyone in Greece who took part in the poetic contest had to produce a trilogy and a satyric drama. There is only one complete specimen extant, viz. that embracing the Agamemnon, the Choephore, and the Eumenides, by Æschylus.

Trim, Corporal. The old soldier-orderly of "my Uncle Toby" in Sterne's Tristram Shandy, a faithful, simple-minded friend who enters into his whims, especially the absorbing hobby of reproducing in miniature the campaign in Flanders when they both served under the Duke of Marlborough.

Trimachio (tri māl' ki ð). The vulgar and ostentatious multi-millionaire of Petronius Arbiter's Satyricon (1st cent. A.D.); the subject of allusion on account of the colossal and extravagant banquet that he gave.

Trimmer. One who runs with the hare and hunts with the hounds. George Savile, Marquis of Halifax, adopted the term in the reign of Charles II to signify that he was neither an extreme Whig nor an extreme Tory.

Trine. In astrology, a planet distant from another one-third of the circle is said to be in trine; one-fourth, it is in square; one-sixth or two signs, it is in sextile; but when one-half distant, it is said to be "opposite."

In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite Of noxious efficacy.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, x, 659.

Planets distant from each other six signs or half a circle have opposite influences, and are therefore opposed to each other.

Trinity. The three Persons in one God—God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost.

And in this Trinity none is afore or after other; none is greater, or less than another; but the whole three Persons are co-eternal together and co-equal.—The Athanasian Creed.

Cp. PERSONS (Confounding the Persons).

Tertullian (about 160-240) introduced the word into Christian theology. Almost every mythology has a threefold deity. See THREE.

Trinity House. The association, incorporated by Royal Charter and Acts of Parliament, and, for many purposes, forming a branch of the Board of Trade, constituting the chief pilotage authority of the United Kingdom and being responsible for lighthouses and seamarks in home waters; properly called The Corporation of Trinity House, from its headquarters on Tower Hill, London.

It was granted its first charter by Henry VIII in 1514, and now consists of a Master, ten Acting Elder Brethren, and a number of Honorary Elder Brethren, among whom are usually the King and other members of the Royal Family, Cabinet Ministers, etc. The Acting Elder Brethren (one a retired naval officer, and nine retired mercantile marine commanders) sit with the judges of the Admiralty Division as nautical assessors in marine causes.

Trinity Sunday. The Sunday next after Whit Sunday. It has been observed in honour of the Trinity from very early times, but was first enjoined as a festival by the Synod of Arles in 1260. The Epistle and Gospel used in the Church of England on this day are the same as those in the Lectionary of St. Jerome, and the Collect comes from the Sacramentary of St. Gregory.

Trinity Term. The period of law sittings in England from the first Tuesday after Trinity Sunday to the end of July.

Trinobantes (trin ð bān' tēz). Inhabitants of Middlesex and Essex, referred to in Cæsar's Gallic Wars. This word, converted into Trinovantes, gave rise to the myth that the people referred to came from Troy. See TROYNOVANT.

Tripe. Journalists' slang for very second-rate "copy" whose only use is as "fill-ups." Cp. BILGE-WATER.

Tripehound. In Australian slang a dog on a sheep station. The term has spread to England as a term of opprobrium.

Tripitaka (trip it' a ka) (Pali tipitaka, the three baskets). The three classes into which the sacred writings of the Buddhists are divided—viz. the Sutrapitaka (Basket of Aphorisms or Discourses) or Sutras, the Vinayapitaka (Basket of Disciplinary Directions), and Abhidhammapitaka (Basket of Metaphysics).

Triple Alliance. A treaty entered into by England, Sweden, and Holland against Louis XIV in 1668. It ended in the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle.

A treaty between England, France, and Holland against Spain in 1717. In the following year it was joined by Austria, and became a Quadruple Alliance.

The alliance between Germany, Austria and Italy, signed in 1882. It was renewed several times but finally broken in 1914 when Italy refused to join in the war against Britain and France.

The Triple Entente is the name given to various agreements or understandings made in the 20th century between Britain, France and Tsarist Russia.

Tripos (trí' pos) (Gr. treis, three, pous, foot). A Cambridge term, meaning the three honour classes in which the best men are grouped at the final examination, whether of Mathematics, Law, Theology, or Natural Science, etc. The word is often emphatically applied to the voluntary classical examination. So called because the champion in the old university disputations held during the admission of graduates to their degrees used to sit on a three-legged stool.

Triptolemus (trip tol' ē mūs). A Greek hero and demi-god, worshipped chiefly at Eleusis as the giver to man of grain and the first instructor in agriculture.

Triptych (trip' tik). In ecclesiastical painting a set of three upright panels joined together by hinges, each panel being painted with a separate subject. The wings were frequently painted on both sides so that when folded a fresh picture was presented. The Van Eycks and most of the great religious painters of the early Renaissance used the triptych, but it fell into disuse in the 16th century.

Trisagion (tris ág' i on) (Gr., thrice holy). A hymn in the liturgies of the Greek and Eastern Churches in which (after Is. vi, 3) a threefold invocation to the Deity is the burden—"Holy God, Holy and Mighty, Holy and Immortal, have mercy upon us."

The name is sometimes applied to Bishop Heber's hymn for Trinity Sunday—

Holy, Holy, Holy! Lord God Almighty!

Early in the morning our song shall rise to Thee—which is more properly called the Ter-Sanctus.

Triskellion (tri skel' i on) (Gr., three-legged). The emblem of the Isle of Man, and of Sicily; three human legs, bent at the knee, and joined at the thigh.

Trismegistus (tris me jis' tus) (Gr., thrice great). A name given to Hermes (q.v.), the Egyptian philosopher, or Thoth, councillor of Osiris, to whom is attributed a host of inventions—amongst others the art of writing in hieroglyphics, the first code of Egyptian laws, harmony, astrology, the lute and lyre, magic, and all mysterious sciences.

Tristram, Sir (Tristrem, Tristan, or Tristam). A hero of mediæval romance whose exploits, though originally unconnected with it, became attached to the Arthurian cycle, he himself being named as one of the Knights of the Round Table. There are many versions of his story, which is, roughly, that he was cured of a wound by Iseult, or Ysolde, daughter of the king of Ireland, and on his return to Cornwall told his uncle, King Mark, of the beautiful princess. Mark sent him to solicit her hand in marriage, and was accepted. Tristram escorted her to England, but on the way they both unknowingly partook of a magic potion and became irretrievably enamoured of each other. Iseult married the king, and on Mark's discovering their liaison Tristram fled to Brittany and married Iseult, daughter of the Duke of Brittany. Wounded by a poisoned weapon, he sent for Iseult of Ireland to come and heal him. The vessel in which she was to come had orders to hoist a white sail if she was on board, otherwise a black sail. Tristram's wife, seeing the vessel approach, told her husband, from jealousy, that it bore a black sail. In despair, Tristram died; Iseult of Ireland, arriving too late, killed herself.

The name was originally Drystan, from the Pictish name Drostan, and the initial was changed to T apparently to connect it with Lat. tristis, sad.

Triton. Son of Poseidon and Amphitrite, represented as a fish with a human head. It is this sea god that makes the roaring of the ocean by blowing through his shell.

A Triton among the minnows. A great man amid a host of inferiors.

Triumph. A word formed from Gr. thriambos, the Dionysiac hymn, Triumpe being an exclamation used in the solemn processions of the Arval Brothers.

Some . . . have assigned the origin of . . . triumphal processions to the mythic pomps of Dionysus, after his conquests in the East, the very word triumph being . . . the Dionysiac hymn.—PATER: Marius the Epicurean, ch. xii.

The old Roman triumphus was the solemn and magnificent entrance of a general into Rome after having obtained a great or decisive victory. Cp. OVATION.

Triumvir (trí ūm' vēr). In ancient Rome a member of a commission of three charged with some special duty, such as repairing tombs, coining money, or even founding colonies. The most famous triumvirate was that of Octavian, Antony, and Lepidus, 43 B.C., which was known as the Second Triumvirate to distinguish it from the private combination of Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus in 60 B.C., popularly known as the First Triumvirate.

Trivet. Right as a trivet. See RIGHT.

Trivia. Gray's name for his invented goddess of streets and ways. His burlesque in three books so entitled (1716) is a mine of information on the outdoor life of Queen Anne's time.

Thou, Trivia, aid my song.

Through spacious streets conduct thy bard along . . .
To pave thy realm, and smooth the broken ways,
Earth from her womb a flinty tribute pays.

GRAY: Trivia, Bk. 1.

Trivia is also the plural of trivium.

Trivium. The three roads (Lat. tres, three, via, a road) to learning in the Middle Ages, i.e. Grammar, Rhetoric, and Logic; forming the lower division of the seven liberal arts (see QUADRIVIUM).

Trochilus. A small Egyptian bird said by the ancients to enter with impunity the mouth of the crocodile and to pick its teeth, especially of a leech which greatly tormented the creature. It is now known as the Crocodile-bird, Pluvianus aegyptus, a species of plover which not only picks the crocodile's teeth but by its cry gives warning of an approaching foe.

Troglodytes. A people of Ethiopia, south-east of Egypt, so called from Gr. troglos, cave, duein, to go into, because they lived in cave dwellings, remains of which are still to be seen along the banks of the Nile. Hence applied to other cave-dwellers, and, figuratively to those who live in seclusion. There were troglodytes of Syria and Arabia also, according to Strabo, and Pliny (v, 8) asserts that they fed on serpents.

Troilus. The prince of chivalry, one of the sons of Priam, killed by Achilles in the siege of Troy (Homer's Iliad).

The loves of Troilus and Cressida, celebrated by Shakespeare and Chaucer, form no part of the old classic tale. The story appears for the first time in the Roman de Troie by the 12th-century trouvère, Benoît de Ste. More. Guido delle Colonne included it in his Historia Trojana (about 1290), it thence passed to Boccaccio, whose Il Filostrato (1344)—where Pandarus first appears—was the basis of Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde.

As true as Troilus. Troilus is meant by Shakespeare to be the type of constancy, and Cressida the type of female inconstancy.

After all comparisons of truth . . .

"As true as Troilus" shall crown up the verse,
And sanctify the numbers.

Troilus and Cressida, iii, 2.

Trojan. He is a regular Trojan. A fine fellow, with courage and spirit, who works very hard, usually at an uncongenial task, indeed, doing more than could be expected of him. The Trojans in Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Æneid are described as truthful, brave, patriotic, and confiding.

There they say right, and like true Trojans.

BUTLER: Hudibras, i, 1.

Trojan War. The legendary war sung by Homer in the Iliad (q.v.) as having been waged for ten years by the confederated Greeks against the men of Troy and their allies, in consequence of Paris, son of Priam, the Trojan king, having carried off Helen, wife of Menelaus, king of Lacedæmon (or of Sparta). The last year of the siege is the subject of the Iliad; the burning of Troy and the flight of Æneas is told by Virgil in his Æneid.

There is no doubt whatever that the story of the siege of Troy has some historical basis, but when it took place is purely a matter of conjecture. Many dates, ranging from the 11th to the 14th centuries B.C. have been assigned to it.

Trolls. Dwarfs of Northern mythology, living in hills, underground in caverns or beneath; they are represented as stumpy, misshapen, and humpbacked, inclined to thieving, and fond of carrying off human children and substituting their own. These hill people, as they are called, are especially averse to noise, from a recollection of the time when Thor used to be for ever flinging his hammer after them.

Troll-madam, or Troll-my-dames. A popular indoor game in the 16th and 17th centuries (also known as trunks, pigeon-holes, or nine-holes), borrowed from the French and called by them trou (hole) madame. It resembled bagatelle, and was played on a board having at one end a number of arches, like pigeon-holes, into which balls were rolled. Shakespeare has a reference to it in A Winter's Tale (iv, 2).

Trooping. The trooping season. The season when the annual reliefs of the British forces in India were made, usually beginning in late February or March.

Trooping the colour. A military ceremonial parade in which the regimental flag, the colour, is carried between files of troops and received by the sovereign or a representative.

The ceremony dates from the 18th century (probably from Marlborough's time), and was originally a guard-mounting ceremony, the battalion finding the guards for the day "trooping" the colour to be carried on king's guard.

Many years ago it became the custom to find the public guards on the King's birthday from the flank companies (picked companies) of the whole Brigade, instead of from one battalion, and it is from this custom that the ceremony of Trooping the Colour on his Majesty's birthday by detachments of the flank companies of all the battalions in London originates. The Field-Officer-in-Brigade-Waiting always commands the troops on this parade, irrespective of the regiment to which he belongs.—The Times, 3 June, 1922.

Trophonius (trō fō' nī us). An architect, celebrated in Greek legend as the builder of the temple of Apollo at Delphi. After his death he was deified, and had an oracle in a cave near Lebadeia, Boeotia, which was so awe-inspiring that those who entered and consulted the oracle never smiled again. Hence a melancholy or habitually terrified man was said to have visited the cave of Trophonius.

Trophy. Originally the arms of a vanquished foe, collected and set up by the victors on the field of battle. The captured standards were hung from the branches of an oak tree, a portion of the booty being laid at the foot of the tree and dedicated to the tutelary deity. The Romans frequently bore their trophies to Rome; under the Empire the triumphs of the victorious generals were also celebrated with arches and columns.

Troubadours. Minstrels of the south of France in the 11th, 12th, and 13th centuries; so called from the Provençal verb trobar, to find or invent (cp. "poet," which means "a maker.") They wrote in the langue d'oc, or Provençal, principally on love and chivalry. Cp. Trouvères.

Trouvères (troo' vār). The troubadours of the north of France, in the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries. So called from Fr. trouver, to find or invent (cp. TROUBADOURS). They wrote in the langue d'oil or langue d'oui, chiefly on amatory subjects.

Trows, or Drows. Dwarfs of Orkney and Shetland mythology, similar to the Scandinavian Trolls. There are land-trows and sea-trows. "Trow tak' thee" is a phrase still used by the island women when angry with their children.

Troy. The Siege of Troy. See ILIAD; HELEN; TROJAN WAR; etc.

Troy Town. A Cornish expression for a labyrinth of streets, a regular maze. In several novels "Q" (Sir A. Quiller Couch) used the name as a disguise for Fowey. Troy was formerly used figuratively of any scene of disorder or confusion; a room with its disorder or confusion; a room with its furniture all higgledy-piggledy, for instance, would be called a Troy fair.

Troy weight. The system of weights used in weighing precious metals and gems, the pound of 12 ounces weighing 5760 grains as compared with the pound avoirdupois which weighs 7000 grains and is divided into 16 ounces (cp. AVOIRDUPOIS). Why so called is not certainly known, but probably it was the system used at the great fairs at Troyes, in France. 1 lb. troy = 0.822861 lb. av., rather over four-fifths.

Troynovant. The name given by the early chroniclers to London, anciently the city of the Trinobantes (q.v.); a corruption of Trinovant. As Troynovant was assumed to mean The New Troy, the name gave rise to the tradition that Brute, a Trojan refugee (from whom they derived the name Britain) came to England and founded London.

For noble Britons sprong from Trojans bold,
And Troy-novant was built of old Troyes ashes cold
SPENSER: Faerie Queene, iii, 9.

Truce of God. In 1041 the Church attempted to limit private war, and decreed that there should be no hostilities between Lent and Advent or from the Thursday to the next Monday at the time of great festivals. This Truce of God was confirmed by the Lateran Council in 1179, and was agreed to by England, France, Italy, and other countries; but little attention was ever paid to it.

Truck System, The. The paying of employees otherwise than in current coin, or making it a condition that they shall buy food or other articles from some particular shop. In Britain this was made illegal by Acts passed in 1831, 1887, and 1896.

Truc. A true bill. See BILL.

True blue. See BLUE.

True-lovers' knot. A complicated double knot with two interlacing bows on each side and two ends, used as a symbol of love.

Three times a true-love's knot I tie secure;

Firm be the knot, firm may his love endure.

Gay's Pastorals: The Spell.

True Thomas. Thomas the Rhymer. See RHYMER.

Truepenny. Hamlet says to the Ghost, "Art thou there, Truepenny?" Then to his comrades,

"You hear this fellow in the cellarage" (i, 5). And again, "Well said, old mole; canst work?" The reference is to the sterling worth of his father—he was as honest and true as a genuine coin.

Trump. This word in such phrases as a trumped up affair, trumpery, etc., is the same word as trumpet; from Fr. trompe, a trumpet, whence tromper which, originally meaning "to play on a trumpet," came to mean to beguile, deceive, impose upon.

Trump in cards, is from Fr. triomphe (triumph), the name of an old variant of écarté.

The last trump. The final end of all things earthly; the Day of Judgment.

We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump.—1 Cor. xv, 51, 52.

To play one's last trump. To be reduced to one's last expedient; a phrase from card-playing.

To turn up trumps. Unexpectedly to prove very friendly and helpful.

Trumpet. See TRUMP above.

The Feast of Trumpets. A Jewish festival, held on the first two days of Tisri (about mid Sept. to mid Oct.), the beginning of the ecclesiastical year, at which the blowing of trumpets formed a prominent part of the ritual. See NUM. xxix, 1.

To blow one's own trumpet. To publish one's own praises, good deeds, etc. The allusion is to heralds, who used to announce with a flourish of trumpets the knights who entered a list. Similarly, your trumpeter is dead means that you are obliged to sound your own praises because no one will do it for you.

Trunk. In its sense of denominating the main body as opposed to the roots and branches, the word is used to describe the main lines of railway, postal, telephone systems, from which branch lines radiate. A trunk call is a telephone call on a trunk line from one town to another. Trunk road is a main highway between two principal towns. Trunk hose were a style of breeches worn in the 16th and 17th centuries, reaching from the waist to the middle of the thigh. Trunk drawers, or trunks are pants reaching only to the knee.

Trust. A combination of a number of companies or businesses doing similar trade, for the purpose of defeating competition or creating a monopoly, under one general control. So called because each member is on trust not to under-sell the others, but to remain faithful to the terms agreed on.

Trusty. In American penology a well-behaved, long-term prisoner who is allowed to help the wardens in some of their duties and is granted certain privileges not allowed to other convicts.

Truth. Pilate said, "What is truth?" (John xviii, 38). This was the great question of the Platonists. Plato said we could know truth if we could sublimate our minds to their original purity. Arcesilaus said that man's understanding is not capable of knowing what truth is. Carneades maintained that not only our understanding could not comprehend it, but even our senses are wholly inadequate to help us in the investigation. Gorgias the Sophist said, "What is right but what we prove to be right? and what is truth but what we believe to be truth?"

Pilate asked, Quid est veritas? And then some other matter took him in the head, and so up he rose and went his way before he had his answer. He deserved never to find what truth was.—BP. ANDREWS: Sermon on the Resurrection (1613)

Truth lies at the bottom of a well. This expression has been attributed to Heraclitus. Cleanthes, Democritus the Derider, and others.

Naturam accusa, quæ in profundo veritatem (ut ait Democritus) penitus abstruserit.—CICERO: Academica, i, 10.

Truth drug. Alkaloid scopolamin. An American doctor, R. E. House, used this drug to induce a state of lethargic intoxication in which the patient lost many of his defences and spoke the truth concerning matters about which he would normally have lied or prevaricated. The value of this and other truth drugs in penology has by no means been established.

Trygon (tri' gon). The sting-ray, a fish with a sharp spine in its tail. It is said that Telegonus, son of Ulysses by Circe, coming to Ithaca to see his father, was denied admission by the servants; whereupon a quarrel ensued, and his father, coming out to see what was the matter, was accidentally struck with his son's arrow, pointed with a trygon's spine, and died.

Tu autem (tū aw' tem) (Lat., But thou). A hint to leave off; "hurry up and come to the last clause." In the long Latin grace at St. John's College, Cambridge, the last clause used to be Tu autem miserere mei, Domine. Amen, and it was not unusual, when a scholar read slowly, for the senior Fellow to whisper Tu autem—i.e. Skip all the rest and give us only the last sentence.

Tu quoque (Lat., You too). A retort implying that the one addressed is in the same case as the speaker—no better and no worse.

The tu quoque style of argument. Personal invective; the argument of personal application; argumentum ad hominem.

Tuatha De Danann (twa' thà de dān' an). A legendary race of super-human heroes which invaded Ireland, overthrew the Firbolgs and Fomors, and were themselves overthrown by the Milesians, who later worshipped them as gods.

Tub. Tubs, in rowing slang, are gig pairs of college boat clubs, who practise for the term's races. They are pulled on one side when a pair-oar boat in uniform makes its appearance.

Tubbing is taking out pairs under the supervision of a coach to train men for taking part in the races.

A tale of a tub. A cock-and-bull story; a rigmarole; a nonsensical romance.

There is a comedy of this name by Ben Jonson (produced 1633), and a prose satire by Swift (1704) which portrays allegorically the failings of the English, Roman, and Presbyterian Churches.

A tub of naked children. Emblematical in religious paintings of St. Nicholas (q.v.), in allusion to the two boys murdered and placed in a pickling tub by a landlord, but raised to life again by this saint.

To throw a tub to the whale. To create a diversion in order to avoid a real danger; to bamboozle or mislead an enemy. In whaling, according to Swift, when a ship was threatened by a school of whales, it was usual to throw a tub into the sea to divert their attention.

Tub-thumper. A blustering, ranting public speaker; a "stump-orator." In allusion to the upturned tub frequently used as a rostrum at open-air meetings.

Tuck. This word, in the sense of eatables, is a mid-18th-century slang word, especially among schoolboys whose "tuck-box," brought from home at the beginning of term, contained sweets, jams, etc., to supplement school fare. From this came the phrase To tuck in, meaning to eat heartily and with relish. In Australia the word became tucker, meaning any kind of food, but particularly that carried on long journeys, etc.

To tuck one up. To finish him, do for him. The allusion is probably to tucking children up in bed for the night—they are finished with till next morning; but there may be some reference to the long narrow duellist's rapier formerly called a tuck (Fr. étoc, stock).

Tuck, Friar. See FRIAR TUCK.

Tucker. The ornamental frill of lace or muslin worn by women in the 17th and 18th centuries round the top of their dresses to cover the neck and shoulders. Hence, with clean bib and tucker, nicely dressed, looking fresh and spruce. See also TUCK.

Tuckahoe (tūk' á hō) (U.S.A.). An inhabitant of that part of the State of Virginia that lies east of the Blue Ridge Mountains.

Tudor (tū' dōr). The general descriptive term given to the architecture, etc., characteristic of the late 15th and the whole of the 16th centuries, when the Tudor sovereigns Henry VII, Henry VIII, Edward VI, Mary I, and Elizabeth I reigned in England. Tudor architecture is of the late style of Gothic, with wide, broad-pointed windows and doorways.

Tuffet. A dialect variant of tuft, which was formerly used of a small grassy mound or hillock.

Little Miss Muffet
Sat on a tuffet
Eating her curds and whey
Nursery Rhyme.

Tuft. The name formerly given at Oxford University to a peer's son or a fellow commoner because he wore a gold tassel or tuft on his college cap. This practice was discontinued in 1870, but it survives in

Tuft-hunter; one who tries to curry favour with the wealthy and great for the sake of feeding on the crumbs which fall from the rich man's table.

Tug. A name by which Collegers are known at Eton; from the tog (i.e. toga) worn by them to distinguish them from the rest of the school.

Tug of war. A rural sport in which a number of men, divided into two bands, lay hold of a strong rope and pull against each other till one side has tugged the other over the dividing line.

When Greek meets Greek then is the tug of war. See GREEK.

Tuileries (twē' lê rê). A former palace in Paris, so named from the tile-yards (tuileries) once on the site. It stood between the Louvre and the Place de la Concorde. The palace was designed by Philibert de l'Orme for Catherine de' Medici, 1564, and long served as a residence for the sovereigns of France. In 1871 it was burned down by the Communards, but the gardens remain as a pleasant public open space.

Tulchan Bishops. Certain Scotch bishops appointed by the Regent Morton, in 1572, with the distinct understanding that they were to hand over a fixed portion of the revenue to the patron. A tulchan is a stuffed calf-skin, placed under a cow that withholds her milk. The cow, thinking the "tulchan" to be her calf, readily yields her milk to the milk-pail; the bishop was to have the empty title, and the Regent was to get the "milk."

Tulip Mania. A reckless mania for the purchase of tulip-bulbs that arose in Holland in the 17th century and was at its greatest height about 1634-1637. A root of the species called Viceroy sold for £250; Semper Augustus, more than double that sum. The mania spread all over Europe, and became a mere stock-jobbing speculation.

To number the streaks of the tulip. To devote too much attention to minute details—characteristic in the view of 18th-century critics, of a bad poet. The phrase comes from Imlac's dissertation on poetry (Rasselas, Ch. x) where the principle is laid down that a poet must examine not the individual but the species, and concern himself with the general rather than the particular.

Tumbledown Dick. Anything that will not stand firmly. "Dick" is Richard Cromwell (1626-1712), the Protector's son, who was but a tottering wall at best.

Tumbler. A word with several meanings, all deriving from the verb "to tumble." Drinking tumblers are stemless glasses, now made with a flat bottom but originally with a rounded bottom that made the glass tumble over if set down on a table; hence requiring that it should be held until emptied. The performing tumbler was an acrobat whose turn consisted in somersaults, etc.; and thus a tumbler pigeon was one who performed such tricks in the air. The tumbler of a lock is a pivoted piece that has to be raised by the key for opening, and tumbles back into place when released, thus preventing the bolt from being drawn.

B.D.—30

Tune. The tune the old cow died of. Advice instead of relief; remonstrance instead of help.

The reference is to the song—

There was an old man, and he had an old cow,

But he had no fodder to give her,

So he took up his fiddle and played her the tune;

"Consider, good cow, consider,

This isn't the time for the grass to grow,

Consider, good cow, consider."

To change one's tune, or sing another tune. See SING.

To the tune of. To the amount of; as, "I had to pay up to the tune of £500."

Tuneful Nine, The. The nine Muses (q.v.). When thy young Muse invok'd the tuneful Nine,
To say how LOUIS did not pass the RHINE,
What Work had We with WAGENINGEN, ARNHEIM,
Places that could not be reduced to Rhime?
PRIOR: Letter to Boileau Despreaux (1704).

Tunkers or Dunkers (Ger., Dippers). A religious sect akin to the Baptists, founded in Germany in 1708 by Alexander Mack. In 1719 a party of them emigrated to Pennsylvania, and the sect has spread considerably in the Western States. They follow Bible teaching as closely as possible and adhere to the simplicity of the primitive Church.

Turban. The head-dress of many Mohammedan races, consisting of a scarf of cotton or silk wound round the head, the manner of arranging the folds varying according to rank and country. The tarbush or fez is used as the foundation for a turban, and often as a headdress in itself, though in Turkey this was prohibited by law in 1925, when it was decreed that all Turks should wear European hats.

Turf, The. The racecourse; the profession of horse-racing, which is done on turf or grass. A turfite is one who lives by the turf, either by running horses or betting.

Turk. Applied to barbarous, savage, cruel men, because these qualities have been for centuries attributed to Turks; also to mischievous and unruly children, as You little Turk!

The Young Turks. The reforming party in the Ottoman Empire who, in the early part of the present century, introduced the methods of modern Europe into the government. Through many stormy scenes and much involved politics the party steered its country through World War I, and, dragged in divergent directions by the conflicting interests and policies of the European powers, survived in spite of all, to get rid (1922) of the decadent sultans of the House of Othman and declare Turkey a republic.

Turk Gregory. Falstaff's ne plus ultra of military valour—a humorous combination of the Sultan with Gregory VII (Hildebrand), probably the strongest of all the Popes.

Turk Gregory never did such deeds in arms as I have done this day.—1 Henry IV, v, 3.

Turkey. To talk turkey. (U.S.A.) To talk seriously.

Turkey rhubarb. See MISNOMERS.

Turn. Done to a turn. Cooked exactly right; another turn on the gridiron would be one too much.

He felt that the hour for the up-turning of his glass was at hand. He knew that the sand of life was nearly run out, and that death was about to turn his hour-glass upside down.

One good turn deserves another. A benefit received ought to be repaid.

To serve its turn. To be appropriate—the right thing in the right place; often said of something that only barely meets its requirements.

To turn down. To reject; a candidate at an examination, election, etc., who does not meet with success is said to be turned down.

In Eastern countries a glass is turned down at convivial gatherings as a memento of a recently departed companion:—

And when thyself with shining feet shalt pass
Among the guests star-scattered on the grass
And in thy joyous errand reach the spot
Where I made one—turn down an empty glass!
FITZGERALD'S Omar Khayyam.

To turn the tables. See TABLE.

To turn turtle. To turn completely over, upside down, topsy-turvy. Usually said of boats, from the fact that a turtle, when turned on its back, is quite helpless.

To turn up. To arrive, often unexpectedly; to appear.

A turn-up for the book. A bit of good luck, unexpected good fortune.

Waiting for something to turn up. Expectant that the luck will change, that good fortune will arrive without much effort on one's own part. Mr. Micawber's philosophy of life, in David Copperfield.

Turncoat. A renegade; one who deserts his principles or party.

Fable has it that a certain Duke of Saxony, whose dominions were bounded in part by France, hit upon the device of a coat blue one side, and white the other. When he wished to be thought in the French interest he wore the white outside; otherwise the blue. Whence a Saxon was nicknamed Emmanuel Turncoat.

Turnspit. One who has all the work but none of the profit; he turns the spit but eats not of the roast. The allusion is to the turnspit, a small dog which was used to turn the roasting-spit by means of a kind of tread-wheel. Topsell says, "They go into a wheel, which they turn round about with the weight of their bodies, so diligently . . . that no drudge . . . can do the feate more cunningly" (1607).

Turnip. Common slang for a large, old-fashioned silver watch.

Turpin. A contemporary of Charlemagne, Archbishop of Rheims from 753 to 794, on whom has been fathered a French chronicle history, written in Latin in the first half of the 11th century. The probable author was a canon of Barcelona. It relates the expedition of Charlemagne to Spain in 777, and his return to France after subduing Navarre and Aragon.

Turret. A small tower, used for decorative purpose, on a building. In a battleship the turret is a circular armoured structure on the deck in which the heavy guns are mounted. By hydraulic or electrical power the turret can be moved round as required. Its under-structure goes to the bottom of the ship where are the magazines. In a tank it is a similar rotating structure, mounted on the hull, containing the main armament and periscope through which the commander may see when all the hatches are shut down.

Tut. A word used in Lincolnshire for a phantom, as the Spittal Hill Tut. Tom Tut will get you is a threat to frighten children. Tut-gotten is panic-struck.

Tutankhamun (too tăn kâ moon'). A Pharaoh who lived in the middle of the 14th century B.C. In the winter of 1922/23 an expedition led by Howard Carter uncovered the burial place in the Valley of the Tombs of the Kings, in the face of the Nile cliffs. Unique treasure of mortuary furniture was found, most of which is now in the Cairo Museum. The mummy in its gorgeous coffin showed that the Pharaoh was little more than eighteen years old at the time of his death.

Tutenag. See TOOTH (Tooth and egg).

Tutivillus (tū ti vil' ūs). The demon of mediæval legend who collects all the words skipped over or mutilated by priests in the celebration of the Mass. These literary scraps or shreds he deposits in that pit which is said to be paved with "good intentions" never brought to effect.

Tutor. A private teacher; in English universities a Fellow or other college official. He has the direction of the studies of a certain number of undergraduates who are placed under his care for the time they are up at the university. In Law a tutor is the guardian of a minor.

Tweed. The origin of this name of a woollen cloth used for garments is to be found in a blunder. It should have been tweal, the Scots form of twill; but when the Scotch manufacturer sent a consignment to James Locke, of London, in 1826, the name was badly written and misread; and as the cloth was made on the banks of the Tweed, tweed was accordingly adopted. Twill, like dimity (q.v.), means "two-threaded."

Tweedledum and Tweedledee. Names invented by John Byrom (1692-1763) to satirize two quarrelling schools of musicians between whom the real difference was negligible. Hence used of people whose persons or opinions—are "as like as two peas."

Some say compared to Bononcini
That mynheer Handel's but a nunny;
Others aver that he to Handel
Is scarcely fit to hold a candle.
Strange all this difference should be 'Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

J. BYROM.

The Duke of Marlborough and most of the nobility took the side of G. B. Bononcini (d. about 1752), but the Prince of Wales, with Pope and Arbuthnot, was for Handel. Cp. GLUCKISTS.

Twelve, Twelfth. Each English archer carries twelve Scotsmen under his girdle. This was a common saying at one time, because the English were unerring archers, and each carried twelve arrows in his belt.

Twelve-note music. A modern system of musical composition in which the twelve notes of the chromatic scale have each exactly the same importance, not being centred round any one tone. By a selected order of tones these are unified for any given composition.

The twelve tables. The earliest code of Roman law, compiled by the Decemviri, and engraved on twelve bronze tablets (Livy, iii, 57; Diodorus, xii, 56).

Twelfth, The. The 12th of August, "St. Grouse's Day"; the first day of grouse-shooting.

Twelfth man. The reserve chosen for a cricket team of eleven, hence, anyone who just misses distinction.

Twelfth Night. January 5th, the eve of Twelfth Day, or the Feast of the Epiphany, twelve days after Christmas, Jan. 6th. Formerly this was a time of great merrymaking, and the games that took place were, with little doubt, a survival of the old Roman Saturnalia, which was held at the same season. By the Julian calendar Twelfth Day is Old Christmas Day.

Shakespeare's play of this name (produced in 1602) was so called because it was written for acting at the Twelfth Night festivities; the groundwork of the plot was ultimately drawn—through various sources—from the Italian of Bandello.

Twerp. A slang term of a mildly derogatory implication descriptive of a stupid and contemptible fellow.

Twickenham. The Bard of Twickenham. Alexander Pope (1688-1744), who lived there for thirty years.

Twig. I twig you. I catch your meaning; I understand. (Irish Twigim, I understand.)

Twilight Sleep. A state of semi-consciousness produced by injection of scopolamine and morphia in which a woman can undergo childbirth with comparatively little pain.

Twins, The. A constellation and sign of the zodiac (May 21st to June 21st); representing Castor and Pollux (q.v.), the "great twin brethren" of classical mythology.

Twist. Like Oliver Twist, asking for more. Oliver Twist, the workhouse-boy hero of Dickens's novel of that name (1838), astonished the workhouse-master and caused general consternation by once actually asking for more gruel.

To twist it on one. Slang for to swindle one or to bamboozle him to one's own advantage. Also (with allusion to giving the screw another twist), to extract from a person all one can—and a bit over.

Twitcher, Jemmy. A cunning, treacherous highwayman in Gay's Beggar's Opera. The name was given about 1765, in a poem by Gray, to John, Lord Sandwich (1718-92), noted for his liaison with Miss Ray, who was shot by the Rev. "Captain" Hackman out of jealousy.

See Jemmy Twitcher shambles—stop, stop thief!

Two. The evil principle of Pythagoras. Accordingly the second day of the second month of the year was sacred to Pluto, and was esteemed unlucky.

The two eyes of Greece. Athens and Sparta.

To have two strings to one's bow. See Bow.

Two heads are better than one. Outside advice is often very useful. To the saying are sometimes added the words—or why do folks marry?

Two is company, three is none. An old saying, much used by lovers; it is given in Heywood's collection of proverbs (1546).

Two may keep counsel—if one of them's dead. A caustic saying expressive of the great difficulty of being certain that a secret is not told once it is imparted to someone else. Shakespeare has—

Two may keep counsel when the third's away.

Titus Andronicus, iv, 2.

And in The Testament of Love, formerly attributed to Chaucer, is—

For three may kepe a counsel, if twain be awaie.

Two of a trade did never agree. A very old proverb (it occurs in Hesiod's Works and Days), but one that is by no means of universal application.

In every age and clime we see

Two of a trade can ne'er agree.

GAY: Fables, I, xxi.

When two Fridays come together. One of a large number of circumlocutions for Never!

Two Gentlemen of Verona. The Shakespeare's comedy (written certainly before 1598, but not printed till the Folio of 1623) is principally indebted for the story to the pastoral romance of Diana, by George of Montemayor, a Spaniard, a translation of which by Bartholomew Yonge was in existence in 1582, but not printed till 1598. Other Italian stories, and perhaps Sidney's Arcadia, were drawn upon, and the love adventure of Julia resembles that of Viola in Twelfth Night.

Twopenny. Often used slightly of things of very little value.

Tuck in your twopenny! The schoolboy's warning to the boy over whose back the leap is to be made in leap-frog.

Twopenny damn. See DAMN.

The Twopenny Tube. The Central London Railway was so called, because for some years after its opening (1900) the fare between any two stations was 2d.

Tybalt (tib' ált). Formerly a name commonly given to cats (cp. TIBERT, in Reynard the Fox); hence the allusions to cats in connexion with Tybalt, one of the Capulet family in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet. Mercutio says, "Tybalt, you rat-catcher, will you walk?" (iii, 1); and again, when Tybalt asks, "What wouldst thou have with me?" Mercutio answers, "Good king of cats! nothing but one of your nine lives" (iii, 1).

Tyburn (tí' bérn). A former tributary of the Thames rising at Hampstead, which gave its name to the district where now stands the Marble Arch, and where public executions formerly took place. Hence Tyburn tree, the gallows, to take a ride to Tyburn, to go to one's hanging, Lord of the Manor of Tyburn, the common hangman, etc.

The site of the gallows is marked by three brass triangles let into the road pavement at the junction of Edgeware Road and Bayswater Road. The last criminal to be hanged there, in 1783, was one Ryland, a forger; after that date executions were carried out at Newgate, until that prison was demolished.

Tyburn Ticket. A certificate which, under a statute of William III, was granted to prosecutors who had secured a capital conviction against a criminal, exempting them from all parish and ward offices within the parish in which the felony had been committed. This, with the privilege it conferred, might be sold once, and once only, and the Stamford Mercury for March 27th, 1818, announced the sale of one for £280. The Act was repealed by 58 Geo. III, c. 70.

Tyburnia. The Portman and Grosvenor Squares district of London, described by Thackeray as "the elegant, the prosperous, the polite Tyburnia, the most respectable district of the habitable globe."

Tycoon (ti koon'). A title of the Shogun (q.v.); applied in the U.S.A. to an industrial magnate.

Tyke. See TIKE.

Tyler's Insurrection. An armed rebellion of peasants in southern England in 1381, led by Wat Tyler (an Essex man), in consequence of discontent aroused by the Statute of Labourers, and the heavy taxation, especially a poll-tax of three groats to defray the expenses of a war with France. Wat Tyler was slain by Sir William Walworth, the Lord Mayor, at Smithfield, the revolt was crushed, and many of the rebels executed.

Tylwyth Teg (til' with teg) (Welsh, the Fair family). A sort of kobold family of Welsh folklore, but not of diminutive size. They lived in a lake near Brecknock.

Tyndale's Bible. See BIBLE, THE ENGLISH.

Type. Before the introduction of the point system the principal sizes of printing type were:—

Great primer (pron. prim' er), a large, 18-pt. type, 4½ lines to the inch.

Long primer, 10 pt., 7½ lines to the inch. These were so called from being used for the printing of primers, or prayer-books.

Pica, 12 pt., 6 lines to the inch.

Brevier, 8 pt., 9½ lines to the inch. Many breviers were printed in this.

Minion, 7 pt., 10 lines to the inch.

A fount of type. See LETTER.

In an ordinary fount the proportion of the various letters is usually as follows:—

a .. 8,500	h .. 6,400	o .. 8,000	v .... 1,200
b .. 1,600	i .. 8,000	p .. 1,700	w .... 2,000
c .. 3,000	j .. 400	q .. 500	x .... 400
d .. 4,400	k .. 800	r .. 6,200	y .... 2,000
e .. 12,000	l .. 4,000	s .. 8,000	z .... 200
f .. 2,500	m .. 3,000	t .. 9,000
g .. 1,700	n .. 8,000	u .. 3,400	2,000 : 600

Typographical Signs. ' An acute accent. In Greek it indicates a rise in the voice; in French vowel quality; in Spanish stress; in Bohemian and Hungarian a long vowel.

^ A grave accent. In Greek indicating a fall of the voice; in French vowel quality, or sometimes a differentiation (as in la, là); and in English that the accented syllable is to be pronounced (as in bleſſed).

^ A circumflex; in French usually indicating that an s has been dropped (as être for older estre), and that the marked vowel is long.

˘ under the letter c in French, is called a cedilla, and indicated that the c (ç) is to be pronounced as s. It represents the Greek zeta (z), which formerly followed the c to indicate an s sound.

˙ over the second of two vowels, as in reestablish, denotes that each vowel is to be sounded and is called the dieresis, in French, trema. In German it is the umlaut or zweipunct (two dots); and denotes a change in the vowel sound, a following vowel (usually e) having been dropped.

˚ over a vowel, is the Scandinavian form of the umlaut or zweipunct (see above).

˜ The tilde (q.v.), used in Spanish, over the n (as Oñoro) to show that it is pronounced ny. & And; the Tironian Sign, or Ampersand (qq.v.).

? The note of interrogation, or query mark; said to have been formed from the first and last letters of Lat. Quæstio (question), which were contracted to Q.

! The note of exclamation; representing the Latin Io (joy), written vertically Io.

' The apostrophe; indicating that a letter (or figure has been omitted, as don't, I'm; the rebellion of '98 (for 1798); also marking the possessive case (John's book).

* †, ‡ The asterisk, dagger (or obelisk), and double dagger; used as reference marks, etc. Another reference mark is

** or *** The asterism.

§ The section mark; said to represent the old long initial s's (ff) of Lat. signum sectionis sign of a section.

~~¶~~ An index-hand, called by printers a "fist," to draw attention to a statement.

¶ A blind p (a modification of the initial letter of paragraph), marks a new paragraph.

() Called parentheses, and [] Called brackets, separate some explanatory or collateral matter from the real sequence.

Typhæus (ti fē' us). A giant of Greek mythology, with a hundred heads, fearful eyes, and a terrible voice. He was the father of the Harpies. Zeus killed him with a thunderbolt, and he lies buried under Mount Etna.

Typhon (ti' fon). Son of Typhæus. He was so tall that he touched the skies with his head. His offspring were Gorgon, Geryon, Cerberus, and the hydra of Lerne. Like his father, he lies buried under Etna. See also SER.

Tyrant. In ancient Greece the tyrant was merely the absolute ruler, the despot, of a state, and at first the word had no implication of cruelty or what we call tyranny. Many of the Greek tyrants were pattern rulers, as Pisistratus and Pericles, of Athens; Periander, of Corinth; Dionysius the Younger, Gelon, and his brother Hiero of Syracuse; Phidion, of Argos, Polycrates, of Samos; etc. The word (turanos) soon, however, obtained much the same meaning as it has with us.

A tyrant's vein. A ranting, bullying manner. In the old moralities the tyrants were made to rant, and the loudness of their rant was proportionate to the villainy of their dispositions.

The Thirty Tyrants. The thirty magistrates appointed by Sparta over Athens, at the termination of the Peloponnesian war. This "reign of terror," after one year's continuance, was overthrown by Thrasybulos (403 B.C.).

In the Roman empire those military usurpers who endeavoured, in the reigns of Valerian and Gallienus (253-268), to make themselves independent princes, are also called the Thirty Tyrants. The number must be taken with great latitude, as only nineteen are given, and their resemblance to those of Athens is extremely fanciful.

The Tyrant of the Chersonese. Miltiades was so called, and yet was he, as Byron says (in The Isles of Greece), "Freedom's best and bravest friend."

Tyrian Purple. This dye of ancient fame was, properly speaking, a crimson, produced from an animal juice found in the shell-fish Murex.

Tyrtaeus (tēr tē' ūs). A lame schoolmaster and elegiac poet of Athens who is said to have so inspired the Spartans by his songs that they defeated the Messenians (7th cent. B.C.). The name has hence been given to many martial poets who have urged on their countrymen to deeds of arms and victory.

U

U. The twenty-first letter of the English alphabet; in form a modification of V with which for many centuries it was interchangeable. Words beginning with U and V were (like those in I and J) not separated in English dictionaries till about 1800, and in 16th- and early-17th-century books spellings such as vpon and haue are the rule rather than the exception. The following from the title-page of Polymantheia (Anon., 1595) is a good example of the confusion:—

Polimanteia, or, The meanes . . . to iudge of the fall of a Commonwealth, against the fruioulus and foolish coniectures of this age. Whereunto is added, a Letter . . . perswading them to a constant vnitie . . . for the defence of our . . . native country . . .
—Printed by John Legate, Printer to the Universitie of Cambridge, 1595.

U-boat. A German submarine; the term is adapted from the German Unterseeboot (under-water vessel).

Udal Tenure. The same as "allodial tenure," the opposite of "feudal tenure," which was the holding of a tenement under a feudal lord. Udal tenure is a sort of freehold, held by the right of long possession, and is obsolete, except in the Orkneys and Shetlands. The more correct spelling is odal (Icel. othal).

Ugly Duckling. An unpromising child who develops into a beautiful and admired grown-up; from this the term is extended to anything of an unprepossessing nature that may change with time into its very reverse. The phrase is taken from Hans Andersen's story of the ugly duckling that proved to be a cygnet and, to its foster-mother's surprise, grew up into a lovely swan.

Ugolino (oo gō lē' nō). A Ghibelline (Ugolino della Gherardesca, Count of Pisa) who, about 1270, deserted his party and, with the hope of usurping supreme power in Pisa, formed an alliance with Giovanni Visconti, the head of the Guelphs. The plot failed; Giovanni died, and Ugolino joined the Florentines and forced the Pisans to restore his territories. In 1284 Genoa made war against Pisa, and the Count again treacherously deserted the Pisans, causing their total overthrow. At length a conspiracy was formed against him, and in 1288 he was cast with his two sons and two grandsons into the tower of Gualandri, where they were all starved to death. Dante, in his Inferno, has given the sad tale undying publicity.

Uhlans (oo' lānz). The former Prussian light cavalry, chiefly employed in reconnoitring, skirmishing, and outpost duty.

Uitlander (oit' lan der). A S. African term for a foreigner—an out-lander. It is particularly applied to white inhabitants of other than Boer nationality, and was a term that aroused violent political feeling at the period of the Anglo-Boer War.

Ukase (ū kāz). In the Russian Empire, an edict either proceeding from the senate or direct from the emperor. Hence, a rigid order or official decree of any kind.

Ukelele (ū ke lā' le). A small 4-stringed instrument shaped like a guitar and used in the South Seas as the "small brother" of the Hawaiian guitar. It enjoyed a vogue in the U.S.A. and Britain in the 1920s.

Ulema (ū lē' mā). The learned classes in Mohammedan countries, interpreters of the Koran and the law, from whose numbers are chosen the mollahs, imaums, muftis, cadis, etc. (ministers of religion, doctors of law, and administrators of justice). Ulema is the plural of ulim, a wise man. The body is under the presidency of the Sheikh-ul-Islam.

Ullage (ūl' āj). The difference between the amount of liquid a vessel can contain and what it actually does contain. The term is applied particularly to a bottle of wine of which part of the contents have evaporated on account of the cork being old or faulty.

Ullin. Fingal's aged bard (Ossian).

Ulster. The northernmost province of Ireland, which was forfeited to the Crown in James I's reign in consequence of the rebellions of Tyrconnel and Tyrone, and colonized (1609-12) by English and Scottish settlers, who were forbidden to sell land to any Irishman. Since then the Ulstermen (cp. ORANGEMEN) have been intensely British and anti-Irish in sentiment and action, and have refused to form part of or have any share in the independent state of Eire.

The long loose overcoat known as an ulster is so called because originally made of Ulster frieze.

The Red, or Bloody, Hand of Ulster. The badge of Ulster, a sinister hand, erect, open, and couped at the wrist, gules; also carried as a charge on the coat of arms of baronets of England, Great Britain, and the United Kingdom, in commemoration of the fact that this order was created by James I (1611) with the ostensible object of raising funds for the settlement of Ulster. See BARONET.

Legend has it that in an ancient expedition to Ireland, it was given out that whoever first touched the shore should possess the territory which he touched; O'Neill, seeing another boat likely to outstrip his own, cut off his left hand and threw it on the coast. From this O'Neill the princes of Ulster were descended, and the motto of the O'Neills is to this day Lamh dearg Eirinn, "red hand of Erin."

Ulster King-of-Arms. Chief heraldic officer of Ireland, and Registrar to the Order of St. Patrick. Created by Edward VI in 1552.

Ultima Thule. See THULE.

Ultimus Romanorum (ŭl' ti mŭs rŏ mā nŏr' ŭm) (Lat.). The Last of the Romans. See LAST.

Ultor (ŭl' tŏr) (Lat., the Avenger). A title given to Mars (q.v.) when, after defeating the murderers of Julius Cæsar, Augustus built a temple to him in the Forum at Rome.

Ultra vires (ŭl' tra vī' rēz) (Law Lat. ultra, beyond, vires, pl. of vis, strength). In excess of the power possessed; transcending authority. If the Bank of England were to set up a mint on its premises, it would be acting ultra vires.

Ultramontane Party. The extreme party in the Church of Rome. Ultramontane opinions or tendencies are those which favour the high "Catholic" party. Ultramontane (beyond the mountains, i.e. the Alps) means Italy or the old Papal States. The term was first used by the French, to distinguish those who look upon the Pope as the fountain of all power in the Church, in contradistinction to the Gallican school, which maintained the right of self-government by national churches. Cp. TRAMONTANE.

Ulysses, or Odysseus (ŭ līz' ēz, ō dīs' ūs) ("the hater"). A mythical king of Ithaca, a small rocky island of Greece, one of the leading chieftains of the Greeks in Homer's Iliad, and the hero of his Odyssey (q.v.), represented by Homer as wise, eloquent, and full of artifices.

According to Virgil it was he who suggested the device of the wooden horse through which Troy was ultimately taken.

Ulysses' bow. Only Ulysses could draw his own bow, and he could shoot an arrow through twelve rings. By this sign Penelope recognized her husband after an absence of twenty years.

The bow was prophetic. It belonged at one time to Eurytus of Eëchalia.

Umble Pie. A pie made of umbles—i.e. the liver, kidneys, etc., of a deer. Such offal was the perquisite of the keeper, and umble pie was a dish for servants and inferiors.

The keeper hath the skin, head, umbles, chine, and shoulders.—HOLINSHED: Chronicle, i, 204.

This is the origin of our phrase usually rendered "to eat humble pie."

Umbrage. (Lat. umbra, shade). To take umbrage. Originally to feel overshadowed, slighted and hence to take offence.

Umbrella. Used in China in the 11th century B.C., in ancient Babylon and Egypt, and known in England in Anglo-Saxon times, though not commonly in use till the early 18th century, and, apparently, not introduced into Scotland till 1780. Umbrellas are mentioned by Drayton in his Muses Elizium (1630)—

And like umbrellas, with their feathers,
Shield you in all sorts of weathers.

And Quarles in his Emblems (1635) uses the word to signify the Deity hidden in the manhood of Christ—"Nature is made th' umbrella of the Deity" (iv, 14). Another mention is in Swift's City Shower (1710), in Gay's Trivia (1711), and The Tatler, in No. 238 (Oct. 17th. 1710), says:

The young gentlemen belonging to the Custom House . . . borrowed the umbrella from Wilk's coffee-house.

Jonas Hanway (1712-86), the Persian traveller, seems to have popularized umbrellas, for his use of one in London to keep off the rain created a disturbance among the chairmen and public coachmen, showing that they were not commonly used in the streets at the time.

Under the umbrella of So-and-so. Under his dominion, regimen, influence. The allusion is to the umbrella which, as an emblem of sovereignty, is carried over certain African potentates as the Sultan of Morocco. In Travels of Ali Bey (Penny Magazine, Dec., 1835), we are told, "The retinue of the sultan was composed of a troop of from fifteen to twenty men on horseback. About 100 steps behind them came the sultan, mounted on a mule, with an officer bearing his umbrella, who rode beside him on a mule. . . . Nobody but the sultan himself [not even] his sons and brothers, dares to make use of it."

In 1874 the sacred umbrella of Koffee, King of the Ashantis, was captured. It was placed in the South Kensington Museum.

In World War II the term umbrella was used to denote the air-cover over land or sea operations.

Umlaut (um' lout). The change or modification of sound characteristic of certain Germanic languages occasioned when a vowel is influenced by a following vowel. The second or modifying vowel can appear, or it can be replaced by a diaeresis, itself called an umlaut, as Goethe, Göthe; Duerer, Dürer.

U.N. The United Nations. This is the official designation, since the San Francisco meeting of June, 1945, of what had hitherto been known as U.N.O., the United Nations Organization. The preamble of its charter opens:—"We, the peoples of the United Nations, determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war . . . and to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small . . . have resolved to combine our efforts to accomplish these aims."

U.N. formally came into existence October 24th, 1945, with its seat in U.S.A., temporarily at Lake Success, Long Island. Fifty-eight States were signatories to the Charter.

Una (ū' nà). The heroine of the first book of Spenser's Faerie Queene, typifying Truth (Una, the One).

Unam Sanctam (ū' nām sāngkt' ām) (Lat., one Holy, i.e. Church). A bull issued in 1302 by Boniface VIII during his quarrel with Philip IV of France, declaring that temporal power is inferior to spiritual, and that the Pope is a Sovereign over Sovereigns. So called—as is usual in bulls—from its opening words.

Unanointed. Unanointed; without having had extreme unction (A.S. ele, oil; Lat. oleum).

Unhoused, disappointed, unanointed.
Hamlet, i, 5.

Unhoused is without having had the Eucharist, especially in the hour of death (A.S. husel, sacrifice, Eucharist).

Uncials (ūn' si ālz). A kind of majuscule script used in MSS. dating from about the 1st century B.C. to the 9th century A.D.; so called because they are about an inch (Lat. uncia) in height.

Uncle. Slang for a pawnbroker, in use as early as 1756. Its origin is unknown. An article that has gone to my uncle's, is pawned.

Don't come the uncle over me. In Latin, Ne sis patruus mihi (Horace: 2 Sat. iii, 88)—i.e. do not overdo your privilege of reproving or castigating me. The Latin notion of a patruus or uncle left guardian was that of a severe castigator and reprover. Similarly, their idea of a stepmother was a woman of stern, unsympathetic nature, who was unjust to her stepchildren, and was generally disliked.

Uncle George. King George III.

Uncle Joe. A humorous nickname for Joseph Stalin, President of the U.S.S.R.

Uncle Remus (rē' mūs). The old plantation Negro whose quaint and proverbial wisdom, and stories of Brer Rabbit and Brer Fox were related by Joel Chandler Harris (1848-1908) in Uncle Remus, his Songs and Sayings (1880), and Nights with Uncle Remus (1883).

Uncle Sam. See SAM.

Uncle Tom's Cabin. A story by Harriet Beecher Stowe (1811-96) that appeared in 1852. It tells of the sale of a pious and faithful old Negro slave to a bad owner. By its emphasis on the worst sides of negro slavery the book helped in no small degree to arouse the American nation to an understanding of the iniquities of the system. The original of Uncle Tom was a slave subsequently ordained as the Rev. J. Henson. He came to London in 1876 and was presented to Queen Victoria.

Welsh Uncle. The husband of a parent's cousin; sometimes a parent's first cousin.

Unco. A Scottish variant of uncouth (unknown; hence, strange, extraordinary). It has two meanings: As an adjective it means unknown, strange, unusual; but as an adverb it means very—as unco good, unco glad, etc. The "unco guid" are the pinchbeck saints, too good by half.

Unconscious, The. In psychology the mental processes which the individual cannot bring into consciousness—they are, indeed, often unknown to him.

Uncumber, St., formerly called St. Wilgefortis, a very mythical saint. "Women changed her name" (says Sir Thomas More) "because they reken that for a pecke of oats she will not faile to uncumber them of their husbondys." The tradition says that she was one of seven beautiful daughters born at a birth to a queen of Portugal; wishing to lead a single life she prayed that she might have a beard. The prayer was granted; and she was no more cumbered with lovers; but one of them, a prince of Sicily, was so enraged that he had her crucified. If a wife were weary of a husband, she offered oats at Poules . . . to St. Uncumber.—MICHAEL WOODE (1554).

Undecimilla. See URSULA.

Under-. Under-cover. Working out of sight. An under-cover agent is one who pursues his enquiries or work unknown to any but his employer.

Underground. A political or military movement carried on in secret against an oppressor government or an occupying enemy administration. During World War II there were many effectively organized underground movements in all countries occupied by German forces.

Underground Railroad. The route by which runaway slaves were secretly transported through the Northern States to Canada and freedom.

Undertaker. The application of this word to one who carries out funerals—in U.S.A. termed a mortician—dates from the 17th century, though its origin is unknown.

Underwriter. One who engages to buy at a certain prearranged price all the stock in a new company, of a new issue, etc., that is not taken up by the public. An underwriter at Lloyd's is one who insures a ship or its merchandise and undertakes other insurance to a stated amount. So called because he writes his name under the policy.

Undine (ūn dēn'). One of the elemental spirits of Paracelsus (cp. SYLPH), the spirit of the waters. She was created without a soul; but had this privilege, that by marrying a mortal and bearing him a child she obtained a soul, and with it all the pains and penalties of the human race. She is the subject of a tale (Undine, 1811) by de la Motte Fouqué (1777-1843).

Unearned Increment. The increase in the value of land which results from the building of roads or railways, from the growth of population, or from the working of mines beneath the surface.

UNESCO. The United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization. Founded in 1945 as a specialized agency of the United Nations, "the purpose of the Organization is to contribute to peace and security by promoting collaboration among the nations through education, science, and culture."

Unfinished Symphony. Schubert's Symphony in B minor, of which only two movements were completed. Other work or disinclination caused the composer to leave unfinished the four movements he had originally designed.

Unfrock. In ecclesiastical parlance, to deprive a priest of his clerical robes and reduce him to lay estate. It is rarely done—so rarely in the R.C. Church that the last case of a solemn unfrocking was in Poland, in 1853, when a priest was publicly degraded before execution for a murder. After his death it was discovered that he had suffered innocently on behalf of another, of whose guilt he knew only under the seal of confession.

Unguem (ūn' gwēm). Ad unguem. To the minutest point. To finish a statue ad unguem is to finish it so smoothly and perfectly that when the nail is run over the surface it can detect no imperfection. See FINGER (to have it at one's fingers' ends.)

Unhinged. I am quite unhinged. My nerves are shaken, my equilibrium of mind is disturbed; I am like a door which has lost one of its hinges.

Unhousel. See UNANELED.

Unicorn (ū' nī kōrn) (Lat. unum cornu, one horn). A mythical and heraldic animal, represented by mediæval writers as having the legs of a buck, the tail of a lion, the head and body of a horse, and a single horn, white at the base, black in the middle, and red at the tip, in the middle of its forehead. The body is white, the head red, and eyes blue. The oldest author that describes it is Ctesias (400 B.C.); the mediæval notions concerning it are well summarized in the following extract:

The unicorn has but one horn in the middle of its forehead. It is the only animal that ventures to attack the elephant; and so sharp is the nail of its foot, that with one blow it can rip the belly of that beast. Hunters can catch the unicorn only by placing a young virgin in his haunts. No sooner does he see the damsel, than he runs towards her, and lies down at her feet, and so suffers himself to be captured by the hunters. The unicorn represents Jesus Christ, who took on Him our nature in the virgin's womb, was betrayed by the Jews, and delivered into the hands of Pontius Pilate. Its one horn signifies the Gospel of Truth.—Le Bestiaire Divin de Guillaume, Clerc de Normandie (13th century).

Another popular belief was that the unicorn by dipping its horn into a liquid could detect whether or not it contained poison. In the designs for gold and silver plate made for the Emperor Rudolph II by Ottavio Strada is a cup on which a unicorn stands as if to assay the liquid.

The supporters of the old royal arms of Scotland are two Unicorns; when James VI of Scotland came to reign over England (1603) he brought one of the Unicorns with him, and with it supplanted the Red Dragon which, as representing Wales, was one of the supporters of the English shield, the other being the Lion.

The animosity which existed between the lion and the unicorn referred to by Spenser in his Faerie Queene (II, v)—

Like as a lion, whose imperial powre

A proud rebellious unicorn defyes—is allegorical of that which once existed between England and Scotland.

Driving unicorn. Two wheelers and one leader. The leader is the one horn.

Unigenitus (ū nī jēn' i tus) (Lat., the Only-Begotten). A Papal bull, so called from its opening sentence, Unigenitus Dei Filius, issued in 1713 by Clement XI in condemnation of Quesnel's Réflexions Morales which favoured Jansenism. It was a damnatio in globo—i.e. a condemnation of the whole book without exception. It was confirmed in 1725, but in 1730 was condemned by the civil authorities of Paris and the controversy died out.

Unilateral. One-sided. In a political sense this term implies action by one party to a treaty or agreement without the consent of the other party or parties involved.

Union. The Union. A short term for the United States of America, and (in England) a once familiar euphemism for the workhouse.

The Act of Union. Specifically, the Act of 1706 declaring that on and after May 1st, 1707, England and Scotland should have a united Parliament. The two countries had been united under one sovereign since 1603.

The term is also applied to the Act of 1536 incorporating Wales with England; and to that of 1800, which united the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland on and after January 1st, 1801.

Union of South Africa. The self-governing former colonies of Cape of Good Hope, Natal, the Transvaal, Orange River Colony, united in a legislature in 1910, with its capital at Pretoria and the seat of government at Capetown.

The Union Rose. The combined emblematic rose of the Houses of York and Lancaster, the petals of which are white and red; white representing York, and red representing Lancaster. See under Rose.

Union is strength. The wise saw of Periander, "tyrant" of Corinth (665-585 B.C.).

Union Jack. The national banner of Great Britain and Ireland. It consists of three united crosses—that of St. George for England, the saltire of St. Andrew for Scotland (added by James I), and the cross of St. Patrick for Ireland (added at the Union in 1801).

The white edging of St. George's cross shows the white field. In the saltire the cross is reversed on each side, showing that the other half of the cross is covered over. The broad white band is the St. Andrew's cross and should be uppermost at the top left-hand corner of the flag. The narrow white edge is the white field of St. Patrick's cross.

The Union Jack is technically described thus:—

The Union Flag shall be azure, the Crosses saltire of St. Andrew and St. Patrick quarterly per saltire, counter-changed, argent and gules, the latter fimbriated of the second, surmounted by the Cross of St. George of the third, fimbriated as the saltire—By order of the Council.

For the word "Jack," see JACK.

Unionists. The Liberal and Radical party opposed to Home Rule in Ireland which was formed in 1886, and in 1895 joined the Conservative government; so named by Lord Randolph Churchill. After the formation of the Coalition Ministry in 1915 and, still more, after the granting of Home Rule to Ireland (1914 and 1920), the name tended to become obsolete though the party has never been formally dissolved.

Unitarians. Christians who deny the doctrine of the Trinity, maintaining that God exists in one Person only. Many of the early heretical sects were unitarian in belief though not in name; and at the time of the Reformation Servetus, Hetzer (Switzerland), Palæologus, Segà (Italy), Flekwyk (Holland), the "Holy Maid of Kent" (England), Aikenhead (Scotland), Catherine Vogel (Poland), Dolet (France), and hundreds of others were put to death for holding this opinion.

The modern Unitarians in England ascribe their foundation to John Biddle (1615-62), and among the famous men who have belonged to the body are Dr. Samuel Clarke, Joseph Priestley, Dr. Lardner, James Martineau, Sir Edward Bowring, and Joseph Chamberlain.

United Kingdom. The name adopted on January 1st, 1801, when Great Britain and Ireland were united.

United States. The forty-eight States, and one Federal District, composing the Federal Republic. Thirteen of these are original States, and seven were admitted without previous organization as Territories.

The nickname of a United States man is a Yank, or Yankee (q.v.); of the people in the aggregate Brother Jonathan (q.v.); and of the Government Uncle Sam. See SAM.

Most of the States have an official abbreviation and a familiar nickname, as the Cotton State for Alabama, the Apache State, Arizona, etc. The following is a list of the States with their abbreviations and nicknames:—

Alabama (Ala.), Cotton.
 Arizona (Ariz.), Apache.
 Arkansas (Ark.), Wonder.

Unities, The Dramatic. See DRAMATIC.

Universal Doctor. Alain de Lille (1114-1203).

University. First applied to collegiate societies of learning in the 12th century, because the universitas literarum (entire range of literature) was taught in them—i.e. arts, theology, law, and physics, still called the "learned" sciences. Greek, Latin, grammar, rhetoric, and poetry are called humanity studies, or humaniores literę, meaning "lay" studies in contradistinction to divinity, which is the study of divine things.

The University Tests Act. An Act passed in 1871 abolishing in the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham subscriptions to the XXXIX Articles, all declarations and oaths concerning religious belief, and all compulsory attendance at public worship.

Unknown. The Great Unknown. Sir Walter Scott. So called (first by his publisher, James Ballantyne) because the Waverley Novels were published anonymously.

Unknown Warrior. The body of an unknown, and now unidentified, British soldier brought home from one of the battlefields of World War I and "buried among the kings" in Westminster Abbey. Several bodies of unknown soldiers were disinterred at random from battlefields of the Western Front; choice among these was again made at random, and one body was brought back to London to represent in splendid anonymity the 800,000 British warriors who fell in battle. On November 11th, 1920, the body was placed in the nave of the Abbey. Similar tombs are in the National Cemetery at Arlington, Virginia; beneath the Arc de Triomphe in Paris; and in the Unter den Linden, Berlin.

Unlearned Parliament, The. Henry IV's Parliament, which met at Coventry in 1404; so called by Sir Edward Coke because it contained no lawyers; hence also sometimes spoken of as the Lawless Parliament.

Unmentionables. One of the 19th-century prudish euphemisms for breeches, pantaloons, or trousers.

Corinthians and exquisites from Bond Street, sporting an eye-glass, . . . waiting-men in laced coats and plush unmentionables of yellow, green, blue, red, and all the primary colours.—REV. N. S. WHEATON: Journal (1830).

Unmerciful Parliament, The. Another name for the Wonderful Parliament (q.v.).

U.N.R.R.A. United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. An agency set up in U.S.A. in November, 1943, to help victims of World War II in liberated areas. Food, clothing, medicines, fuel, fertilizers, seeds, etc., were distributed by trained personnel and the administration also saw to the repatriation of millions of displaced persons. Its work having been largely completed by June, 1947, the Administration came to an end, passing over certain of its obligations to I.R.O. (International Refugee Organization) of United Nations.

Unready, The. Ethelred II, King of England 978-1016. So called because he was redeless, or deficient in counsel.

Ungrievous Bible, The. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Untouchables. The lowest caste in India, whose touch was believed to sully a high-caste Hindu. In 1948 such caste distinction was abolished, largely through influence of the teaching of Mahatma Gandhi.

Unwritten Law. Uncodified and unjudicial law which rests for its authority on the supposed right of the individual to take into his own hands the avenging of personal wrongs—especially sexual offences against his womenkind.

Up. The House is up. The business of the day is ended, and members of Parliament may go home.

A. B. is up. A. B. is actually making a speech in Parliament.

"Up Guards, and at them!" In his Fifteen Decisive Battles, Creasy states that the Duke of Wellington gave this order in the final charge at the battle of Waterloo. It is impossible to say on what he based this odd statement; it was not the Guards, but the 52nd Light Infantry which broke the column of the French Imperial Guard in the final charge.

Up country. Remote from the coast, in the interior. The term, which is common in America and Australia, is sometimes used in the derogatory sense of unsophisticated, or rustic.

Up stage. As a technical theatrical direction this means at the back of the stage, which in many theatres slopes down slightly to the footlights. Colloquially the phrase up-stage means aloof, putting on airs of consequence or superiority.

Up State. In the U.S.A. the part of a State furthest north or distant from the coast; the term is used more particularly of the northern parts of New York State.

Upper Ten, The. See TEN.

Upanishads (ū pān' śhādz). The oldest speculative literature of the Hindus, a collection of treatises on the nature of man and the universe, forming part of the Vedic writings, the earliest dating from about the 6th century B.C. The name is Sanskrit, and means "a sitting down (at another's feet)," hence "a confidential talk," "esoteric doctrine."

Upas Tree (ū' pās). The Javanese tree, Antiaris toxicaria, the milky juice of which contains a virulent poison and is used for tipping arrows.

Fable has it that a putrid steam rises from it, and that whatever the vapour touches dies. Foersch, a Dutch physician, wrote in 1783, "Not a tree, nor blade of grass is to be found in the valley or surrounding mountains. Not a beast or bird, reptile or living thing, lives in the vicinity." He adds that on "one occasion 1,600 refugees encamped within fourteen miles of it, and all but 300 died within two months." This "traveller's tale" has given rise to the figurative use of upas for a corrupting or pernicious influence.

Upsee. Used in combination with Dutch, Freeze, English, as jesting terms for drunk or tipping. Upsee Dutch is "in the manner of the Dutch," upsee Freeze, in the manner of a Frisian, etc.

Teach me how to take the German upsy freeze, the Danish rouser, the Switzer's stoop of Rhenish.—DEKKER: Gull's Hornbook (1609).

I do not like the dullness of your eye,
It hath a heavy cast; 'tis upsee-Dutch,
And says you are a lumpsish whoremaster.

BEN JONSON: The Alchemist, iv, 4.

Yet whoop, Barnaby! off with thy liquor,
Drink upsees out, and a fig for the vicar.

SCOTT: Lady of the Lake, vi, 5.

Upset Price. The price at which goods sold by auction are first offered for competition. If no advance is made they fall to the person who made the upset price. Reserved bid is virtually the same thing.

Urania (ū rā' nī ā). The Muse of Astronomy in Greek mythology, usually represented pointing at a celestial globe with a staff. Milton (Paradise Lost, vii, 1-20) makes her the spirit of the loftiest poetry, and calls her "heavenly born" (the name means "the heavenly one") and sister of Wisdom.

Where was Iorn Urania
When Adonais died? With veiled eyes,
'Mid listening Echoes, in her Paradise
She sate. SHELLEY: Adonais, ii.

Uranus (ū' rā nus). In Greek mythology the personification of Heaven; son and husband of Ge (the earth), and father of the Titans, the Cyclops, the Furies, etc. He hated his children and confined them in Tartarus; but they broke out (see TITANS) and his son Kronos dethroned him.

The planet Uranus was discovered in 1781 by Herschell, and named by him Georgium Sidus in honour of George III. Its four satellites are named Ariel, Umbriel, Titania, and Oberon.

Urbanists. See FRANCISCANS.

Urbi et Orbi (er' bi et ōr' bi) (Lat., To the city [Rome] and the world). A phrase applied to the solemn blessing publicly given by the pope from the balcony of St. Peter's on special occasions, such as his election. The custom fell into abeyance after 1870 but at his election on February 22nd, 1922, Pope Pius XI gave the blessing Urbi et Orbi from the façade of St. Peter's.

Urdu (ēr' dū). One of the most important dialects of India, spoken by the Moham-medans; so named from Hindu urdu-zaban, the language of the camp.

Ur-Hamlet. See HAMLET.

Uriah (û rî á). Letter of Uriah. A treacherous letter, importing friendship but in reality a death warrant. (See II Sam. xi, 15.)

Uriel (û rî èl). One of the seven archangels of rabbinical angelology, sent by God to answer the questions of Esdras (2 Esdras, iv). In Milton's Paradise Lost (iii, 690) he is the "Regent of the Sun," and "sharpest-sighted spirit of all in heaven."

Urim and Thummim (û rim, thûm' im). Two objects of uncertain form and material used in the early forms of ancient Hebrew worship, probably in connexion with divination and obtaining oracular answers from Jehovah. They are mentioned in Ex. xxviii, 30; 1 Sam. xxviii, 6; Deut. xxxiii, 8; Ezra ii, 63, etc., but fell out of use in post-exilic times, evidently through the Jews developing a higher conception of the Deity.

Ursa Major. The Great Bear, or Charles's Wain (q.v.), the most conspicuous of the northern constellations.

The legend is that Calisto, daughter of Lycaon, was violated by Jupiter. Juno changed her into a bear, and Jupiter placed her among the stars that she might be more under his protection. Homer calls it Arktos, the Bear, and Hamaxa, the Wagon. The Romans called it Ursa, the Bear, and Septemtriones, the Seven Ploughing Oxen; whence Septentrionalis came to signify the north.

Boswell's father used to call Dr. Johnson Ursa Major.

Ursa Minor. The Little Bear; the northern constellation known also as Cynosura, or "Dog's tail," from its circular sweep. The Pole Star is a in the tail. See CYNOSURE.

Ursula, St. Ursula was a Cornish princess and, as the story says, was going to France with eleven thousand companions when the galley was driven by adverse winds to Cologne, where they were all massacred by the Huns. Nothing at all is known of these maidens beyond the fact that they were martyrs at Cologne before the 4th century. Their number, "eleven thousand" is purely fabulous; early mediæval calendars vary between five and eleven—units, not thousands. The Roman Martyrology has on October 21st, "At Cologne, the birthday of SS. Ursula and her companions," etc.

Ursulines. An order of nuns founded by St. Angela Merici of Brescia about 1537, so called from their patron saint, St. Ursula. The chief work of the order is the education of girls.

Useless Parliament, The. The Parliament convened by Charles I, on June 18th, 1625; adjourned to Oxford, August 1st; and dissolved August 12th; having done nothing but offend the king.

Usher. From Fr. huissier, a door-keeper.

Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. See BLACK ROD.

Usher of the Green Rod. An officer in attendance on the Knights of the Thistle at their chapters.

Usquebaugh. Whisky (Ir. uisgebeatha, water of life). Similar to the Latin aqua vitæ, and the French eau de vie.

U.S.S.R. The initials of Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, in Russian S.S.S.R. (Soyuz Sovetskikh Sotsialisticheskikh Respublik), the government of Russia and Russian Asia that came into being after the revolution of 1917.

Uther (û' ther). A legendary king, or pen-dragon (q.v.), of the Britons; by an adulterous amour with Igerna (wife of Gorlois, Duke of Cornwall) he became the father of Arthur, who succeeded him.

Uti possidetis (û' ti pos i dē' tis) (Lat., as you at present possess them). The principle in international law that the belligerents are to retain possession of all the places taken by them before the treaty commenced.

Uticensis (û ti sen' sis). Cato the Younger was so called from Utica, the place of his death.

Utility. The name given during and after World War II to articles of wear, etc., the quality of which was sponsored by the Government. Utility goods were sold to the public at officially controlled prices.

Utilitarianism. The ethical doctrine that actions are right in proportion to their usefulness or as they tend to promote happiness; the doctrine that the end and criterion of public action is "the greatest happiness of the greatest number."

John Stuart Mill coined the word; but Jeremy Bentham, the official founder of the school, employed the word "Utility" to signify the doctrine which makes "the happiness of man" the one and only measure of right and wrong.

Utopia. Nowhere (Gr. ou, not, topos, a place). The name given by Sir Thomas More to the imaginary island in his political romance of the same name (1516), where everything is perfect—the laws, the morals, the politics, etc., and in which the evils of existing laws, etc., are shown by contrast. See COMMONWEALTHS, IDEAL.

This island has given us the adjective Utopian, applied to any highly desirable but impracticable scheme.

Rabelais (in Bk. II, ch. xxiv) sends Pantagruel and his companions to Utopia, where they find the citizens of its capital, Amaurot, most hospitable.

Utraquists (Lat. utraque specie, in both kinds). Another name for the Calixtines (q.v.), so called because they insisted that both the elements should be administered to all communicants in the Eucharist.

Utter and Inner Barristers. An utter or outer barrister means (in some cases at least) a full-fledged barrister, one licensed to practise. An inner barrister means a student.

Uzziel. One of the principal angels of rabbinical angelology, the name meaning "Strength of God." He was next in command to Gabriel, and in Milton's Paradise Lost (iv, 782) is commanded by Gabriel to "coast the south with strictest watch."

V

V. The twenty-second letter of the alphabet, formerly sharing its form with U (q.v.).

In the Roman notation it stands for 5, and represents ideographically the four fingers and thumb with the latter extended.

V-for Victory. On January 14th, 1941, M. Victor de Lavaleye, a member of the exiled Belgian government in London, proposed in a broadcast to Belgium that the letter V should be used as a simple substitute for the letters R.A.F. which were being chalked up on walls, etc., in Belgium. V had the advantage of standing for the word Victory in all Western European languages. The plan was immediately adopted and it soon became the most ambitious propaganda campaign of World War II. The Morse Code V (· · · —) was featured in every B.B.C. broadcast to Europe; this was followed by the use of the opening bar of Beethoven's 5th Symphony which has the same rhythm, "Colonel Britton" (Douglas E. Ritchie, director of the B.B.C. European news service) was responsible for this extensive and most powerful diffusion of the V-sign propaganda, which stiffened resistance and gave hope to the many thousands in bondage to the Germans. Winston Churchill popularized the sign of two up-raised fingers outspread in the form of a V.

V-1. Jet-propelled robot plane bomb sent against Britain by the Germans, June-August, 1944; subsequently sent by them against Antwerp. V = Vergeltungswaffe (Revenge weapon).

V-2. Jet-propelled rocket bomb, projected against England by the Germans in autumn, 1944.

V. D. M. I. Æ. Lat. Verbum Dei manet in æternum, i.e. the word of God endureth for ever. The inscription on the liveries of the servants of the Duke of Saxony and Landgrave of Hesse, the Lutheran princes, at the Diet of Spire in 1526.

V.E. Day. The end of hostilities in Europe after World War II, May 9th, 1945.

V.J. Day. The end of hostilities in the Far East, August 15th, 1945.

V-Mail (World War II). Reduced photostats of letters to and from soldiers overseas and their families, to save shipping space.

Vacuum (Lat. vacare, to be empty). A space from which air has been expelled. Descartes remarked, "If a vacuum could be effected in a vessel, the sides would be pressed into contact."

Nature abhors a vacuum. Galileo's way of accounting for the rise of water in pumps. See TORRICELLI.

Vade mecum (vā' de mē' kūm) (Lat., go-with-me). A pocket-book, memorandum-book, pocket cyclopædia, lady's pocket companion, or anything else which contains many things of daily use in a small compass.

Væ Victis! (væ vik' tis) (Lat.) Woe to the vanquished! So much the worse for the conquered! This was the exclamation of Brennus, the Gaulish chief, on throwing his sword into the balance as a make-weight, when determining the price of peace with Rome (390 B.C.).

Vagabond. An idle, disreputable person who wanders about from place to place without any settled home (late Lat. vagabundas, from vagari, to wander). Under the Vagrancy Act (1824) the term is applied to such as sleep out without visible means of subsistence. Cp. ROGUE.

Vail. To lower; to cast down. From Fr. avalere, to descend.

The time is come
That France must vail her lofty plumed crest.
1 Henry VI, v, 3.

Vails, an obsolete term for a tip given to servants by visitors or for a bribe, is from Fr. valoir, Lat. valere, to be worth.

2 Fish.: Ay, but hark you, my friend; 'twas we that made up this garment through the rough seams of the water; there are certain condolements, certain vails. I hope, sir, if you thrive, you'll remember from whence you had it.

Per.: Believe it, I will.—Pericles, ii, 1.

Vale! Farewell! 2nd pers. sing. imp. of Lat. valere, to be worth, or to fare well.

I thought once againe heare to have made an ende, with a heartie Vale of the best fashion.—SPENSER: Letter to Gabriel Harvey (1580).

Ave atque vale! Hail and farewell; the words of Catullus at his brother's tomb.

Valentine. Valentine, St. A priest of Rome who was imprisoned for succouring persecuted Christians. He became a convert himself, and although he restored the sight of his gaoler's blind daughter he was martyred by being clubbed to death (February 14th, 269).

St. Valentine's Day. February 14th, the day when, according to ancient tradition, the birds choose their mates for the year. Chaucer refers to this (Parliament of Foules, 309), as also does Shakespeare:—

Good morrow, friends! St. Valentine is past;
Begin these wood-birds but to couple now?
Midsummer Night's Dream, iv, 1.

It was an old custom in England to draw lots for lovers on this day, the person drawn being the drawer's valentine, and given a present, sometimes of an expensive kind, but oftener of a pair of gloves. The valentine is now frequently represented by a greeting card of a sentimental, humorous, or merely vulgar character.

If I stood affected that way [i.e., to marriage] I would choose my wife as men do Valentines—blind-fold, or draw cuts for them; for so I shall not be deceived in the choosing.—CHAPMAN: Monsieur d'Olive, I (1605).

The custom is said to have had its origin in a pagan practice connected with the worship of Juno on or about this day.

Valentine and Orson. An old French romance, connected with the Alexander cycle.

The heroes—from whom it is named—were the twin sons of Bellisant, sister of King Pepin and Alexander, and were born in a forest near Orleans. Orson (q.v.) was carried off by a bear, and became a wild man. While the mother was searching for him Valentine was carried off by his uncle, the king. Each had many adventures, but all ended happily, and Valentine married Clerimond, sister of the Green Knight, while Orson married a daughter of the Duke of Aquitaine.

Valhalla. In Scandinavian mythology, the hall in the celestial regions whither the souls of heroes slain in battle were borne by the Valkyries, to spend eternity in joy and feasting (valr, the slain, and hall).

Hence the name is applied to buildings, such as Westminster Abbey, used as the last resting-place of a nation's great men.

Valkyries, The (vål kir' iz, vål kir' iz, vål' kɪ riz) (Old Norse, The Choosers of the Slain). The twelve nymphs of Valhalla, who, mounted on swift horses, and holding drawn swords, rushed into the mêlée of battle and selected those destined to death. These heroes they conducted to Valhalla, where they waited upon them and served them with mead and ale in the skulls of the vanquished. The chief were Mista, Sangrida, and Hilda.

Vallary Crown. The same as a mural crown (see under CROWN).

Valley Forge. A village in south Pennsylvania where George Washington set up the winter quarters of his army, amid great privations, in the campaign of 1777-78.

Vallombrosa (vål om brō' zå). Milton says, "Thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks in Vallombrosa" (Paradise Lost, i, 302). The name, meaning Shady Valley, comes from the great woods of fir, chestnut, and beech that have long made Vallombrosa one of the most popular summer resorts in N. Italy. Nearby are La Verna and other places associated with St. Francis.

Vamana. See AVATAR.

Vamoose (vå moos'). A slang word (deriving from the Spanish vamos, let us go) meaning to decamp, to make off hurriedly.

Vamp. To vamp up an old story, to refurbish it; to vamp an accompaniment to a song, to improvise as one goes along.

To vamp is properly to put new uppers to old boots; and vamps were short hose covering the feet and ankles (Fr. avant-pied, the forepart of the foot).

Another verb To vamp (derived from Vampire (q.v.)) means to flirt outrageously or allure with the intent of gaining some personal end.

Vampire. A fabulous being, supposed to be the ghost of a heretic, excommunicated person, or criminal, that returns to the world at night in the guise of a monstrous bat and sucks the blood of sleeping persons who, usually, become vampires themselves.

But first on earth, as vampire sent,
Thy corpse shall from the tomb be rent,
Then ghastly haunt thy native place
And suck the blood of all thy race.

BYRON. The Giaour.

The word is applied to one who preys upon his fellows—a "blood-sucker."

One of the classics of English horror-romances, Dracula (1897) by Bram Stoker was centred on vampires.

Vandals. A Teutonic race from the Baltic (allied to the Wends, i.e. Wanderers), which in the 5th century A.D. ravaged Gaul and, under Genseric, captured Rome and despoiled it of its treasures of art, literature, and civilization generally.

The name is hence applied to those who wilfully or ignorantly destroy works of art, etc.

Vandyke (vån dīk'). To scallop an edge after the fashion of the collars painted by Van Dyck in the reign of Charles I. The scalloped edges are said to be vandyked.

Vandyke beard. A pointed beard such as those frequently shown in Van Dyck's portraits, especially of Charles I.

Vanessa (vå nes' å). Dean Swift's name for his friend and correspondent, Esther Vanhomrigh, made by compounding Van, the first syllable of her surname, with Essa, the pet form of Esther. Swift called himself Cadenus, an anagram on Decanus (Lat. for Dean).

Vanguard. See AVANT-GARDE.

Vanity Fair. In Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, a fair established by Beelzebub, Apollyon, and Legion, in the town of Vanity, and lasting all the year round. Here were sold houses, lands, trades, places, honours, preferments, titles, countries, kingdoms, lusts, pleasures, and delights of all sorts.

Thackeray adopted the name for the title of his novel (1847) satirizing the weaknesses and follies of human nature.

Vantage Loaf. The thirteenth loaf of a baker's dozen.

Varaha. See AVATAR.

'Varsity. A shortened form of university; but, in England, properly used only of Oxford or Cambridge.

Varuna. The Hindu Neptune. He is represented as an old man rising on a sea monster, with a club in one hand and a rope in the other. In the Vedic hymns he is the night sky, and Mitra the day sky. Varuna is said to set free the "waters of the clouds."

Vassal (vås' ål). A man in the feudal system who held his land with the obligation of rendering military service to his superior: hence the term was extended to include a servant or even a slave.

Vathek (våth' ek). The hero of Beckford's oriental romance of the same name (1784). The ninth caliph of the Abbasside dynasty, he is a haughty, effeminate monarch, induced by a malignant genius to commit all sorts of crimes. He abjures his faith, and offers allegiance to Eblis, under the hope of obtaining the throne of the pre-Adamite sultans. This he gained, only to find that it was a place of torture and that he was doomed to remain in it for ever.

Vatican (våt' i kån). The palace of the Pope; so called because it stands on the Vaticanus Mons (Vatican Hill) of ancient Rome, which got its name through being the headquarters of the vaticinatores, or soothsayers.

The City of the Vatican is the area of Rome recognized by the Treaty of the Lateran (1929) as constituting the territorial extent of the temporal power of the Holy See. Strictly speaking, the Vatican consists of the Papal palace, the court and garden of Belvidere, the library, and the museum, the Piazza of St. Peter, and contiguous buildings, in all an area of just under a square mile. Its population is about 500, of whom a number are clerics, and all male adults are in some way engaged in the immediate service of the Church. Under the pope it is governed by a layman.

The Council of the Vatican. The twenty-first Ecumenical Council (q.v.), opened at the Vatican in 1870 under Pius IX and not yet officially concluded.

The Thunders of the Vatican. See THUNDER.

Vaudeville (vöd'vil). A corruption of Val de Vire, or in O.Fr. Vau de Vire, the native valley of Oliver Basselin, a Norman poet (d. 1418), author of convivial songs, which he called after the name of his birthplace. It is now applied to a variety entertainment.

Vaudois. See WALDESIANS (cp. VODOO).

Vauxhall (vawks'awl). A part of Lambeth, London; so called from Falkes (or Fulkes) de Breauté, who was lord of the manor in the early 13th century.

Vauxhall Gardens. A very popular pleasure resort for Londoners, from 1661, when it was opened, till 1859. Pepys, who calls it Fox Hall, says the entertainments there are "mighty divertising"; and for the next two centuries its attractions and diversions furnished many writers and artists with incidents and scenes for their works.

Vedas or Vedams. The four sacred books of the Brahmans, comprising (1) the Rig or Rish Veda; (2) Yajur Veda; (3) the Sama Veda; and (4) the Atharva Veda. The first consists of prayers and hymns in verse, the second of prayers in prose, the third of prayers for chanting, and the fourth of formulas for consecration, imprecation, expiation, etc.

The word Veda means knowledge.

Vegetarianism. A movement which aims at making vegetable foods the sole diet of human beings. It began about 1850, although it had had many isolated adherents or sects throughout the preceding centuries. Strict vegetarians (sometimes called Vegas) abstain from all food which comes from animals, such as milk, eggs, butter, cheese, etc. Akin to vegetarians are fruitarians who maintain life solely on fruit.

Vehmgerichte (väm'ge rich te). Courts of justice, or tribunals, held in Germany (especially Westphalia) from about the 12th to the 16th centuries, for the preservation of public peace, suppression of crime, and maintenance of the Catholic religion. In all serious cases, such as heresy, witchcraft, or murder, the sentence was death, and the proceedings were conducted in absolute secrecy; the judges were enveloped in profound mystery; they had their secret spies through all Germany; their judgments were certain, but no one could discover the executioner.

Velocipede (velos'i päd). An early form of bicycle, introduced about 1819. It consisted of two wheels connected by a bar on which was the rider's seat. Thus placed, with his feet touching the ground, he propelled himself along by the alternate thrust of each foot upon the ground. A later development was the introduction of treadles operating directly on cranks on the axle of the front wheel.

Velvet. On velvet. On a sure thing; certain of success. One who makes a bet that he is bound to win is said to be "on velvet."

To prophesy upon velvet. To prophesy what is already a known fact.

Vendée, War of La (la von' dā). The rising of royalists against the French Republic in 1793-5 in La Vendée, a Department of western France, and Brittany. It was followed by the War of the Chouans (see CHOUAN), which was finally suppressed by Napoleon in 1800.

Vendémiaire (von dā mē ār). The first month in the French Republican calendar; from September 22nd to October 21st. The word means "Vintage."

Vendetta (ven det' à) (Lat. vindicta, revenge). The blood-feud, or duty of the nearest kin of a murdered man to kill the murderer. It prevailed in Corsica, Sicily, Sardinia, and Calabria, and in principle is not yet extinct.

Vendue (U.S.A.). A word of obvious French origin meaning an auction sale, used from about the mid-18th century to the mid-19th century.

Venerable (Lat. venerabilis, worthy of honour). The title applied to archdeacons in formally addressing them ("The Venerable the Archdeacon of Barse", or "The Venerable Archdeacon Brown"); and also, in the Roman Catholic Church, the title of one who has attained the first of the three degrees of canonization.

It specially belongs to Bede—the Venerable Bede—the monk of Jarrow, an English ecclesiastical historian (d. 735), and to William of Champeaux (d. 1121), the French scholastic philosopher and opponent of Abelard.

Veneralia. See VENUS (Venus Verticordia).

Veni, Creator Spiritus (vā nē krā a tōr spē' ri tūs) (Lat., "Come Creator Spirit"). A hymn of the Roman Breviary ascribed to both Charlemagne and Pope Gregory I. It is, however, probably the work of Rabanus Maurus, in the early 9th century. It is sung at Vespers and Terce during Pentecost and on numerous occasions such as the consecration of a bishop, dedication of a church, etc.

Veni, Sancte Spiritus (Lat., "Come, Holy Spirit"). A mediæval Latin hymn, used as a sequence at Pentecost in the Roman Church.

Veni, vidi, vici (Lat., "I came, I saw, I conquered"). According to Plutarch it was thus that Julius Cæsar announced to his friend Amintus his victory at Zela (47 B.C.), in Asia Minor, over Pharnaces, son of Mithridates, who had rendered aid to Pompey.

Suetonius, however, says that the words were displayed before his title after his victories in Pontus, and does not ascribe them to Cæsar himself.

They are often used as an example of laconism, extreme concision.

Venial Sin. One that may be pardoned; one that does not forfeit grace. In the Catholic Church sins are of two sorts, mortal and venial (Lat. venia, grace, pardon). See Matt. xii, 31.

Venice Glass. The drinking-glasses of the Middle Ages, made at Venice, were said to break into shivers if poison were put into them.

Doge: 'Tis said that our Venetian crystal has Such pure antipathy to poison, as

To burst, if aught of venom touches it.

BYRON: The Two Foscari, v, 1.

Venice glass, from its excellency, became a synonym for perfection.

Venire facias. A writ directing the sheriff to assemble a jury. So called from its opening Latin words—"Cause to come."

Venison. Anything taken in hunting or by the chase. Hence Jacob bids Esau to go and get venison such as he loved (Gen. xxvii, 3), meaning the wild kid. The word is the Latin venatio, hunting, but is now restricted to the flesh of deer.

Venner's Plot. A plot made by the Fifth Monarchy Men under Thomas Venner to seize Whitehall in 1661, during the absence of Charles II. The plot failed, and Venner and many of his followers were put to death.

Venom. The venom is in the tail. The real difficulty is the conclusion. The allusion is to the scorpion, which has a sting in its tail.

Ventose (von' tōz) (Fr., windy). The sixth month of the French Revolutionary calendar. February 19th to March 20th.

Ventre-saint-Gris (vontr sāng grē). The usual oath of Henri IV of France, Gris being a euphemism for Christ, and ventre, stomach. Oaths not infrequently took this form of blasphemy—God's nails, God's teeth, etc., were common in England.

A similar oath is Par le ventre de Dieu. Rabelais has Par saint Gris; and the suggestion has been made that the allusion was to Francis of Assisi, who was ceint (girdled) and clad in gris (grey).

Ventriloquism. The trick of producing vocal sounds so that they appear to come, not from the person producing them, but from some other quarter. So called from Lat. venter, belly, loqui, to speak (speaking from the belly), with the erroneous notion that the voice of the ventriloquist proceeded from his stomach.

Venus (v8' nus). The Roman goddess of beauty and sensual love, identified with the Aphrodite (q.v.) of the Greeks. She is said in some accounts to have sprung from the foam of the sea, but in others to have been the daughter of Jupiter and Dione. Vulcan was her husband, but she had amours with Mars and many other gods and demi-gods; by Mercury she was the mother of Cupid, and by the hero Anchises the mother of Æneas, through whom she was regarded by the Romans as the foundress of their race. Her chief festival was April 1st (see VENUS VERTICORDIA, below).

Her name is given to the second planet from the sun, and in astrology "signifieth the white men or browne . . . joyfull, laughter, liberal, pleasers, dauncers, entertayners of women, players, perfumers, musitions, messengers of love."

Venus loveth ryot and dispense.

CHAUCER: Wife of Bath's Prol., 700.

By the alchemists copper was designated Venus, probably because mirrors were anciently made of copper. A mirror is still the astronomical symbol of the planet Venus.

The best cast at dice (three sixes) used to be called Venus, and the worst (three aces) Canis (dog); hence the phrase, "My Venus has turned out a whelp," equivalent to "all my swans are geese."

Venus Anadyomene. Venus rising from the sea, accompanied by dolphins. The name is given to the famous lost painting by Apelles, and to that by Botticelli in the Accademia delle Belle Arti at Florence.

Venus Callipyge (Gr., with the beautiful buttocks). The name given to a late Greek statue in the Museo Nazionale at Naples. There is no real ground for connecting the statue with Venus.

Venus de Medici. A famous statue, since 1860 in the Uffizzi Gallery, Florence, ranking as a canon of female beauty. It is supposed to date from the time of Augustus, and was dug up in the 17th century in the villa of Hadrian, near Tivoli, in eleven pieces. It was kept in the Medici Palace at Rome till its removal to Florence by Cosimo III.

Venus Genetrix (Lat., she that produces). Venus worshipped as a symbol of marriage and motherhood. There are several statues of this name, she being represented as raising her light drapery and holding an apple—the emblem of fecundity.

Venus of Cnidus. The nude statue of Praxiteles, purchased by the ancient Cnidians, who refused to part with it, although Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, offered to pay off their national debt as its price. It was subsequently removed to Constantinople, and perished in the great fire during the reign of Justinian (A.D. 532); but an ancient reproduction is in the Vatican.

Venus of Milo, or Melos. This statue, with three of Hermes, was discovered in 1820 by Admiral Dumont in Milo or Melos, one of the Greek islands. It dates from about 400 B.C., and is probably the finest single work of ancient art extant. It now stands in the Louvre.

Venus Verticordia. A temple was founded at Rome on April 1st, 114 B.C., to Venus Verticordia as expiation for the loss of their virginity by three of the Vestal Virgins. April 1st thus became the Veneralia, or chief festival of Venus.

Venus Victrix. Venus, as goddess of victory, represented on numerous Roman coins.

Venus's hair-stone, or pencil. Rock-crystal or quartz penetrated by acicular crystals of rutile which show through as hair-like filaments.

Venusberg. The Horselberg, or mountain of delight and love, situated between Eisenach and Gotha, in the caverns of which, according to mediæval German legend, the Lady Venus held her court. Human beings were occasionally permitted to visit her, as Heinrich von Limburg did, and the noble Tannhäuser (q.v.); but as such persons ran the risk of eternal perdition, Eckhardt the Faithful, who sat before the gate, failed not to warn them against entering.

Vera causa (vē' rā kaw' zà) (Lat., a true cause). A cause in harmony with other causes already known. A fairy godmother may be assigned in story as the cause of certain marvellous effects, but is not a vera causa. The revolution of the earth round the sun may be assigned as the cause of the four seasons, and is a vera causa.

Verb. sap. (Lat. verbum sapienti, a word to the wise). A hint is sufficient to any wise man.

Verb. sat. (Lat. verbum satienti, a word is enough). Similar to the above. A word to the wise is enough.

Verbatim et literatim (Lat.). Accurately rendered, "word for word and letter for letter."

Verdant Green. An excessively "green" or unsophisticated young man. The character was epitomized in the book of this name (1860) by "Cuthbert Bede" (Rev. Edward Bradley). Verdant's adventures at Oxford, whither he goes as a very green young undergraduate, the victim of endless practical jokes and impostures, make an entertaining and enlightening commentary on life at the University in the 1850s.

Verderer. In English forest law an official of the Crown having jurisdiction in the Royal Forests, with especial charge of the trees and undergrowth.

Vere adeptus (Lat., one who has truly attained). One admitted to the fraternity of the Rosicrucians.

In Rosycrucian lore as learned
As he the Vere-adeptus earned.

BUTLER: Hudibras.

Verger. The beadle in a church who carries the rod or staff, which was formerly called the verge (Lat. virga, a rod).

Vergil. See VIRGIL.

Veronica, St. (ve ron' i ká). A late mediæval legend says that a maiden handed her handkerchief to our Lord on His way to Calvary. He wiped the sweat from His brow, returned the handkerchief to the owner, and went on. The handkerchief was found to bear a perfect likeness of the Saviour, and was called Vera-Icon (true likeness); the maiden became St. Veronica. It is one of the relics preserved in St. Peter's, Rome. In Spanish bull-fighting the most classic movement with the cape is called the Veronica, the cape being swung so slowly before the face of the charging bull that it resembles St. Veronica's wiping of the Holy Face.

Vers de société (Fr., Society verse). Light poetry of a witty or fanciful kind, generally with a slight vein of social satire running through it.

Versailles (vâr sî'). The great palace built by Louis XIV in the town of that name to the NNW. of Paris. The palace had been actually begun by Louis XIII, but the great enlargement was started in 1661 that made of Versailles the greatest palace in Europe. The splendours of the palace and grounds and the part it has played in French history make brief description impossible. Some of the royal and other apartments are kept in their original condition, but much of the palace is used as a national museum of French history. The first constitution of Germany was signed in the famous Galerie des Glaces in 1871, when the Prussians were in occupation. And in the same hall was also drawn up The Treaty of Versailles, the treaty made after World War I between the Allied states, 26 in number, on the one part, and Germany on the other. Its articles included the formation of the League of Nations, the cession of Alsace and Lorraine to France, of Posen and West Prussia to Poland, the prohibition of Germany possessing submarines, a military, naval, or air force beyond certain limits, and the occupation of the country for a certain period by Allied troops. As time went on most of these conditions were evaded, but the injustice of the Treaty of Versailles formed a never-failing subject for Adolf Hitler's fury and invective. The Treaty was signed on June 28th, 1919 and ratified on January 10th, 1920. China declined to sign, and the U.S.A. senate rejected it.

Versi Berneschi. See BERNESQUE.

Vert (vērt). The heraldic (from French) term for green, said to signify love, joy, and abundance; in engravings it is indicated by lines running diagonally across the shield from right to left.

Vertumnus (vēr tūm' nus). The ancient Roman god of the seasons, and the deity presiding over gardens and orchards. He was the husband of Pomona. August 12th was his festival.

Vervain (vēr' vān). Called "holy herb," from its use in ancient sacred rites. Also called "pigeons' grass," "Juno's tears," and "simpler's joy." Supposed to cure scrofula, the bite of rabid animals, to arrest the diffusion of poison, to avert antipathies, to conciliate friendships, and to be a pledge of mutual good faith; hence it was anciently worn by heralds and ambassadors.

Verbena is its botanical name.

Vesica Piscis (ves' i ka pis' is) (Lat., fish-bladder). The ovoidal frame or glory which, in the 12th century, was much used, especially in painted windows, to surround pictures of the Virgin Mary and of our Lord. It is meant to represent a fish, from the anagram ΙΧΘΥΣ (q.v.).

Vespers. The sixth of the seven canonical hours in the Greek and Roman Churches; sometimes also used of the Evening Service in the English Church. From Lat. vesperus, the evening, cognate with Hesperus (q.v.), Gr. Hesperos, the evening star.

The Fatal Vespers. October 26th, 1623. A congregation of some 300 had assembled in a small gallery over the gateway of the French ambassador, in Blackfriars, to hear Father Drury, a Jesuit, preach. The gallery gave way, and Drury with another priest and about 100 of the congregation were killed. This accident was attributed to God's judgment against the Jesuits.

The Sicilian Vespers. See SICILIAN.

Vesta. The virgin goddess of the hearth in Roman mythology, corresponding to the Greek Hestia, one of the twelve great Olympians. She was custodian of the sacred fire brought by Æneas from Troy, which was never permitted to go out lest a national calamity should follow.

Wax matches are named from her.

Vestals. The six spotless virgins who tended the sacred fire brought by Æneas from Troy and preserved by the state in a sanctuary in the Forum at Rome. They were subjected to very severe discipline, and in the event of losing their virginity were buried alive.

Other duties of the Vestal Virgins were to prepare from the first fruits of the May harvest the sacrificial meal for the Lupercalia, the Vestalia, and the Ides of September.

The word vestal has been figuratively applied to any woman of spotless chastity. Thus, Shakespeare calls Elizabeth I—

A fair vestal, throned by the west.

Midsummer Night's Dream, ii, 1.

See also VENUS VERTICORDIA.

Veteran. Whereas in Britain this word is applied only to soldiers, etc., who have had long service under arms, in the U.S.A. one who has had any service or experience in some field of warfare, however brief or casual, is termed a veteran.

Veto (vē' tō) (Lat., I forbid). Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette were called Monsieur and Madame Veto by the Republicans, because the Constituent Assembly (1791) allowed the king to have the power of putting his veto upon any decree submitted to him and he abused it.

The power exercised by the head of a state to annul or negative a law or ordinance passed by a lower body; in brief, the right to say "No."

Vexillum (veks il' ūm) (Lat., a standard). The standard borne by troops of the Roman army. In particular it was the red flag flown on the general's tent as a signal for marching or for battle.

Via. A way (Lat. via). Our use of the word, as in I'll go via Chester, i.e. "by way of Chester," is via, the ablative of via.

Via Appia. The Appian Way (q.v.).

Via Dolorosa. The way our Lord went from the Mount of Olives to Golgotha, about a mile in length.

Via Lactea. The Milky Way (q.v.).

Via Sacra, the street in ancient Rome where Romulus and Tatius (the Sabine) swore mutual alliance. It does not mean the "holy street," but the "street of the oath."

Vial. Vials of wrath. Vengeance, the execution of wrath on the wicked. The allusion is to the seven angels who pour out upon the earth their vials full of wrath (Rev. xvi).

Viaticum (Lat.). The Eucharist administered to the dying. The word means "provision for a journey" and its application is obvious.

Vicar. A parish priest who receives a stipend, the tithes belonging to a chapter, religious house, layman, etc. (cp. CLERICAL TITLES). At the Reformation the rectorial offices and tithes of many parishes hitherto administered by the religious orders, were granted to laymen, colleges, etc., who were under obligation of appointing vicars to perform the sacred offices.

Lay vicar. A cathedral officer who sings those portions of the liturgy not reserved for the clergy. Formerly called a clerk vicar.

Vicar apostolic. In the Roman Catholic Church, a titular bishop appointed to a place where no episcopate has been established, or where the succession has been interrupted. From 1623 until 1850 the Roman Catholic Church in England was governed by vicars apostolic. The term formerly denoted a bishop to whom the Pope delegated some part of his jurisdiction.

Vicar choral. One of the minor clergy, or a layman, attached to a cathedral for singing certain portions of the service.

Vicar forane. A priest appointed by a Roman Catholic bishop to exercise limited (usually disciplinary) jurisdiction in a particular part of his diocese.

Vicar-General. An ecclesiastical functionary assisting a bishop or archbishop in his visitations, etc.

The Vicar of Bray. A semi-legendary vicar of Bray, Berkshire, who, between 1520 and 1560, was twice a Papist and twice a Protestant in successive reigns. His name has been given as Symonds, Alleyne, and Pendelton, and his date transferred to the time of Charles II. Historically nothing is known of him; the well-known song is said to have been written in Restoration times by an officer in Colonel Fuller's regiment.

Brome says of Simon Alleyne that he "lived in the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, Mary, and Elizabeth. In the first two reigns he was Protestant, in Mary's reign he turned Papist, and in the next reign recanted—being resolved, whoever was king, to die Vicar of Bray."

The Vicar of Christ. A title given to the Pope, in allusion to his claim to be the representative of Christ on earth.

The Vicar of Hell. A name playfully given by Henry VIII to John Skelton, his "poet laureate," perhaps because Skelton was rector of Diss, in Norfolk, the pun being on Dis (q.v.). Milton refers to the story in his Areopagitica:—

I name not him for posterity's sake, whom Henry the Eighth named in merriment his vicar of hell.

Vice. The buffoon in the old English moralities. He wore a cap with ass's ears, and was generally named after some particular vice, as Gluttony, Pride, etc.

Vice versa (vī' si vēr' sâ) (Lat., vicis, change, versa, turned). The reverse; the terms of the case being reversed.

Vicegerent (vis jer' ént). An official deputed by the head of the state to exercise that ruler's powers and authority. The word is often confused with a vice-regent, who is, as the term implies, a deputy regent, or one who acts for a regent when he is unable by illness or from some other cause to exercise his powers.

Vichy (vish' i). A little town in the Department of Allier, in central France, formerly fashionable on account of its thermal and medicinal springs. The name of Vichy will, however, be remembered in future as the seat of government set up by Marshal Pétain after the fall of France, in June, 1940. By the armistice of July 10th France was divided into two zones, one occupied by the Germans, the other unoccupied and a totalitarian state under the rule of Pétain. On the landing of the Allies in North Africa in the autumn of 1942 the Germans declared the whole country to be in danger of invasion and seized the excuse to occupy the soi-disant independent zone of France.

Vicious Circle. A chain of circumstances, in which the solving of a problem creates a new problem which makes the original problem more difficult of solution.

In logic, the fallacy of proving one statement by another which itself rests on the first for proof.

Victoria Cross. A decoration for "conspicuous bravery or devotion to the country in the presence of the enemy." The decoration was instituted by Queen Victoria in 1856, the design being a Maltese cross of bronze, with a scroll underneath bearing the words "For Valour." It is worn on the left breast, suspended by a red ribbon and takes precedence of all other decorations. Until 1942 the crosses were made from the metal of guns captured by the British at Sevastopol. Well over a thousand Crosses have been awarded. Only three men have won a bar to the V.C.

Victory Medal. A bronze medal with a double rainbow ribbon, awarded to Allied soldiers who served in a field of war in World War I.

Victrola (U.S.A.). Although the trade name of a certain make of phonograph (gramophone) the word is frequently used for any type of that instrument.

View Holloa. The shout of huntsmen when a fox breaks cover—"Gone away!" Cp. SOHO; TALLY-HO.

Vigilance Committee. A privately formed body of citizens taking upon themselves to assist in the maintenance of law and order in their town. The Southern States citizens sometimes form themselves into Vigilance Committees for the purpose of intimidating Negroes. During the Civil War (1861-65) they also strove to suppress the activities of loyalists to the Northern cause. Members of these committees are called Vigilantes.

Vignette (vi nyet). An engraving, especially on the title-page of a book, that is not enclosed within a border; properly, a likeness having a border of vine-leaves round it (Fr., little vine, tendril).

Viking (vik' ing, vī' king). A Norse pirate of about the 8th to 10th centuries A.D.; probably so called from Icel. vig, war, cognate with Lat. vincere, to conquer. The word is not connected with king. There were sea-kings, sometimes, but erroneously, called "vikings," connected with royal blood, and having small dominions on the coast, who were often viking or vikings, but the reverse is not true that every viking or pirate was a sea-king.

Villain means simply one attached to a villa or farm (late Lat. villanus, a farm-servant, from villa, a farm). In feudal times the lord was the great landowner, and under him were a host of tenants called villains (sometimes spelt villein, to differentiate this from the modern meaning). The highest class of villains were called regardant, and were annexed to the manor; then came the Coliberti or Bures, who were privileged vassals; then the Bordarii or cottagers (A.S. bord, a cottage), who rendered certain menial offices to their lord for rent; then the Coscets, Cottarii, and Cotmanni, who paid partly in produce and partly in menial service; and, lastly, the villains in gross, who were annexed to the person of the lord, and might be sold or transferred as chattels. The notion of wickedness and worthlessness associated with the word is simply the effect of aristocratic pride and exclusiveness.

I am no villain; I am the youngest son of Sir Rowland de Boys; he was my father, and he is thrice a villain that says such a father begot villains.—As You Like It, I, i, 1.

Vim. Slang for energy, force, "go." The accusative of Lat. vis, strength.

Vin. (Fr., wine).

Vin de Goutte. The last pressing of grapes, yielding an inferior wine.

Vin de Paille. A sweet wine from the Jura, made from grapes dried on straw before pressing.

Vin Gris. A cheap wine made in eastern France by mixing red and white grapes.

Vin ordinaire. A cheap wine served in restaurants when no style or mark is asked for.

Vin Rosé. Pink wine made in France by one of three methods; by mixing red and white grapes; by colouring white wine with cochineal; or from black grapes the skins of which are not left to ferment in the wine.

Vintage. Gathering of grapes. The year in which a certain wine was made. Since good vintages are more generally remembered, "a vintage year" has become a phrase descriptive of a year notable in any walk of life.

Vinaigret (vin à gret'). A small bottle, usually delicately ornamented, containing aromatic vinegar, smelling salts, etc., in use among women when fainting was a more common expression of emotion.

Vinayapitaka. See TRIPITAKA.

Vincent, St. A deacon of Saragossa, martyred in the Dacian persecution, 304, and commemorated on January 22nd. He is a patron saint of drunkards, for no apparent reason; an old rhyme says:—

If on St. Vincent's Day the sky is clear
More wine than water will crown the year.

Vincentian. A Lazarist (q.v.), a member of the order of Lazarites, founded by St. Vincent de Paul in the 17th century.

Vine. The Rabbis say that the fiend buried a lion, a lamb, and a hog at the foot of the first vine planted by Noah; and that hence men receive from wine ferocity, mildness, or wallowing in the mire.

Vinegar. Livy tells us that when Hannibal led his army over the Alps to enter Rome he used vinegar to dissolve the snow, and make the march less slippery. Nepos has left a short memoir of Hannibal, but says nothing about the vinegar. (Livy, 59 B.C. to A.D. 17; Nepos about the same time; Hannibal, 247-183 B.C.).

The Vinegar Bible. See BIBLE SPECIALLY NAMED.

Vinegar Joe. World War II nickname of General Joseph W. Stilwell, U.S. Commander of troops in China.

Vineyard Controversy. A paper was provoked by Daines Barrington (1727-1800), a well-known lawyer, naturalist, and antiquary, who entered the lists to overthrow all chroniclers and antiquaries from William of Malmesbury to Samuel Pegge, respecting the vineyards of Domesday Book. He maintained that the vines were currants, and the vineyards currant gardens.

Vinland. The name given in the old Norse Sagas to a portion of the coast of North America discovered by wanderers from Denmark or Iceland about the opening of the 11th century. There have been many conjectures as to the locality, but scholars incline to the opinion that it was in or near Mount Hope Bay, Rhode Island, and got its old name because of grape-vines found growing there.

Vino (vi' nō). In vino veritas (Lat.). In wine is truth, meaning when persons are more or less intoxicated they utter many things they would at other times conceal or disguise.

Vintage. See VIN.

Vintry Ward (London). So called from the site occupied by the Vintners or wine-merchants from Bordeaux, who anciently settled on this part of the Thames bank. They landed their wines here, and, till the 28th Edw. I, were obliged to sell what they landed within forty days.

Vinum Theologicum (vi' num thē ō loj' i kum). An old term for the best wine obtainable. Holinshed (i, 282) says it was so called because religious men would be sure "neither to drinke nor be served of the worst, or such as was anie waies vined by the vintner; naie, the merchant would have thought that his soule would have gone straightwaie to the devil if he would have served them with other than the best."

Violet. A flower, nowadays usually taken as the type of modesty, but fabled by the ancients to have sprung from the blood of the boaster Ajax.

The colour indicates the love of truth and the truth of love. For ecclesiastical and symbolical uses, see COLOURS.

In "flower language" the violet is emblematical of innocence, and Ophelia says in Hamlet that the King, the Queen, and even Hamlet himself, now he has killed Polonius, are unworthy of this symbol.

Corporal Violet. Napoleon Bonaparte; because when banished to Elba he told his friends he would return with the violets. "Corporal Violet" became a favourite toast of his partisans, and when he reached Fréjus a gang of women assembled with violets, which were freely sold. The shibboleth was, "Do you like violets?" If the answer given was "Oui," the person was known not to be a confederate; but if the answer was "Eh bien," the respondent was recognized as an adherent.

The Violet-crowned City. See CITY.

The violet on the tyrant's grave (Tennyson; Aylmer's Field). The reference is to Nero. It is said that some unknown hand went by night and strewn violets over his grave. We are told that at his death his statues were "crowned with garlands of flowers."

Violin. See AMATI; CREMONA; STRAD; FIDDLE.

V.I.P. Very Important Person; a phrase originated in World War II to indicate one whose importance was considered such as to entitle him to preferential treatment in travelling, etc.

Viper (U.S.A.). A slang term for a smoker of marijuana.

Viper and File. The biter bit. Æsop says a viper found a file, and tried to bite it, under the supposition that it was good food; but the file said that its province was to bite others, and not to be bitten.

Virago (vi ra' gō). Literally a man-like woman, but a term usually employed to designate a turbulent or scolding shrew.

Viraj. See MENU.

Virgate. An early English measure of land; equal, sometimes to a quarter of a hide (i.e. about 30 acres), and sometimes to a quarter of an acre. So called from Lat. virga, a measuring rod.

Virgil (vēr' jil). The greatest poet of ancient Rome, Publius Virgilius Maro (70-19 B.C.), born near Mantua (hence called The Mantuan Swan), a master of epic, didactic, and idyllic poetry. His chief works are the Æneid, the Eclogues or Bucolics, and the Georgics. From the Æneid grammarians illustrated their rules and rhetoricians selected the subjects of their declamations; and even Christians looked on the poet as half inspired; hence the use of his poems in divination. See SORTES.

In the Middle Ages Virgil came to be represented as a magician and enchanter, and it is this traditional character that furnishes Dante with his conception of making Virgil, as the personification of human wisdom, his guide through the infernal regions.

Virgil was wise, and as craft was considered a part of wisdom, especially over-reaching the spirits of evil, so he is represented by mediæval writers as outwitting the demon. On one occasion, the legend says, he saw an imp in a hole on a mountain, and the imp promised to teach the poet the black art if he released him. Virgil did so, and after learning all the imp could teach him, expressed amazement that one of such imposing stature could be squeezed into so small a rift. The imp said, "Oh, that is not wonderful," and crept into the hole to show Virgil how it was done, whereupon Virgil closed up the hole and kept the imp there. This tale is almost identical with that of the Fisherman and the Genie in the Arabian Nights, indeed, most of the mediæval stories that have crystallized round the name of the great Roman poet (see, for instance, those in the Gesta Romanorum) have a strong Oriental colouring.

The Christian Virgil. Marco Girolamo Vida (d. 1566), an Italian Latin poet, author of Christias in six books (1535), an imitation of the Æneid.

The Virgil and Horace of the Christians. So Bentley called Aurelius Clemens Prudentius (fl. about A.D. 400). He was a native of Spain, and the author of several Latin hymns and religious poems.

Virgino. One of the ancient constellations (Virgo), and a sign of the Zodiac. (Aug. 23rd to Sept. 23rd). The constellation is the metamorphosis of Astræa (q.v.), goddess of justice, who was the last of the deities to quit our earth. See ICARIUS.

The word virgin is used as a prefix denoting that the article has never been used, tried, or brought into cultivation; as paper of virgin whiteness, paper that is unwritten, or unprinted upon, a virgin fortress, one that has never been captured; a virgin forest, one that man has never attempted to tame or make use of.

Virgin Birth. In theology the doctrine—in the R.C. Church the dogma—that the miraculous birth of Christ did not impair the virginity of His mother, our Lady, and that she remained a virgin to the day of her death.

The Virgin Mary's Bodyguard. The name given to the old Scottish guard in France, organized in 1448 by Charles VII, because—it is said—Louis XI nominated the Blessed Virgin their colonel; also to the 7th Dragoon Guards, because in the time of George II they served under Maria Theresa of Austria.

The Virgin Queen. Elizabeth I; also called (by Shakespeare) "the fair Vestal."

Virginal. A musical instrument of the 16th and 17th centuries, also called a pair of virginals. It has been suggested that it was so called because it was used in convents to lead the virginals or hymns to the Virgin, but it is more probable that it was simply because it was adapted to the use of young girls. It was a quilled keyboard instrument of two or three octaves.

Virginia. The State of Virginia is the first of the original American colonies, having been founded by Sir Walter Raleigh in 1584 and named after Elizabeth I of England, the Virgin Queen. His colony was probably planted on Roanoke Island and was in what is now North Carolina, but for many years the whole seaboard from Florida to Newfoundland was known as Virginia.

Virginia fence. An irregular fence made of roughly laid logs. Benjamin Franklin describes a drunkard's uncertain progression as resembling a Virginia fence.

Virgo. See VIRGIN.

Virtues, The Seven. Faith, Hope, Charity, Prudence, Justice, Fortitude, and Temperance. The first three are called the supernatural, theological, or Christian virtues; the remaining four are Plato's Cardinal virtues. Cp. SEVEN DEADLY SINS.

Virtuoso (vē tū ō' zō). An Italian word meaning skilled. It is now applied almost exclusively to a musical artist who has achieved an eminent mastery over the instrument upon which he performs.

Vis inertæ (vis in ěr' shē). (Lat., the power of inactivity). It is a common mistake to imagine that inertia means absence of motion; inertia is that property of matter which makes it resist any change. Thus it is hard to set in motion what is still, or to stop what is in motion. Figuratively, it applies to that unwillingness of change which makes men "rather bear the ills they have than fly to others they know not of."

Visa (vē' zá). The official endorsement made on a passport by the embassy or consulate of the country to which the traveller intends to go. Without such visa he would not be allowed entry.

Viscount (vī' kount). A peer ranking next below an Earl and above a Baron. In 1440 the title became a degree of honour and was made hereditary, the first Viscount being John, Lord Beaumont. The coronet of a Viscount bears 16 silver balls, and he is styled by the Sovereign "Our right trusty and well-beloved Cousin."

Vishnu (vish' nū). The Preserver; the second member of the Hindu trinity, though worshipped by many Hindus as the supreme deity. He has had 9 incarnations, or Avatars (q.v.), and there is one—Kalki—still to come, during which Vishnu will at the end of four ages destroy sin, the sinful, and all the enemies of the world. He is usually represented as four-armed and carrying a club, a shell, a discus, and a lotus; a bow and sword are slung at his side, and on his breast is a peculiar mark called the Shrivatsa. He has millions of worshippers, especially under his Avatars as Rama and Krishna.

Vision of Piers Plowman, The. A long allegorical poem in Middle English alliterative verse, written between 1362 and 1400 by probably as many as four or five different authors. On internal evidence the first part has for long been ascribed to William Langland or Langley, who came from Shropshire and settled in London.

The title should really be "The Vision concerning Piers the Plowman," for in the earlier part Piers typifies the simple, pious, English labourer, and in the later Christ Himself. The poet supposes himself falling asleep on the Malvern Hills, and in his dream sees various visions of an allegorical character, bearing on the vices of the times. The whole poem consists of nearly 15,000 verses, and is divided into twenty parts, each part being called a passus.

As a whole the picture is confused and depressing, but in detail it is often very powerful, e.g. the description of the crowded scene in the first prologue; the figures of Holy Church, Lady Meed, the Seven Deadly Sins, Piers himself, the Rat Parliament, etc. It lacks Chaucer's humorous and cultured touch, but atones by its earnestness and sympathy.—E. W. EDMUNDS: Hist. Summary of Eng. Lit., II, D, iii.

Visitation. In common parlance this means an unwanted—and usually protracted—visit from an unwelcome person. As an ecclesiastical term it is applied to the official visit a bishop pays to every parish in his diocese. A herald's visitation was the tour a herald made among country towns and seats to ascertain and record the genealogies and right to bear coat armour of the nobility and gentry of England. This was primarily done for the purposes of taxation.

The Visitation is the term applied in theology to Our Lady's visit to St. Elizabeth before the birth of John. Luke i, 40 et seq. It is celebrated on 2 July.

Visual Aids. Instructive diagrams, pictures, pictorial maps, etc., hung on schoolroom walls to familiarize the scholars with the information contained on them.

Vitex (vī' teks). The Latin name of the Agnus Castus, or chaste-tree. In the language of flowers it means "insensibility to love." Dioscorides, Pliny, and Galen mention the plant as a mild anaphrodisiac and say that the Athenian ladies used to strew their couches with the leaves of vitex as a palladium of chastity. Vitex, from vicio, to bind with twigs; so called from the flexible nature of the twigs.

Vitus, St. (vī' tūs). A Sicilian youth who was martyred with Modestus, his tutor, and Crescentia, his nurse, during the Diocletian persecution, 303. All three are commemorated on June 15th.

St. Vitus's dance. In Germany it was believed in the 16th century that good health for a year could be secured by anyone who danced before a statue of St. Vitus on his feast day; this dancing developed almost into a mania, and came to be confused with chorea, which was subsequently known as St. Vitus's dance, the saint being invoked against it.

Viva! (vī' vā, vē' vā). An exclamation of applause or joy; Italian, meaning (long) live.

Viva voce (Latin, with the living voice). Orally; by word of mouth. A viva voce examination is one in which the respondent answers by word of mouth.

Vivat regina (rex)! (Lat.). Long live the Queen (King)! At the coronation of British Sovereigns the boys of Westminster School have the privilege of acclaiming the King or Queen with shouts of "Vivat Rex (or Regina)."

Vivandière (vē von dē ār'). A woman officially attached to a French regiment for the purpose of selling liquor to the troops.

Vivien (viv' yèn). An enchantress of the Arthurian romances, called also Nimue and, because she lived in a palace in the middle of a magic lake, The Lady of the Lake. It was here that she brought up Launcelot, hence called Launcelot of the Lake.

Vixen (A.S. fyxen). A female fox. Metaphorically, a shrewish woman, one of villainous and ungovernable temper.

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona. See AGAMEMNON.

Viz. A contraction of Lat. videlicet, meaning namely, to wit. The z represents s, a common mark of contraction in the Middle Ages; as hab3—habet, omnib3—omnibus.

Vizier (vi zēr'). An Oriental title held by the minister of the Abbasside monarchs. In pre-revolution Turkey the head of each department of the council was styled Vizier. The title was also held by the chief officer of the Mogul emperors.

Vodka. A Russian spirituous liquor distilled from rye, barley, oats, potatoes, or maize. It contains up to 95 per cent. of alcohol, although for consumption this percentage is diluted down to about 50 per cent. It is thus one of the strongest spirituous beverages drunk.

Vogue (vōg). A French word. "In vogue" means in repute, in the fashion. The verb voguer means to sail or move forwards. Hence the idea of sailing with the tide.

Vogue la galère (Fr., lit., row the galley). Let the world go how it will; let us keep on, whatever happens; arrive qui pourra.

Volapük (vol' à puk). An artificial language invented in 1880 by Fr. F. Schleyer, an Austrian priest. It was supposed to be based on European languages, 40 per cent. being English; but the words were so distorted and twisted by terminations and modifications that no original was recognizable. For example, the name itself was said to be English:—Vol, "English" world; pük, "English" speech.

Vole (Fr. voler, to fly). He has gone the vole. He has been everything by turns. Vole is a deal at cards that draws the whole tricks. To vole is to win all the tricks.

Volstead Act. A. J. Volstead (1860-1946) was one of the active Congressmen who secured the passing of the 18th Amendment to the Constitution of the U.S.A. prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors. On October 18th, 1919, he secured the passing of an Act of which he was the author to define the quantity of alcohol which made a particular liquor intoxicating. This, together with the Amendment (which had passed over the veto of President Wilson) was repealed on December 5th, 1933.

Voltaic Battery. An apparatus for accumulating electricity. So called from the Italian physicist, Alessandro Volta (1745-1827), who first contrived it.

Voltaire. The assumed name of François Marie Arouet (1694-1778), the great French philosopher, poet, dramatist, and author. He began to use the name on issuing from imprisonment in the Bastille, in 1718. Voltaire is an anagram of Arouet L. I. (le jeune).

Volume. The word shows the ancestry of the thing; for it comes from Lat. volvere, to roll, and anciently books were written on sheets fastened together lengthwise and rolled on a pin or roller.

Volund. See WAYLAND.

Voodoo, or Voodooism. A system of magic and witchcraft which includes snake-worship and, in its extreme forms, human sacrifices and cannibalism. It is said to be a relic of African barbarism and is still practised in Haiti and other parts of the West Indies and Southern American States.

The name is thought to have been first given to it by missionaries from Fr. Vaudois, a Waldensian, as these were accused of sorcery; but Sir Richard Burton derived it from vodun, a dialect form of Ashanti obosum, a fetish or tutelary spirit.

Vorticism (vôr' ti sizm). The name adopted in the early 20th century to describe an artistic movement on Futurist lines, and, like Futurism, including literature. It insisted on the imaginative reconstruction of nature in formal designs, regarding the question of representation as irrelevant. Vorticist designs are in straight lines and angular patterns.

Votive Offerings. See ANATHEMA.

Voyageur (vva ya zhër'). A French Canadian or half-breed hired as a guide to the remoter stations of a fur or trading company on account of his skill as a boatman, tracker, and woodsman.

Vox. Vox et prætereā nihil (Lat., a voice, and nothing more). Empty words—"full of sound and fury, signifying nothing"; a threat not followed out. When the Lacedæmonian plucked the nightingale, on seeing so little substance he exclaimed, Vox tu es, et nihil prætereā. (Plutarch: Apophthegmata Læconica.)

Vox populi vox Dei (Lat., the voice of the people is the voice of God). This does not mean that the voice of the many is wise and good, but only that it is irresistible. After Edward II had been dethroned by the people in favour of his son (Edward III), Simon Mepham, Archbishop of Canterbury, preached from these words as his text.

Vulcan. A son of Jupiter and Juno, and god of fire, and the working of metals, and patron of handicraftsmen in mythology, identified with the Gr. Hephæstus, and called also Mulciber, i.e. the softener.

His workshop was on Mount Etna, where the Cyclops assisted him in forging thunderbolts for Jove. It is said that he took the part of Juno against Jupiter, and Jupiter hurled him out of heaven. He was nine days in falling, and at last was picked up, half dead and with one leg broken, by the fishermen of the island of Lemnos. It was he who, with the stroke of an axe, delivered Minerva from the head of Jupiter; and he was the author of Pandora, and the golden dogs of Alcinoüs, as he had the power of conferring life upon his creations. Venus was his wife, and in consequence of her amour with Mars he came to be regarded as the special patron of cuckolds.

Vulcanist. One who supports the Vulcanian or Plutonian theory, which ascribes the changes on the earth's surface to the agency of fire. These theorists say the earth was once in a state of igneous fusion, and that the crust has gradually cooled down to its present temperature. Cp. NEPTUNIAN.

Vulgate, The. The Latin translation of the Bible, made about 385-405 by St. Jerome (q.v.), still used, with some modifications, as the authorized version by Roman Catholics. In 1907 Pope Pius X entrusted to the Benedictines the revision of the Vulgate, and by 1949 the first eight books of the Old Testament had been issued by them.

VXL. A punning monogram on lockets, etc., standing for U XL (you excel). U and V were formerly interchangeable.

W

W. The twenty-third letter of the English alphabet. The form is simply a ligature of two V's (VV); hence the name; for V was formerly the symbol of U (q.v.) as well as of V.

Waac. The familiar name of a member of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps, a body of women raised for non-combatant army service in World War I. In World War II they were termed A.T.S. (later R.A.T.S.) (Royal Auxiliary Territorial Services).

W.A.C. (U.S.A.). In World War II the Women's Army Corps, equivalent to the British R.A.T.S.

Wad. A roll of paper money, and hence money itself.

Wade. General Wade. The old rhyme—
Had you seen but these roads before they were made,
You would hold up your hands and bless General Wade.

refers to Field-Marshal George Wade (1673-1748), famous for military highways in the Highlands, which proceed in a straight line up and down hill like a Roman road, and were made about 1726-33.

Wade's boat.

They can so mochë craft of Wadës boot,
So mochë broken harm whan that hem list,
That with hem schuld I never lÿv in rest.

CHAUCER: Merchant's Tale, 180.

Wade was a hero of mediæval romance, whose adventures were a favourite theme in the 16th century. His famous boat was named Guingelot.

Wadham College (Oxford) was founded in 1613 by a bequest from Nicholas Wadham (1532-1609).

Wafer. Ecclesiastically a thin disk of unleavened bread used in the Eucharist.

Before the device of gummed envelope flaps was introduced, thin round disks of dried paste or gelatine were inserted between the flap and the envelope—or, earlier still, between the outer sides of the folded letter—and having been moistened and pressed with a seal served the same purpose of keeping the paper closed.

Wag. Meaning a humorous person this word comes from the Old English wagge, probably from the facetious use of waghalter, a merry rogue.

A wag is the last order even of pretenders to wit and good-humour. . . . He laughs not because it is ridiculous but because he is under a necessity of laughing.—STEELE: Tatler No. 184.

Wager. Anything staked or hazarded on the event of a contest, etc. Connected with gage and wage (low Lat. wadiare, to pledge.)

Wager of battle. The decision of a contested claim by single combat—a common and legal method in Anglo-Saxon and early Norman times. It had legal status in England until abolished by Act of Parliament in 1818.

Wagga Blanket. A sort of sleeping-bag made of two corn sacks cut open and stitched together. The name is taken from the town of Wagga Wagga, N.S.W.

Waggoner. An old sailors' name for a book of sea-charts, Dalrymple's Charts being known as the English Waggoner. A corruption of Lukas Waganaar, a Dutch geographer whose charts were in use for long after their first appearance in the 16th century.

Wagoner. See BOÖTES.

Wahabites (wa ha' bîtz). A Mohammedan sect, whose object is to bring back the doctrines and observances of Islam to the literal precepts of the Koran; so called from the founder, Ibn-abd-ul-Wahab (d. 1787).

Wailing Wall of the Jews. An enclosure in Jerusalem containing a wall said to be built of stones from Solomon's Temple. Traditionally the Jews gather there every Friday for prayers and lamentations for the Dispersion and lost glories of Israel.

Wait. Wait and see. This was one of the most widely used and frequently caricatured political phrases of modern times. It was first used by H. H. Asquith (Earl of Oxford & Asquith) as his answer to a question in the House of Commons, April 4th, 1910. No exception was taken to the answer at the moment, but when Asquith took to repeating it whenever posed with an awkward question, Members took it up and a time came when it was chanted by the whole Opposition when any question was put to him. It soon took on as a catchword with the public, and remained for many years.

Lords in Waiting, Gentlemen in Waiting, Grooms in Waiting, etc., are functionaries in the Royal Household for personal attendance upon the sovereign.

Ladies in waiting (in the Queen's Household) are officially styled Ladies of the Bedchamber, Bedchamber Women, and Maids of Honour.

Waits. Street musicians, who serenade the principal inhabitants at Christmas-time, especially on Christmas Eve. From Rymer's Fædera we learn it was the duty of musical watchmen "to pipe the watch" nightly in the king's court four times from Michaelmas to Shrove Thursday, and three times in the summer; and they had also to make "the bon gate" at every door, to secure them against "pyckeres and pillers." They form a distinct class from both the watch and the minstrels. Oboes were at one time called "waits."

Wake. The feast of the dedication of a church, which was formerly kept by watching all night; also the merrymaking held in connexion with this, hence merrymaking generally.

In Ireland the term denotes the watching of a dead body before the funeral by the friends and neighbours of the deceased, in which the lamentations were often followed by an orgy.

Waking a witch. If a witch were obdurate, the most effectual way of obtaining a confession was by what was termed waking her. An iron bridle or hoop was bound across her face with prongs thrust into her mouth; this was fastened to the wall by a chain in such a manner that the victim was unable to lie down; and men were constantly by to keep her awake, sometimes for several days.

Wake-robin. In England an arum, usually the cuckoo-pint. In the U.S.A. a trillium, or jack-in-the-pulpit.

Walcheren Expedition. Thé (wol' sher én). A disastrous undertaking during the French wars (1809) which, largely owing to the dilatoriness of the leaders, and to an outbreak of fever during which 7,000 British soldiers died, effected nothing, except the capture of Flushing. Lord Chatham and Sir Richard Strachan had been sent to the island of Walcheren to destroy the French fleet in the Scheldt and take Antwerp. The incident is commemorated in the following contemporary epigram:—

Lord Chatham, with his sword undrawn,
Is waiting for Sir Richard Strachan;
Sir Richard, longing to be at 'em,
Is waiting for the Earl of Chatham.

Waldensians or Waldenses (wol den' zianz, wol den' zéz) (also called the Vaudois). Followers of Peter Waldo of Lyons, who began a reform movement in the Church about 1170. They threw off the authority of the Pope, bishops, and all clergy, appointed lay-preachers (women among them), rejected infant baptism and many other rites, and made themselves so obnoxious to the ecclesiastical powers that they met with considerable persecution celebrated in one of Milton's sonnets. This they survived, and their descendants in doctrine still exist, principally in the Alpine valleys of Dauphiné, and Piedmont.

Wales. The older form is Wealthas (plural of Wealh), an Anglo-Saxon word denoting foreigners, and applied by them to the ancient Britons; hence, also, Corn-wall, the horn occupied by the same "refugees." The Welsh proper are Cimbri, and call their country Cymru; those driven thither by the Teutonic invaders were refugees or strangers. Cp. WALNUT.

The Prince of Wales. The popular story is that the title arose thus: When Edward I subdued Wales, he promised the Welsh, if they would lay down their arms, that he would give them a native prince who could not speak a word of English. His queen (Eleanor) having given birth to a son in Wales, the newborn child was entitled Edward, Prince of Wales; and ever since then the eldest son of the British sovereign has retained the title.

The facts, however, are that Edward I obtained the submission of the Welsh in 1276; his eldest son, afterwards Edward II, was born at Carnarvon in 1284, and it was not till 1301 that he was created Prince of Wales.

The male heir apparent to the throne is born Duke of Cornwall, but is not Prince of Wales until this title is conferred upon him, which it usually is. At death, or succession to the Throne, it lapses to the Crown and can only be renewed at the Sovereign's pleasure. Thus, when Edward VII became King his son did not immediately become Prince of Wales; the title was conferred on him eight months later.

The Prince of Wales's feathers. The tradition is that the Black Prince, having slain John of Luxemburg, King of Bohemia, in the Battle of Cressy, assumed his crest and motto. The crest consisted of three ostrich feathers, and the motto was Ich dien (I serve). Much controversy has arisen on the question; the crest, for instance, has been stated to be a rebus of Queen Philippa's hereditary title—viz. Countess of Ostre-vant (ostrich-feather), and the motto a corruption of Welsh Eich dyn, behold the man. See ICH DIEN.

It should be noted that Prince of Wales's feathers is technically a misnomer, for the plume does not belong to him as Prince of Wales, but is the badge of the Heir Apparent, whether he holds that title or not.

Walhall. See VALHALLA.

Walk. This is a remarkable word. It comes from the A.S. wealcan, to roll; whence we get wealcere, a fuller of cloth. In Percy's Reliques we read:—

She cursed the weaver and the walker,
The cloth that they had wrought.

A walk-over. A very easy victory; as in a running match when one's rivals could be beaten by walking.

To make a man walk Spanish. To give him the sack; to give him his discharge.

To walk into. To thrash; also, to partake heartily of, as "to walk into an apple tart."

To walk off with. To steal and decamp with.

To walk out with. To court, as a preliminary to marriage.

In America a strike is called a walk out.

To walk the chalk. An ordeal used at police stations, in barracks, on board ship, etc., as a test of sobriety. Two parallel lines are chalked on the floor and the delinquent must walk between them without stepping on either.

To walk the hospitals. To attend the hospitals as a medical student.

To walk the plank. See PLANK.

To walk through one's part. To repeat one's part at rehearsal verbally, but without dressing for it or acting it; to do anything appointed you in a listless, indifferent manner.

Walking-out dress. Uniform, smarter than that used on duty, which British soldiers assume when leaving barracks in their free time.

A walking-on part. A part in a play in which the actor has only to walk about on the stage, sometimes with a word or two to say.

Walk not in the public ways. The fifth symbol of the Protrepics of Iamblichus, meaning follow not the multitude in their evil ways; or, wide is the path of sin and narrow the path of virtue, few being those who find it.

Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction.—Matt. vii, 13.

Hokey Walker! An early Victorian derisive exclamation meaning Nonsense! Incredible! used when hearing a "tall story" or some statement that cannot be trusted. Many ingenious and patently inaccurate stories have been advanced to explain this phrase; its origin is unknown.

To go by Walker's bus. To walk. Similar expressions are, "To go by the Marrowbone stage," "To ride Shanks's pony."

Walkie-Talkie. (World War II). American small portable short-range wireless (containing receiver and transmitter) for use by infantry. Its equivalent has been adopted elsewhere by police, etc.

Walking Stewart. The nickname of John Stewart (1749-1822). The son of a London linen-draper, he secured a post in the East India Company and went to Madras. After serious quarrels with his superiors he resigned and started out on his travels. During the following years he went on foot through Hindustan, Persia, Nubia, Abyssinia, across the Arabian Desert, through Europe from Constantinople to England, passing through most of the Continental countries. In 1791 he crossed to America and walked through what was then known of Canada and the United States. De Quincey says of him:—

A most interesting man . . . contemplative and crazy . . . yet sublime and divinely benignant in his visionariness. This man as a pedestrian traveller had seen more of the earth's surface than any man before or since.

Wall. To give the wall. To allow another, as a matter of courtesy, to pass by on the pavement at the side farthest from the gutter; hence, to be courteous. At one time pedestrians gave the wall to persons of a higher rank than themselves.

Nathaniel Bailey's explanation of this phrase (1721) is worth perpetuating. He says it is—a compliment paid to the female sex, or those to whom one would show respect, by letting them go nearest the wall or houses, upon a supposition of its being the cleanest. This custom is chiefly peculiar to England, for in most parts abroad they will give them the right hand, though at the same time they trust them into the kennel.

To go to the wall. To be put on one side; to be shelved. This is in allusion to another phrase, Laid by the wall—i.e. dead but not buried; put out of the way.

To hang by the wall. To hang up neglected; not to be made use of (Cymbeline, iii, 4).

To take the wall. To take the place of honour.

I will take the wall of any man or maid of Montague's.—Romeo and Juliet, i, 1.

Walls have ears. Things uttered in secret get rumoured abroad; there are listeners everywhere, and you'd better be careful. Certain rooms in the Louvre were said to be so constructed in the time of Catherine de' Medicis, that what was said in one room could be distinctly heard in another. It was by this contrivance that the suspicious queen became acquainted with state secrets and plots. The tubes of communication were called the auriculaires. Cp. DIONYSIUS'S EAR under EAR.

Wall Street. The thoroughfare in New York City which contains the Stock Exchange. The name is hence used as a synonym for the American stock market.

The Roman Wall, from the Tyne to Bowness, on the Solway Firth, a distance of 80 miles. Called—

The Roman Wall, because it was the work of the Romans.

Agricola's Wall, because Agricola made the south bank and ditch.

Hadrian's Wall, because Hadrian added another vallum and mound parallel to Agricola's.

The Wall of Severus, because Severus followed in the same line with a stone wall, having castles and turrets.

The Piet's Wall, because its object was to prevent the incursions of the Picts.

The Wall of Antoninus, now called Graeme's Dyke, from Dunglass Castle on the Clyde to Blackness Castle on the Forth, was made by Lollius Urbicus, legate of Antoninus Pius A.D. 140. It was a turf wall.

Wall-eyed. The M.E. wald-eyed, a corruption of Icel. vald eygthr, having a beam in the eye (vagl, beam). Persons are wall-eyed when the white is unusually large, and the sight defective, due to opacity of the cornea, or when they have a divergent squint. Shakespeare has wall-eyed wrath or staring rage (King John, iv, 3).

Wallaby. A small Australian kangaroo.

On the wallaby, or on the wallaby track. On the tramp—usually because out of work.

Wallace, Sir William (c. 1270-1305). One of the great national leaders of the Scots. He was the son of Sir William Wallace, of Elderslie, Renfrewshire. He totally defeated an English army of 50,000 men at Stirling, Sept. 11th, 1297, thus driving the English from Scotland. Edward I, however, pursued Wallace as far as Falkirk where, on July 22nd, 1298, he routed the Scots army. The beaten leader fled and little more is known of him until his betrayal to the English, near Glasgow, by Sir John Menteith, August 5th, 1305. Condemned as a traitor and rebel, Wallace was executed in London, August 22nd, 1305, his quarters being hung on gibbets at Newcastle-on-Tyne, Berwick, Stirling, and Perth.

Wallah (wol' a). Anglo-Indian for one who does something, as Competition wallah, the old nickname for a successful competitor in the Indian Civil Service exams., bathroom wallah, the man who looks after the bathrooms in an hotel, etc.

Wallflower. So called because it grows on old walls and ruined buildings. It is a native plant. Similarly, wall cress, wall creeper, etc., are plants which grow on dry, stony places, or on walls. Wall fruit is fruit trained against a wall. Cp. WALNUT.

Herrick has a pretty fancy on the origin of this flower. A fair damsel was long kept away from her lover; but at last.

Up she got upon a wall
Tempting down to slide withal;
But the silken twist untied,
So she fell, and, bruised, she died.
Love, in pity of the deed,
And her loving luckless speed,
Turned her to this plant we call
Now the "Flower of the wall"

Girls who sit out against the wall, not having partners during a dance, are called "wallflowers."

Walloon (wá loon'). A people of mixed Italic, Teutonic, and Celtic stock descended from the Belgæ of ancient Gaul. They occupied the low tract along the frontiers of the German-speaking territory, as Artois, Hainault, Namur, Liege, Luxembourg, with parts of Flanders and Brabant.

Wallop (wol' òp). To thrash; properly, to boil with a noisy bubbling sound. The word is the same as gallop. It is also a slang term for ale.

Walnut. The foreign nut; called in M.E. wal-note, from A.S. wealh, foreign. It came from Persia, and was so called to distinguish it from nuts native to Europe, as hazel, filbert, chestnut.

Some difficulty there is in cracking the name thereof. Why walnuts, having no affinity to a wall, should be so called. The truth is, gwal or wall in the old Dutch signifieth "strange" or "exotic" (whence Welsh foreigners); these nuts being no natives of England or Europe.—FULLER: Worthies of England.

It is said that the walnut tree thrives best if the nuts are beaten off with sticks, and not gathered. Hence Fuller says, "Who, like a nut tree, must be manured by beating, or else would not bear fruit" (Bk. ii, ch. 11). The saying is well known that—

A woman, a dog, and a walnut tree,
The more you beat them the better they be.

Walpurgis Night (wol pēr' gis). The eve of May Day, when the witch-world was supposed to hold high revelry under its chief on certain high places, particularly the Brocken, in Germany.

Walpurgis was an English nun concerned in the introduction of Christianity into Germany. She died Feb. 25th, 779.

Walstan. St. The patron saint in England of husbandmen. He was a rich Briton who gave up all his wealth, and supported himself by husbandry. He died mowing in 1016, and is usually depicted with a scythe in his hand, and cattle in the background.

Waltham Blacks. See BLACK ACT.

Waltzing Matilda. A song sung by the Australian forces in the Middle East in World War II, and sharing with Lilli Marlene (q.v.) pride of place as the best soldiers' song of the period. The phrase was originally "Walking Matilda," and as such is found in Australia in the late 19th century; it means carrying one's bag or roll, as a tramp does. The reason for a tramp's roll being called a "Matilda" is obscure; "to waltz" meaning to carry is American slang, and is found in Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn, 1884.

Once a jolly swagman camped by a billabong
Under the shade of a coolibah tree,
And he sang as he watched and waited till his billy boiled
"You'll come a waltzing Matilda with me."

Wampum (wom' pūm). Shell beads strung for ornament, currency, and tribal records by some North American Indian peoples. They are made of the perforated central columns of several kinds of marine shells. The name comes from the Algonquin wompi, white.

Wand. The long, slender rod used by magicians and conjurers; also by certain court functionaries as a staff of office, and by musical conductors as a baton.

Wandering Jew, The. The central figure of a very widespread mediæval legend which tells how a Jew who refused to allow Christ to rest at his door while He was bearing his cross to Calvary, was condemned to wander over the face of the earth till the end of the world. The usual form of the legend says that he was Ahasuerus, a cobbler. The craftsman pushed Him away, saying, "Get off! Away with you, away!" Our Lord replied, "Truly I go away, and that quickly, but tarry thou till I come."

Another tradition has it that the Wandering Jew was Kartaphilos, the door-keeper of the judgment hall in the service of Pontius Pilate. He struck our Lord as he led Him forth, saying, "Go on faster, Jesus"; whereupon the Man of Sorrows replied, "I am going, but thou shalt tarry till I come again" (Chronicle of St. Albans Abbey; 1228).

The same Chronicle, continued by Matthew Paris, tells us that Kartaphilos was baptized by Ananias, and received the name of Joseph. At the end of every hundred years he falls into a trance, and wakes up a young man about thirty.

In German legend he is associated with John Buttadaeus, seen at Antwerp in the 13th century, again in the 15th, and a third time in the 16th. His last appearance was in 1774 at Brussels. In the French version he is named Isaac Laquedem, or Lakedion; another story has it that he was Salathiel ben Sadi, who appeared and disappeared towards the close of the 16th century, at Venice, in so sudden a manner as to attract the notice of all Europe; and another connects him with the Wild Huntsman (q.v.).

Wanderjahre (van' der ya' ré). In Germany, the year of travel a journeyman used to make before settling down to work. This gave him an idea of how tradesmen of his own craft in other places worked.

Wangle. To achieve some object by sly, roundabout, or underhand methods; to cook accounts (for instance), to manipulate. The word came into wide use during World War I, but it was well-known slang among printers from very early times.

Wanion. With a wanion. An old imprecation; the word is pres. part. of wanion, to wane, and meant misfortune, ill-luck.

Look how thou stirrest now! come away, or I'll fetch thee with a wannion.—Pericles, II, 1.

Wantley, The Dragon of. An old story, preserved in Percy's Reliques, tells of this monster, which was slain by More, of More Hall. He procured a suit of armour studded with spikes, and kicked the Dragon in the mouth, where alone it was vulnerable. Percy says the Dragon was an overgrown, rascally attorney, who cheated some children of their estate, and was made to disgorge by one named More, who went against him, "armed with the spikes of the law," after which the attorney died of vexation. Wantley is Wharnciffe in Yorkshire.

Wapentake (wop' en tāk). A division of Yorkshire and certain East Anglian counties, similar to that better known as a hundred. The word means "touch-arms" (A.S. wæpen-getæc, from Icel. vapn, weapon, taka, to touch or take), it being the custom of each vassal, when he attended the assemblies of the district, "to touch the spear of his over-lord in token of homage."

Wapinshaw (wop' in shaw). The Scottish name for a meeting for rifle-shooting, curling, or similar sport. Formerly, the periodical review of clansmen under arms, a weapon-show.

War. A holy war. War undertaken from religious motives, such as the Crusades; or in defence of a religion.

On the war-path. Looking for one's adversary with every intention of catching him; thoroughly roused or incensed.

War game. A military training exercise consisting of a game played with maps, etc. for developing skill in manœuvring troops and designing both strategy and tactics.

War head. The explosive head of a torpedo or bomb.

War-horse. Used figuratively of a veteran who is overflowing with warlike memories; a "fire-eater."

War paint. The paint applied to their faces by Red Indians and other peoples to make their appearance terrifying before going out on the warpath. Putting on one's war paint is a phrase applied figuratively to getting ready to enter energetically into a dispute or to putting on lipstick, powder, etc., in order to overcome one's rivals.

Ward. A district under the charge of a warden. The word is applied to the subdivisions of Cumberland, Westmorland, and Durham, which, being contiguous to Scotland, were placed under the charge of lord wardens of the marches, whose duty it was to protect these counties from inroads. See HUNDRED.

The word has other applications:—The administrative division of a town or city; a large room or division of a hospital; each of the separate divisions of a prison (under a warder); a minor placed under the care of a guardian; a part of a lock or of a key.

Ward Room. In British warships a mess shared by the Commander—unless he is in command of the vessel, when he messes alone—and all other officers down to and including lieutenants. Junior officers mess in the gun room.

Warden Pie. Pie made of the Warden pear. Warden pears are said to be so called from Warden, in Bedfordshire, but it is quite likely that the word is merely O.Fr. wardant, keeping, because they are good keeping pears.

Myself with denial I mortify
With a dainty bit of a Warden-pie.
The Friar of Orders Grey.

Wardour Street English. The affected use of archaic words and phrases. The term was first applied by William Morris, in 1888, to a translation of the Odyssey, couched in language which reminded him of the pseudo-antique furniture that in those days was sold in Wardour Street, London.

Warlock. An evil spirit; a wizard. A.S. wærloga, a traitor, one who breaks his word.

Warm. Used in slang with much the same force as hot (q.v.), as a warm member, said of a man who "goes the pace," of a sharper, or of one who is particularly notable in connexion with whatever happens to be the subject of discussion. Warm thanks, are hearty thanks; he's in a warm corner means he's in an awkward position.

A house-warming. An entertainment given by new occupiers of a house; a first welcoming of friends to a fresh residence.

Warming-pan. One who holds a place temporarily for another; used specially of a clergyman who officiates while the actual holder of the living is qualifying. In public schools it used to be the custom to make a fag warm his "superior's" bed by lying in it till the proper occupant was ready to turn him out.

Jacobites used to be nicknamed Warming-pans, because of the widely believed story that the "Old Pretender" was a child who was introduced into the lying-in-chamber of Mary of Modena, queen of James II, in a warming-pan, her own child having been still-born.

Warp. The threads running the long way of a woven fabric, crossed by the woof, i.e. those running from selvedge to selvedge. Warp (A.S. wearp) is connected with Icel. varpa, to throw; woof with A.S. wef, web.

Weave the warp and weave the woof,
The winding-sheet of Edward's race;
Give ample room and verge enough
The characters of hell to trace.

GRAY: The Bard.

To warp is a nautical term, meaning to shift the position of a vessel, which is done by means of a rope called a warp. Kedging is when the warp is bent to a kedje, which is let go, and the vessel is hove ahead by the capstan.

In Lancashire, warping means laying eggs; and boys, on finding a bird's nest, will ask—"And how many eggs has she warped?"

Warrant Officer. In the British navy this is a rank between a commissioned officer and petty officers and men. Warrant officers are promoted from the lower deck.

In the Army and Air Force warrant officer is a rank between that of commissioned officer and non-commissioned officer.

Warrior Queen, The. Boadicea, Queen of the Icen, an ancient tribe of Eastern Britain subjugated by the Romans in A.D. 62.

When the British warrior queen,
Bleeding from the Roman rods,
Sought, with an indignant mien,
Counsel of her country's gods . . .

COWPER: Boadicea.

The Icen were the faithful allies of Rome; but, on the death of Prasutagus, king of that tribe, the Roman procurator took possession of his kingdom, and when his widow Boadicea complained, the procurator had her beaten with rods like a slave.

Wash. It will all come out in the wash. Everything will turn out all right in the end. The phrase is Spanish, and occurs in Don Quixote.

Quite washed out. Thoroughly exhausted, done up, with no strength or spirit left.

That story won't wash! It won't do at all; you'll have to think of something better than that! Said of an excuse or explanation that is palpably false, far-fetched, or exaggerated.

To wash a brick. To engage in an utterly unprofitable enterprise; to do useless work. An old Latin proverbial expression (laterem lavem, Terence's Phormio, I, iv, 9).

To wash one's dirty linen in public. To expose the family skeletons to the public gaze; openly to discuss private affairs that are more or less discreditable.

Wash-out. A phrase made popular in World War I meaning a failure or fiasco. As an imperative verb it means, cancel, disregard—"Wash out that instruction," disregard that order, consider it as never having been given. It is really old Naval slang, dating from the times when signal messages were taken down on a slate which was washed clean when the message had been transmitted to the proper quarters.

To wash one's hands of. See HAND.

Wassail. A carouse, drinking bout, or other festive occasion.

The king doth wake to-night and takes his rouse,
Keeps wassail.

Hamlet, i, 4.

Formerly a salutation used specially at the New Year over the spiced ale cup, hence called the "wassail bowl" (A.S. Wæs hæl, be whole, be well).

An old story has it that when Vortigern was invited to dine at the house of Hengist, Rowena, the daughter, of the host, brought a cup of wine which she presented to their royal guest, saying, "Wæs hæl, hlaford cyning" (Your health, lord king). Robert de Brunne (late 13th cent.) refers to this custom:—

This is ther custom and hev gest
When they are at the ale or fest
Ilk man that levis gware him drink
Salle say "Wasseille" to him drink;
He that biddis sall say "Wassale,"
The tother salle say again "Drinkaile."
That says "Wasseille" drinks of the cup
Kiss and his felaw he gives it up.

Hence wassailers, those who join a wassail; revellers, drunkards.

I should be loath
To meet the rudeness and swilled insolence
Of such late wassailers. MILTON: Comus.

Waster, wastrel. A good-for-nothing fellow; a prodigal, spendthrift.

Wat. An old name for a hare, short for Walter. Cp. Tom for a cat, Neddy for a donkey, Jenny wren, etc.

By this, poor Wat, far off upon a hill,
Stands on his hinder legs, with listening ear.
Venus and Adonis.

Watch. In nautical usage, the time during which each division of a ship's crew is alternately on duty (four hours except during the dog-watches of two hours by which the change from night to day duty is arranged); also, either half (starboard or port watch from the position of the sailors' bunks in the fore-castle) into which the officers and crew are divided, taking duty alternately.

12 to 4 p.m. Afternoon watch.
4 to 6 " First dog-watch.
6 to 8 " Second dog-watch.
8 to 12 " First night watch.
12 to 4 a.m. Middle watch.
4 to 8 " Morning watch.
8 to 12 " Forenoon watch.

The Black Watch. See BLACK.

The Watch on the Rhine. A national song of the old German Empire, sharing the place of honour with 'Deutschland uber Alles (Germany over all).

Watch and ward. Continuous vigilance; guard by night (watch) and by day (ward). In feudal times service "by watch and ward" was due by certain tenants in towns; later the term was applied to the constabulary.

Watch Night. December 31st, to see the Old Year out and the New Year in by a religious service. John Wesley grafted it on the religious system, and it has been adopted by many Christian communities.

Watchful Waiting. A phrase used by President Wilson in 1915 to describe the policy of the U.S.A. towards Mexico, whose attitude was extremely unfriendly and provocative.

Watchword. A word given to sentries as a signal that one has the right of admission, a password; hence, a motto, word, or phrase symbolizing or epitomizing the principles of a party, etc.

Water. Blood thicker than water. See BLOOD.

Court holy water. Fair but empty words. In French, eau bénite de cour.

I am for all waters (Twelfth Night, iv, 2)
I am a Jack of all trades, can turn my hand to anything, a good all-round man. Like a fish which can live in salt or fresh water.

In deep water. In difficulties; in great perplexity; similarly, in smooth water means all is plain sailing, one's troubles and anxieties are things of the past.

In low water. Hard up; in a state of financial (or other) depression.

It makes my mouth water. It is very alluring; it makes me long for it. Saliva is excited in the mouth by strong desire.

More water glideth by the mill than wots the miller of (Titus Andronicus, ii, 1). The Scots say, "Mickle water goes by the miller when he sleeps." See MILLER.

Of the first water. Of the highest type; very excellent. See DIAMOND.

Smooth, or still, waters run deep. Deep thinkers are persons of few words; he (or she) thinks a good deal more than is suspected; silent conspirators are the most dangerous; barking dogs do not bite. A calm exterior is far more to be feared than a tongue-doughty Bobadil.

Smooth runs the water where the brook is deep;
And in his simple show he harbours treason.
The fox barks not when he would steal the lamb;
No, no, my sovereign, Gloucester is a man
Unsound ed yet, and full of deep deceit.

2 Henry VI, iii, 1.

That won't hold water. That is not correct; it is not tenable. It is a vessel which leaks.

The Father of Waters. The Mississippi, the chief river of North America. The Missouri is its child. The Irrawaddy is so called also.

The water of jealousy. If a woman was known to have committed adultery she was to be stoned to death, according to the Mosaic law (Deut. xxii, 22). If, however, the husband had no proof, but only suspected his wife of infidelity, he might take her before the Sanhedrin to be examined, and if she denied it, she was given the "water of jealousy" to drink (Numb. v, 11-29). In this water some of the dust of the sanctuary was mixed, and the priest said to the woman, "If thou hast gone aside may Jehovah make this water bitter to thee, and bring on thee all the curses written in this law." He then wrote on a roll the curses, sprinkled the writing with the water, gave it to the woman, and then handed to her the "water of jealousy" to drink.

To back water. To row backwards in order to reverse the forward motion of a boat in rowing; hence, to go easy, to retrace one's steps, to retract.

To carry water to the river. To carry coals to Newcastle.

To fish in troubled waters. To seek to turn a state of disturbance to one's own advantage; to "profiteer" during a time of war, to seize power during a revolution, and so on.

To get into hot water. See HOT.

To keep one's head above water. See HEAD.

To throw cold water on a scheme. To discourage the proposal; to speak of it slightly.

To turn on the waterworks. To cry, blubber.

To water stock. To add extra shares. Suppose a "trust" (q.v.) consists of 1,000 shares of £50 each, and the profit available for dividend is 40 per cent., the managers "water the stock," that is, add another 1,000 fully paid-up shares to the original 1,000. There are now 2,000 shares, and the dividend, instead of £40 per cent., is reduced to £20; but the shares are more easily sold, and the shareholders are increased in number.

Water-gall. The dark rim round the eyes after much weeping. A peculiar appearance in a rainbow which indicates more rain at hand. And round about her tear-distained eye
Blue circles streamed, like rainbows in the sky;
These watergalls . . . foretell new storms.

Rape of Lucrece.

Waterman. A boatman, especially one who rows a boat or skiff as a means of transport. The Thames watermen were a feature of old London, when much passenger traffic was carried by water from Westminster as far down as Greenwich.

Hackney-coach stands and cab ranks were each supplied with a licensed waterman whose duty it was to water the cab-horses and see that the drivers accepted fares in rotation.

Watermark. A design impressed into paper while in course of manufacture. Watermarks were employed as early as 1282, and served to identify the product of each paper mill, the designs chosen (many of them extremely complicated) frequently also expressing emblematically the tenets of the manufacturers. The art of papermaking was almost entirely in the hands of the Huguenots and previous Protestants (Albigenses, Waldenses, Cathari, etc.), and the Bull's head, for instance, was an emblem of the Albigenses.

The watermark has in many cases been the origin of paper-trade terminology; thus the mark of the cap and bells gave us Fools'cap, the Post-horn, Post, the Pot, Pott, and so on—all sizes of paper.

Water Poet. John Taylor (1580-1654), the humorous and sometimes scurrilous Thames waterman who confessed he never learnt a word of grammar, and yet wrote fourscore books and verse pamphlets. In his closing days he opened an ale-house in Long Acre.

Taylor, their better Charon, lends an oar,
Once swan of Thames, though now he sings no more.
Dunciad, iii.

Water-sky. The term used by Arctic navigators to denote a dark or brown sky, indicating an open sea. An ice-sky is a white one, or a sky tinted with orange or rose-colour, indicative of a frozen sea (cp. ICE-BLINK).

Waterloo. He met his Waterloo. He had a final and crushing defeat; in allusion, of course, to the decisive defeat inflicted on Napoleon by Wellington at Waterloo in 1815.

The Waterloo Cup. The "Derby" of the coursing fraternity; the great dog-race held annually at Aintree during three days in February.

It was founded in 1836 by a man named Lynn, the sporting owner of the Waterloo Hotel in Liverpool (whence its name). Lynn was also the founder of the Grand National, run at Aintree.

Watling Street. The great Roman road extending east and west across Britain. Beginning at Dover, it ran through Canterbury to London, thence through St. Albans, Dunstable, along the boundary of Leicester and Warwick to Wroxeter on the Severn, and so to Chester and Cardigan. Watling is said to be a corruption of Vitellina strata, the paved road of Vitellius, called by the Britons Guetalin.

Watson. See SHERLOCK HOLMES.

Wattle. Australian settlers built wattle-and-daub huts after the English manner from twigs of the abundant acacia trees, which hence became known as Wattles. Wattle Day is a national festival in Australia, held on August 1st, or September 1st according to the peak of the flowering of the wattle in each State.

Wave. The tenth wave. A notion prevails that the waves keep increasing in regular series till the maximum arrives. and then the series begins again. No doubt when two waves coalesce they form a large one, but this does not occur at fixed intervals.

The most common theory is that the tenth wave is the largest, but Tennyson says the ninth.

And then the two
Dropt to the cove, and watch'd the great sea fall,
Wave after wave, each mightier than the last,
Till last, a ninth one, gathering half the deep
And full of voices, slowly rose and plunged
Roaring, and all the wave was in a flame.

The Holy Grail.

Wavy Navy. The Naval slang name for the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve (R.N.V.R.), the officers of which, in war-time, have the gold braid on their sleeves in wavy lines instead of straight.

Waverley Novels. The novels of Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832) which took their name from the first of the series. They were published anonymously "By the Author of Waverley" until 1827, when the author disclosed his identity as "The Great Unknown" at a public dinner at Edinburgh.

Waverley, 1814; Guy Mannering, 1815; The Antiquary, Old Mortality, Black Dwarf, 1816; Rob Roy, Heart of Midlothian, 1818; Bride of Lammermoor, Legend of Montrose, 1819; Ivanhoe, Monastery, Abbot, 1820; Kenilworth, 1821; The Pirate, Fortunes of Nigel, 1822; Peveril of the Peak, Quentin Durward, 1823; St. Ronan's Well, Redgauntlet, 1824; The Betrothed, Talisman, 1825; Woodstock, 1826; Two Drovers, Highland Widow, Surgeon's Daughter, 1827; Fair Maid of Perth, 1828; Anne of Geierstein, 1829; Count Robert of Paris, 1831; Castle Dangerous, 1832.

Wax. Slang for temper, anger; he's in an awful wax, he's in a regular rage. Hence waxy, irritated, vexed, angry.

A man of wax. A model man; like one fashioned in wax. Horace speaks of the "waxen arms of Telephus," meaning model arms, or of perfect shape and colour; and the nurse says of Romeo, "Why, he's a man of wax (i. 3), which she explains by saying, "Nay, he's a flower, i' faith a very flower."

A nose of wax. Mutable and accommodating (faith). A waxen nose may be twisted any way.

Way. The way of all flesh. Death.

The way of the Cross. See STATIONS OF THE CROSS.

Under way. Said of a ship in motion; it is a mistake to take this as "under weigh," and connect it with weighing the anchor.

Wayleave. Right of way through private property for the laying of water-pipes, making of sewers, carrying of telephone wires, etc.

Ways and Means. A parliamentary term, meaning the method of raising the supply of money for the current requirements of the state.

Wayland. A wonderful and invisible smith of English legend, the English form of Scandinavian Volund, a supernatural smith and King of the Elves, a kind of Vulcan. He was bound apprentice to Mimi the smith. King Nidung cut the sinews of his feet, and cast him into prison, but he escaped in a feather boat. He and Amilias had a contest of skill in their handicraft. Wayland's sword, Balmung, cleft his rival down to the thighs, but it was so sharp that Amilias was not aware of the cut till he attempted to stir, when he divided into two pieces. Tradition has placed his forge near Lambourn, Berks (since called Wayland Smith's Cave), where it was said that if a traveller tied up his horse there, left sixpence for a fee, and retired from sight, he would find the horse shod on his return.

Wayzgoose. An annual dinner, picnic, or "beanfeast" given to, or held by, those employed in a printing-house. Wayz is an obsolete word for stubble, and a wayzgoose a "stubble goose," properly the crowning dish of the entertainment. See BEANFEAST, ST. MARTIN'S GOOSE.

We. Used of himself by a Sovereign, as representing his subjects, by the editor of a newspaper, as the public representative of a certain body of opinion, and by a writer of an unsigned article, as representing the journal for which he is writing.

Coke, in the Institutes, says the first king that wrote we in his grants was King John. All the kings before him wrote ego (I). This is not correct, as Richard Lion-heart adopted the royal "We." See RYMER'S Fædera.

"We are not amused!" A reproof attributed to Queen Victoria and frequently used as an ironical rebuke. There is no authority whatever for supposing that the Queen made this remark. There is no record of her ever having used the royal "we" in other than official proclamations; nor is the spirit of the words in keeping with Queen Victoria's character.

Weal. A prosperous or sound state of affairs; the A.S. wela, cognate with well. Hence, the common weal, or the public weal, the welfare or prosperity of the community at large.

Weapon Salve. A salve said to cure wounds by sympathy; applied not to the wound, but to the instrument which gave the wound. The direction "Bind the wound and grease the nail" is still common. Sir Kenelm Digby says the salve is sympathetic, and quotes several instances to prove that "as the sword is treated the wound inflicted by it feels. Thus, if the instrument is kept wet, the wound will feel cool; if held to the fire, it will feel hot"; etc.

Weapon-schaw. See WAPINSHAW.

"Wearing of the Green, The." An immensely popular Irish revolutionary song, written about 1798, and known in Irish as "Shan Van Vogh."

Weasel. Weasels suck eggs; hence Shake-speare:—

The weasel Scott

Comes sneaking, and so sucks the princely egg.
Henry V, i, 2.
I can suck melancholy out of a song, as a weasel sucks eggs.—As You Like It, ii, 5.

To catch a weasel asleep. To expect to find a very vigilant person off his guard; to suppose that one who has his weather-eye open cannot see what is passing before him. The vigilant habits of these animals explain the allusion.

Pop Goes the Weasel. The title of this song is said to refer the habit of London hatters of "popping," or pawning, their "weasels," or accessories, on Saturday nights, to buy liquor.

(World War II.) A weasel is a jeep fitted with wide tracks instead of wheels, for carrying stores and personnel over deep mud. The load was reduced to 1½ lb. per square inch, a remarkable achievement.

Weather. A weather breeder. A day of unusual fineness coming suddenly after a series of damp dull ones, especially at the time of the year when such a genial day is not looked for. Such a day is generally followed by foul weather.

Fair-weather friends. Those that stick to you so long as all is going well, but desert you as soon as storms gather round your head and you look as though you might "go under."

I have my weather-eye open. I have my wits about me; I know what I am after. The weather-eye is towards the wind to forecast the weather.

The peasant's weather-glass. A local name for the scarlet pimpernel, which closes its petals at the approach of rain. It is also called the poor man's warning.

Closed is the pink-eyed pimpernel:

'Twill surely rain; I see with sorrow,
Our jaunt must be put off to-morrow.

Dr. Jenner.

To get the weather-gage of a person. To get the advantage over him. A ship is said to have the weather-gage of another when it has got to the windward thereof.

Were the line

Of Rokeby once combined with mine,
I gain the weather-gage of fate.

SCOTT: Rokeby.

To keep the weather of. To get round, or get the better of. A phrase from the seaman's vocabulary.

Mine honour keeps the weather of my fate:

Life every man holds dear; but the dear man

Holds honour far more precious dear than life.

Troilus and Cressida, v, 3.

To make fair weather. To flatter, conciliate, make the best of things.

But I must make fair weather yet awhile,

Till Henry be more weak, and I more strong.

2 Henry VI, v, 1.

Weathercock. By a Papal enactment made in the middle of the 9th century, the figure of a cock was set up on every church steeple as the emblem of St. Peter. The emblem is in allusion to his denial of our Lord thrice before the cock crew twice. On the second crowing of the cock the warning of his Master flashed across his memory, and the repentant apostle "went out and wept bitterly."

A person who is always changing his mind is, figuratively, a weathercock.

There is no feith that may your herte embrace;

But, as a wedecock, that turneth his face

With every wind, ye fare.

CHAUCLER (?): Balade Against Women Unconstant.

Web. See WARP.

The web of life. The destiny of an individual from the cradle to the grave. The allusion is to the three Fates who, according to Roman mythology, spin the thread of life, the pattern being the events which are to occur.

Web and pin. An old name for cataract, or a disease of the eye caused by some excrescence on the ball.

This is the foul fiend Flibbertigibbet . . . he gives the web and pin, squints the eye, and makes the hare-lip.—King Lear, iii, 4.

Wed, Wedding. Wed is Anglo-Saxon, and means a pledge. The ring is the pledge given by the man to avouch that he will perform his part of the contract.

Wedding Anniversaries. Fanciful names have been given to many wedding anniversaries, the popular idea being that they designate the nature of the gifts suitable for the occasion. The following list is fairly complete, and of these very few except the twenty-fifth and fiftieth are ever noticed.

First ..	Cotton Wedding.
Second ..	Paper Wedding.
Third ..	Leather Wedding.
Fifth ..	Wooden Wedding.
Seventh ..	Woollen Wedding.
Tenth ..	Tin Wedding.
Twelfth ..	Silk and Fine Linen Wedding.
Fifteenth ..	Crystal Wedding.
Twentieth ..	China Wedding.
Twenty-fifth ..	Silver Wedding.
Thirtieth ..	Pearl Wedding.
Fortieth ..	Ruby Wedding.
Fiftieth ..	Golden Wedding.
Seventy-fifth ..	Diamond Wedding.

The sixtieth anniversary is often reckoned the "Diamond Wedding" in place of the seventy-fifth; as the sixtieth year of Queen Victoria's reign was her "Diamond Jubilee."

Wedding Finger. The fourth finger of the left hand. Macrobius says the thumb is too busy to be set apart, the forefinger and little finger are only half protected, the middle finger is called medicus, and is too opprobrious for the purpose of honour, so the only finger left is the pronubus.

Aulus Gellius tells us that Appianus asserts in his Egyptian books that a very delicate nerve runs from the fourth finger of the left hand to the heart, on which account this finger is used for the marriage ring.

The finger on which this ring [the wedding-ring] is to be worn is the fourth finger of the left hand, next unto the little finger; because by the received opinion of the learned . . . in ripping up and anatomising men's bodies, there is a vein of blood, called vena amoris, which passeth from that finger to the heart.—HENRY SWINBURNE: Treaties of Spousals (1680).

In the Roman Catholic Church, the thumb and first two fingers represent the Trinity; thus the bridegroom says, "In the name of the Father," and touches the thumb; "In the name of the Son," and touches the first finger; and "in the name of the Holy Ghost" he touches the long or second finger, with the word "Amen" he then puts it on the third finger and leaves it there. In some countries the wedding-ring is worn on the right hand; this was the custom generally in England until the end of the 16th century, and among Roman Catholics until much later.

In the Hereford, York, and Salisbury missals, the ring is directed to be put first on the thumb, then on the first finger, then on the long finger, and lastly on the ring-finger, quia in illo digito est quedam vena procedens usque ad cor.

Wedlock. This word comes from Old English wæd, a pledge, and lac, a promise, the whole meaning the marriage vow. It does not, therefore, imply the unopenable lock of marriage, as has sometimes been supposed.

Wednesday. Woden-es or Odin-es Day, called by the French "Mercredi" (Mercury's Day). The Persians regard it as a "red-letter day," because the moon was created on the fourth day (Gen. i, 14-19).

Weeds. The mourning worn by a widow; from A.S. wæde, a garment. Spenser speaks of—
A goodly lady clad in hunter's weed.

Faerie Queene, II, iii, 21.

Shakespeare has—

And there the snake throws her enamell'd skin,

Weed wide enough to wrap a fairy in.

Midsummer Night's Dream, ii, 1.

And in Timon of Athens (i, 1) we get the modern meaning—

Hail, Rome, victorious in thy mourning weeds!

Week, Days of the. It is curious that while we owe the names of all the months to Rome, those of the days are Anglo-Saxon.

Sunday (A.S. Sunnandæg), day of the sun.

Monday (A.S. Monandæg), day of the moon.

Tuesday (A.S. Tiwesdæg), from Tiw, the god of war.

Wednesday (A.S. Wodnesdæg), from Odin the god of storms.

Thursday (A.S. Thuresdæg), day of Thor, the god of thunder.

Friday (A.S. Frīgedæg), day of Freya, goddess of marriage.

Saturday (A.S. Saterdag: Lat. Dies Saturnus), day of Saturn, the god of time.

A week of Sundays. A long time; an indefinite period.

Weep. Weeper. In the old-fashioned, formal style of funerals—only abandoned with the opening of this century—undertakers' attendants (called mutes) and the principal male mourners wore long streamers of black material hanging from the hatband. These were commonly known as weepers. In humorous allusion to these the long side whiskers in fashion in the 1860s were called Piccadilly Weepers.

Weeping. A notion long prevailed in this country that it augured ill for future married happiness if the bride did not weep profusely at the wedding.

As no witch could shed more than three tears, and those from her left eye only, a copious flow of tears gave assurance to the husband that the lady had not "plighted her troth" to Satan, and was no witch.

The Weeping Philosopher. Heraclitus (d. about 475 B.C.), so called because he grieved at the folly of man.

The Weeping Saint. St. Swithin (q.v.), because of the tradition of forty days' rain if it rains on July 15th.

To go by Weeping Cross. To suffer and repent of one's misdeeds. There are said to have been crosses called thus at Oxford, Shrewsbury, and Stafford.

The time will come when coming home by weeping crosse, thou shalt confesse, that it is better to be at home in the cave of an Hermit than abroad in the court of an Emperor.—LYLY: Euphues and his England (1580).

Weigh (A.S. wegan, to carry). To weigh anchor. To raise the anchor preparatory to sailing.

Under weigh. A solecism for under way. See WAY.

Weighed in the balance and found wanting. Tested, and proved to be at fault, or a failure. The phrase is from Daniel's interpretation of the vision of Belshazzar (Dan. v, 27).

A dead weight. See DEAD.

A weight-for-age race. A sort of handicap (q.v.), in which the weights carried are apportioned according to certain conditions. Horses of the same age carry similar weights, cæteris paribus.

Welch. An old spelling of Welsh; still retained in the name of the Welch Regiment.

Welfare Work. The organized work undertaken by carefully trained personnel to promote the well-being of factory workers, the employees of large businesses, etc. It is extended to many activities such as hospital almoners, police-court missionaries, and so forth, as well as to many tasks that have hitherto been left to the exertions of charity.

Well. Well-beloved. Charles VI of France, le Bien-aimé (1368, 1380-1422); also applied to Louis XV.

Well-founded Doctor. Ægidius de Columna. (d. 1316.)

Welland Canal. A Canadian waterway, named from the Welland River, running from Port Dalhousie on Lake Ontario to Port Colborne, on Lake Erie, a length of 27 miles. It contains eight locks and enables vessels of not more than 325 feet in length to pass from lake to lake.

Wellington. The Duke of Wellington (1769-1852) left his name to two kinds of boot, a tree (of the sequoia family—the Wellingtonia), and as a term in cards. Men's riding-boots are called Wellingtons, with the front coming over the knee, and a shorter top-boot coming to just below the knee and often made of rubber. Half-Wellingtons are shorter boots of which the foot is made of patent leather, and the top part (of inferior and softer material) extends halfway up the calf inside the tight trousers of British army mess dress. In "Nap" a call of Wellington doubles Napoleon—i.e. the caller has to take all five tricks and wins (or loses) double stakes.

Welsh. Pertaining to Wales (q.v.), i.e. the country of foreigners (A.S. walse, foreign). Welsch is German for foreign, and the Germans call Italy Welschland. Taffy is the generic name for a Welshman; from David, the patron saint.

Welsh harp. The musical instrument of the ancient Welsh bards; a large harp with three rows of strings, two tuned diatonically in unison, the third supplying the chromatic sharps and flats.

Welsh Main. In cock-fighting, another term for a battle royal (q.v.).

Welsh mortgage. A pledge of land in which no day is fixed for redemption.

Welsh rabbit. Cheese melted and spread over buttered toast. Rabbit is not a corruption of rare-bit; the term is on a par with "mock-turtle," "Bombay duck," etc.

Welsheer. A race-course pest who sets up as a bookmaker, and, when he sees the "book" is against him, makes off without paying out. Also applied to a punter who absconds without paying his losses. Hence, to welsh, to do this. The term is modern (though the practice is as old as horse-racing), and its origin is unknown.

Welter-weight. A boxer between light and middle weight, about 147 lb. In racing the term is applied to any extra heavy weight.

Welt-politik (velt pol' i tik). The German phrase (world politics) for the policy a nation pursues in its relations with the world at large.

Wen. The Great Wen. So William Cobbett (1762-1835) in his Rural Rides called London, meaning that it was an abnormal growth, a blotch on the land.

Wends. Slavic people inhabiting Saxony, Prussia, and Eastern Germany generally. The word is probably connected with wander.

Werewolf. See WERWOLF.

Wergild (wēr' gild). The "blood-money" (wer, man, gild, payment) paid in Anglo-Saxon times by the kindred of the slayer to the kindred of the slain to avoid a blood-feud in cases of murder or manslaughter. There was a fixed scale:—1,200 shillings (about £24) for a freeman, 200 shillings for a villain, and 40 pence for a serf.

Werther (wēr' ter). The sentimental hero of Goethe's romance, The Sorrows of Werther (1774), who was so overcome by his unrequited love for Lotte that he took his life. As Thackeray travestied the story—

Charlotte, having seen his body
Borne before her on a shutter,
Like a well-conducted person,
Went on cutting bread and butter.

Werwolf (wēr' wulf). A "man-wolf" (A.S. wer, man), i.e. a man who, according to mediæval belief, was turned—or could at will turn himself—into a wolf (the loup-garou of France). It had the appetite of a wolf, and roamed about at night devouring infants and sometimes exhuming corpses. Its skin was proof against shot or steel, unless the weapon had been blessed in a chapel dedicated to St. Hubert.

This belief was once common to almost all Europe, and still lingers in Brittany, Limousin, Auvergne, Servia, Wallachia, and White Russia; while in the 15th century a council of theologians, convoked by the Emperor Sigismund, decided that the werewolf was a reality.

The study of lycanthropy, i.e. of wolf-men, is, indeed, an important branch of the science of comparative religion. At one time or another the belief in animal-men has been prevalent in every part of the world, tigers, leopards, hyenas and other ferocious animals being thus associated with the magic.

Ovid tells the story of Lycaon, King of Acadia, turned into a wolf because he tested the divinity of Jupiter by serving up to him a "hash of human flesh"; Herodotus describes the Neuri as having the power of assuming once a year the shape of wolves; Pliny relates that one of the family of Antæus was chosen annually, by lot, to be transformed into a wolf, in which shape he continued for nine years; and St. Patrick, we are told, converted Vereticus, King of Wales, into a wolf.

Werewolves. (World War II). Term coined by the Germans for the fanatical saboteurs who, they said, were going to carry on harassing tactics against the Allies after the defeat of Germany in the field.

Wesleyan. A member of the Nonconformist church founded by John Wesley (1703-91) about 1739.

Wessex. The ancient kingdom of the West Saxons; it included Hants, Dorset, Wilts, Somerset, Surrey, Gloucestershire, and Bucks.

The Novelist of Wessex. Thomas Hardy (1840-1928), the scenes of whose novels are laid in this country.

West. The West End. The fashionable quarter of London, lying between Charing Cross and the western boundary of Hyde Park. Hence West-end style, ultra-fashionable.

To go west. Of persons, to die; of things, to be lost, rendered useless, never obtained, as My chance of promotion has gone west.

The phrase came into very wide use during World War I, but it is older than that, and originated in the United States, the reference being to the setting sun, which "goes west," and then expires. The idea is very old; it occurs in a Greek proverb, and cp. Tennyson's—

My purpose holds
To sail beyond the sunset, and the paths
Of all the western stars, until I die. Ulysses.

West, Mae. See MAE WEST.

The Western Church. The Roman Catholic Church, which, after the Great Schism in the 9th century, acknowledged the headship of the Pope.

The Western Empire. The western division of the Roman Empire having Rome as B.D.—31 capital, after the division into an Eastern and Western Empire by Theodosius in 395.

Wet. Slang for a drink; hence, to have a wet, to have a drink, and to wet one's whistle, meaning the same thing. This last is a very old phrase; Chaucer has "So was her joly whistle wel y-wet" (Reeve's Tale, 235), and in No. xiii of the Towneley Plays (about 1388) is Had she oones wett hyr Whystyll she could syng full clere Hyr pater noster.

A wet blanket. See BLANKET.

Wetback. An illegal immigrant to U.S.A. from Mexico. The term originates in the fact that such interlopers usually had to swim the Rio Grande.

Wet bob. At Eton a wet bob is a boy who goes in for boating; a dry bob one who chooses cricket.

Wet nurse. A woman employed to suckle children not her own.

W. H. Mr. When Shakespeare's Sonnets appeared in 1609 they were dedicated to a Mr. W. H., called their "onlie begetter." The identity of this friend of Shakespeare's has puzzled critics and biographers ever since, and is still unknown. Numerous names have been suggested, among them William Herbert, 3rd Earl of Pembroke, one of the dedicatees of the First Folio Shakespeare, and Henry Wriothesley, 3rd Earl of Southampton, to whom Venus and Adonis and Lucrece were dedicated. Other enquirers have preferred to postulate, from the internal evidence of the sonnets, the existence of an otherwise unknown William Hughes.

Whale. Very like a whale. Very much like a cock-and-bull story. Hamlet chaffs Polonius by comparing a cloud to a camel, and then to a weasel, and when the courtier assents Hamlet adds, "Or like a whale"; to which Polonius answers, "Very like a whale" (Act iii, 2).

In American slang, something very fine or big, e.g. a whale of a lot, a great amount.

Whalebone. See MISNOMERS.

White as whalebone. An old simile; whalebone is far from white. Our forefathers seemed to confuse the walrus with the whale; and "white as whalebone" is really a blunder for "white as walrus-ivory."

What we Gave we Have. The epitaph on "the Good Earl of Courtenay" (see Gibbon's Decline and Fall, vol. vi, Ch. 61):—

What wee gave, wee have;
What wee spent, wee had;
What wee left, wee lost.

is a free rendering of Martial's—
Extra fortunam est quiddam donatur amicis
Quas dederis, solas semper habebis opes.

There are similar epitaphs in many churches; one in St. George's, Doncaster, runs thus:—

How now, who is here?
I, Robin of Doncastere
And Margaret, my feere,
That I spent, that I had;
That I gave, that I have;
That I left, that I lost.

He knows what's what. He is a shrewd fellow not to be imposed on. One of the senseless questions of logic was Quid est quid?

He knew what's what, and that's as high as metaphysic wit can fly.

BUTLER: Hudibras, Pt. 1, canto 1.

What-not. In Victorian drawing-room furniture a small stand with shelves for bibelots and knick-knacks of all sorts. Colloquially the phrase has come to be synonymous with "and so forth"—e.g. "Photos, sketches and what-not."

Whatever are you at? So Dr. W. G. Grace is reported to have called out when, in 1896, Ernest Jones, the Australian fast bowler, bowled through W. G.'s beard.

Wheatear. The stonechat, a bird with a white tail. The name has no connexion with either wheat or ear, but it is the A.S. hwit, white, ears—still in vulgar use as arse—the buttocks or rump. The French name of the bird, culblanc, signifies exactly the same thing.

Wheel. The invention of the wheel dates from late prehistoric times, its origin having been probably in Eastern Europe or Asia Minor. It was not known to the peoples of the Far East until much later, for the Asiatic emigrants to North America and the ancient civilizations of Central America knew nothing of this invention upon which the world's progress has so largely advanced. Emblematical of St. Catharine (q.v.)

St. Donatus bears a wheel set round with lights.

St. Euphemia and St. Willigis both carry wheels.

St. Quintin is sometimes represented with a broken wheel at his feet.

Broken on the wheel. See BREAK.

The wheel is come to full circle. Just retribution has followed. The line is from Shakespeare's King Lear, v, 3.

The wheel of Fortune. Fortuna, the goddess, is represented on ancient monuments with a wheel in her hand, emblematical of her inconstancy.

Though Fortune's malice overthrow my state,
My mind exceeds the compass of her wheel.

SHAKESPEARE: 3 Henry VI, iv, 3.

To put a spoke in one's wheel. See SPOKE.

Wherewithal. In older writings this is a form of wherewith as in Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way.—Ps. cxix, 9.

Colloquially it is now used as a noun, with the connotation of money.

Whetstone. See ACCIIUS NÆVIUS.

Lying for the whetstone. Said of a person who is grossly exaggerating or falsifying a statement. One of the Whitsun amusements of our forefathers was the lie-wage or lie-match; he who could tell the greatest lie was rewarded with a whetstone to sharpen his wit. The nature of these contests may be illustrated by the following: one of the combatants declared he could see a fly on the top of a church steeple;

the other replied, "Oh, yes, I saw him wink his eye."

The Whetstone of Witte. A famous treatise on algebra (1556) by Robert Recorde. The old name for algebra was the "Cossic Art," and Cos ingenii rendered into English is "the Whetstone of Wit." In Scott's Fortunes of Nigel the maid told the belated traveller that her master had "no other books but her young mistress's Bible . . . and her master's Whetstone of Witte, by Robert Recorde."

Whig. The political party opposed to the Tories (q.v.); roughly speaking, the party in favour of gradual change towards more democratic government.

The name came into use in the later 17th century, and was supplanted by "Liberal" (q.v.) in the early 19th. It is from obsolete whiggamore, a nickname for certain Scots who came to buy corn at Leith, from whiggam, an old Scottish equivalent to our Gee up! addressed to horses, and was originally applied to the Covenanters.

The south-west counties of Scotland have seldom corn enough to serve them all the year round, and, the northern parts producing more than they used, those in the west went in summer to buy at Leith the stores that came from the north. From the word whiggam, used in driving their horses, all that drove were called the whiggamors, contracted into whigs. Now, in the year before the news came down of Duke Hamilton's defeat, the ministers animated their people to rise and march to Edinburgh; and they came up, marching at the head of their parishes with an unheard-of fury, praying and preaching all the way as they came. The Marquis of Argyll and his party came and headed them, they being about 6,000. This was called the "Whiggamors' Inroad"; and ever after that all who opposed the court came in contempt to be called whigs. From Scotland the word was brought into England, where it is now one of our unhappy terms of disunion.—BISHOP BURNET: Own Times (1723).

The Whig Party in the U.S.A. was active from about 1824 to 1854 under the leadership of Henry Clay and Daniel Webster.

The Whig Bible. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Whip. A member of Parliament appointed unofficially, and without salary (as such), whose duty is to see that the members of his party vote at important divisions, and to discipline them if they do not attend, or vote against the party. The Whips give notice to members that a motion is expected when their individual vote may be desirable. The circular, or whip, runs: "A motion is expected when your vote is 'earnestly' required." If the word "earnestly" has only one red-ink dash under it the receiver is expected to come, if it has two dashes it means that he ought to come, if it has three dashes, or is a "three-line whip," it means that he must come, if four dashes it means "stay away at your peril." These notices are technically called Red whips (Annual Register, 1877, p. 86).

A whip-round. An impromptu collection for some benevolent object.

The whip with six strings. See under SIX.

Whip-dog Day. October 18th, St. Luke's Day. Brand tells us (Popular Antiquities, ii, 273) that it is so called because a priest about to celebrate mass on St. Luke's Day happened to drop the pyx, which was snatched up by a dog.

Whipper-snapper. An inexperienced—and often cheeky—young man. The word probably derives from whip snapper, one who has nothing to do but crack a whip.

Whipping Boy. A boy kept to be whipped when a prince deserved chastisement. Mungo Murray stood for Charles I, Barnaby Fitzpatrick for Edward VI (Fuller: Church History, ii, 342). When Henry IV of France abjured Protestantism and was received into the Catholic Church in 1595, two ambassadors (D'Ossat and Du Perron, afterwards cardinals) were sent to Rome and knelt in the portico of St. Peter, singing the Miserere. At each verse a blow with a switch was given on their shoulders.

Whisky. See USQUEBAUGH. The light one-horse gig of this name from whisk, to flourish a thing about with a quick movement.

Whisky Insurrection. A riotous outbreak in Western Pennsylvania, in 1794, in protest against the excise laws on spirits. In the country districts many small stills were worked by private persons, and when the excise officers attempted to deal with these, they were repulsed with violence and organized resistance. President Washington sent the militia to repress this outbreak and enforce the law, and the insurrection was put down without bloodshed.

Whisper. Pig's whisper. See PTG.

To give the whisper. To give the tip, the warning; to pass some bit of secret information.

Whist. The card game originated in England (16th cent.) and was first called Triumph (whence trump), then Ruff or Honours, and then, early in the 17th century, Whisk, in allusion to the sweeping up of the cards. Whist, the later name, appears in Butler's Hudibras (1663), and was adopted through confusion with Whist! meaning Hush! Silence!

Let nice Piquette the boast of France remain,
And studious Ombre be the pride of Spain!
Invention's praise shall England yield to none,
While she can call delightful Whist her own.

ALEXANDER THOMSON: Whist (2nd edn., 1792).

Whistle. To whistle down the wind. To defame a person. The cognate phrase "blown upon" is more familiar. The idea is to whistle down the wind that the reputation of the person may be blown upon.

To whistle for it. It was an old superstition among sailors that when a ship was becalmed a wind could be raised by whistling. By a perversion of sense the phrase "You can whistle for it" now means "You won't get it."

Worth the whistle. Worth calling; worth inviting; worth notice. The dog is worth the pains of whistling for. Thus Heywood, in one of his dialogues consisting entirely of proverbs, says, "It is a poor dog that is not worth the whistling." Goneril says to Albany—
I have been worth the whistle.

King Lear, iv, 2.

You paid too dearly for your whistle. You paid dearly for something you fancied, but found that it did not answer your expectation. The allusion is to a story told by Dr. Franklin of his nephew, who set his mind on a common whistle, which he bought of a boy for four times its value.

To wet one's whistle. To drink.

Whit Sunday. White Sunday. The seventh Sunday after Easter, to commemorate the descent of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost. In the primitive Church the newly baptized were white from Easter to Pentecost, and were called albatii (white-robed). The last of the Sundays, which was also the chief festival, was called emphatically Dominica in Albis (Sunday in White).

As an old play on the name it was called Wit or Wisdom Sunday, the day when the Apostles were filled with wisdom by the Holy Ghost.

This day Whit-sunday is cald,
For wisdom and wit sevene fald,
Was zoned to the Apostles as this day.
Cambr. Univ. MSS., Dd. 1, 1, p. 234.

We ought to kepe this our Witsunday because the law of God was then of the Holy Wyght or Ghost delured gostly vnto vs.—Taverner (1540).

This day is called Wytsonday because the Holy Ghost brought wytte and wysdom into Christis disciples . . . and filled them full of gostly wytte.—In die Pentecostis (printed by Wynkyn de Worde).

Whitsun farthings. See QUADRAGESIMALS.

White denotes purity, simplicity, and candour; innocence, truth, and hope. See COLOURS, SYMBOLISM OF.

The ancient Druids, and indeed the priests generally of antiquity, used to wear white vestments. The magi also wore white robes.

The head of Osiris, in Egypt, was adorned with a white tiara; all his ornaments were white; and his priests were clad in white.

The priests of Jupiter, and the Flamen Dialis of Rome, were clothed in white, and wore white hats. The victims offered to Jupiter were white. The Roman festivals were marked with white chalk, and at the death of a Cæsar the national mourning was white; white horses were sacrificed to the sun, white oxen were selected for sacrifice by the Druids, and white elephants are held sacred in Siam.

The Persians affirm that the divinities are habited in white.

Whitebait Dinner. A dinner of Cabinet Ministers and prominent politicians that, until the early 1890s, was held at Blackwall or Greenwich toward the close of the parliamentary session. The time of meeting was Trinity Monday, or as near Trinity Monday as circumstances would allow.

Yesterday the Cabinet Ministers went down the River in the Ordnance barge to Lovegrove's "West India Dock Tavern," Blackwall, to partake of their annual fish dinner. Covers were laid for thirty-five gentlemen.—The Times, Sept. 10, 1835.

To hit the white. To be quite right, make a good shot. The phrase is from the old days of archery, the white being the inner circle of the target—the bull's eye.

The white bird. Conscience, or the soul of man. The Mohammedans have preserved the old Roman idea in the doctrine that the souls of the just lie under the throne of God, like white birds, till the resurrection morn. Cp. DOVE.

Whiteboys. A secret agrarian association organized in Ireland about the year 1760. So called because they wore white shirts in their nightly expeditions. In 1787 a new association appeared, the members of which called themselves "Right-boys." The Whiteboys were originally called Levellers (q.v.), from their throwing down fences and levelling enclosures.

The White Brethren. A sect of Catholic reformers that appeared early in the 15th century. Mosheim says (Bk. ii, p. 2, ch. v) a certain priest came from the Alps with an immense concourse of followers, all dressed in white linen. They marched through several provinces, following a cross borne by their leader. Boniface X ordered their leader to be burnt, and the multitude dispersed.

The White Cockade. The badge worn by the followers of Charles Edward, the Young Pretender.

White collar worker. The professional or clerical worker whose calling demands a certain nicety of attire.

The White Company. A band of French cut-throats organized by Bertrand du Guesclin in 1366, and led against Pedro the Cruel; so called because they wore a white cross on the shoulder. The name had previously (13th cent.) been given to a gang of assassins led by Folquet, the villainous Bishop of Toulouse, who massacred all suspected of heresy.

White elephant. See ELEPHANT.

White-face. A nickname for a man from Hereford; from the white faces of Herefordshire cattle.

To show the white feather. To show cowardice; a phrase from the cockpit when a gamecock is getting the worst of the fight and wants to stop, he makes the fact known by lifting his hackle—a long narrow feather on the neck. The under rim of the hackle is edged with white feathers.

White flag. An all-white flag is universally used as the signal of surrender or of desiring to parley. A messenger bearing a white flag is by international decency immune from harm.

White Friars. The Carmelites (q.v.), so called because of the white mantle they wear over a brown habit. One of their houses, founded in London on the south side of Fleet Street in 1241, gives the name to that district, and was for many centuries a sanctuary.

White harvest. A late harvest, when the ground is white of a morning, with hoar frost.

The White Horse. The standard of the ancient Saxons; hence the emblem of Kent. A galloping white horse is the device of the House of Hanover, and it is from this that many public houses bear the sign of "The White Horse."

On Uffington Hill, Berks, there is formed in the chalk an enormous white horse, supposed to have been cut there after the battle in which Ethelred and Alfred defeated the Danes (871). This rude design is about 374 ft. long, and 1,000 ft. above the sea-level. It may be seen twelve or fifteen miles off, and gives its name to the Vale of White Horse, west of Abingdon.

An annual ceremony was once held, called "Scouring the White Horse."

Foam-crested waves are popularly called White horses.

Now the great winds shoreward blow,
Now the salt tides seaward flow;
Now the wild white horses play,
Champ and chafe and toss in the spray.

MATTHEW ARNOLD: The Forsaken Merman.

White House. The presidential mansion in Washington, D.C. It is a building of freestone, painted white. The cornerstone was laid by Washington, and the house was remodelled in 1902. Figuratively, it means the Presidency of the U.S.A.

White Lady. A sort of ghostly spirit in many countries, the appearance of which generally forebodes death in the house. It is a relic of Teutonic mythology, representing Holda, or Berchta, the goddess who received the souls of maidens and young children.

German legend says that when the castle of Neuhaus, Bohemia, was being built a white lady appeared to the workmen and promised them a sweet soup and carp on the completion of the castle. In remembrance thereof, these dainties were for long given to the poor of Bohemia on Maundy Thursday. She is also said to have been heard to speak on two occasions, once in December, 1628, when she said, "I wait for judgment!" and once at Neuhaus, when she said to the princes, "Tis ten o'clock."

The first recorded instance of this apparition was in the 16th century, and the name given to the lady is Bertha von Rosenberg. She last appeared, it is said, in 1879, just prior to the death of Prince Waldemar. She carries a bunch of keys at her side, and is always dressed in white.

In Normandy the White Ladies lurk in ravines, fords, bridges, and other narrow passes, and ask the passenger to dance. If they receive a courteous answer, well; but if a refusal, they seize the churl and fling him into a ditch, where thorns and briars may serve to teach him gentleness of manners.

The most famous of these ladies is La Dame d'Aprigny, who used to occupy the site of the present Rue St. Quentin, at Bayeux, and La Dame Abonde.

One kind of these is the Italians Fata name; The French call Fée; we Sybils; and the same Others White Dames, and those that them have seen, Night Ladies some, of which Habundia's queen, Hierarchie, viii, p. 507.

White League. A name of the Ku Klux Klan (q.v.).

A white lie. An excusable or pardonable untruth.

White-livered. Mean or cowardly. It was an old notion that the livers of cowards were bloodless.

How many cowards, whose hearts are all as false
As stars of sand, wear yet upon their chins
The beards of Hercules and frowning Mars,
Who, inward search'd, have livers white as milk!
Merchant of Venice, iii, 2.

A white man. A thoroughly straightforward and honourable man.

White magic. Sorcery in which the devil was not invoked and played no part; opposed to black magic (q.v.).

White Man's Burden. The duty supposed to be thrust on the white races, especially the British, to educate and govern the untutored coloured races for their own welfare. The phrase arose during the imperial fervour of the later 19th century:—

Take up the White Man's Burden—
Send forth the best you breed
Go bind your sons to exile
To serve the captives' need.

KIPLING.

White Man's Grave. The unhealthy areas of equatorial West Africa, especially Sierra Leone.

The White Merle. A white fairy bird of old Basque folklore, whose singing would restore sight to the blind.

A white night. A sleepless night; the French have the phrase Passer une nuit blanche.

White Paper. A publication issued by the British government giving information on matters of interest, reports of committees, etc., and on sale to the public. Since 1919 Government papers have been marked "Cmd.", command.

White rent. Rent payable in silver money. An annual duty of eightpence payable by every tin-miner in Devon and Cornwall to the Duke of Cornwall as lord of the soil.

The White Rose. The House of York, whose emblem it was (see under Rose).

White Rose League. A society adhering in theory to the claims of the House of Stuart to the throne of Great Britain. It is of a purely sentimental and historical nature, harbouring no disloyalty to the Crown.

White Satin. An old nickname for gin.

White Slave. A woman who is sold or forced into prostitution. The problem of White Slave Traffic, especially to South America, was taken up vigorously by the League of Nations, and in some measure the evil was mitigated through its exertions.

A white squall. One which produces no diminution of light, in contradistinction to a black squall, in which the clouds are black and heavy.

Days marked with a white stone. Days to be remembered with gratification. The Romans used a white stone or piece of chalk to mark their lucky days on the calendar. Days that were unlucky they marked with charcoal (cp. RED-LETTER DAY).

White tincture. The alchemist's name for a preparation that should convert any base metal into silver. It was also called the Stone of the Second Order, the Little Elixir, and the Little Magisterium (cp. RED TINCTURE).

The White Tsar. An epithet of the former Tsars of Russia, as Tsars of Muscovy; the King of Muscovy was called the White King from the robes which he wore. The King of Poland was called the Black King.

Whitewash. Excuses made in palliation of bad conduct; a false colouring given to a person's character or memory to counteract disreputable allegations.

The term is also applied to the clearance by a bankrupt of his debts, not by paying them, but by judicial process.

White wine. Any wine of a light colour, not red; as champagne, hock, sauternes, moselle, etc.

White witch. One who practised white magic (q.v.) only.

Whitechapel. A quarter in the East End of London. A Whitechapel cart is a light, two-wheeled spring cart, as used by small tradesmen for delivering goods.

Whittington, Dick. Sir Richard Whittington, "thrice Lord Mayor of London," about whom the well-known nursery story is told, was born about 1358, the son of Sir William de Whityngdon, lord of the manor of Pauntley, Gloucester. Being a younger son and unprovided for, he walked to London, was trained by a relative as a merchant, married his master's daughter and so prospered that he was able to lend Henry IV £1,000—equal to over £30,000 in present money.

He was Lord Mayor of London in 1397, 1406, and 1419, besides being once named by Richard II to succeed a mayor who had died in office. He died in 1423.

The legend that Whittington made his wealth largely through the agency of a cat seems to be founded on a confusion between Fr. achat and Eng. a cat. In the 14th and early 15th centuries trading, or buying and selling at a profit, was known among the educated classes as achat (French for "purchase"), which was written—and probably pronounced—acat (see Riley's Introduction to the Liber Albus).

Another suggestion is that it arose through confusion with the cat, a ship on the Norwegian model, having a narrow stern, projecting quarters, and deep waist, and used in the coal trade. According to tradition, Sir Richard made his money by trading in coals, which he conveyed in his "cat" from Newcastle to London. The black faces of his coalheavers gave rise to the tale about the Moors. But there are Eastern tales of the same kind, and it is probably one of these that became attached to the popular Lord Mayor.

Who dun it. (U.S.A. slang). A crude detective story.

Whoopee (woo pē') (Slang). Upbraidingness, noisy merriment. As an exclamation it is one of excited pleasure.

Wicked. Connected with A.S. wicca, a wizard.

The Wicked Bible. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

The Wicked Prayer Book. Printed 1686, octavo. In the Epistle for the Fourteenth Sunday after Trinity the following passage occurs:—

Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, idolatry . . . they who do these things shall inherit the kingdom of God.

("Shall inherit" should be "shall not inherit.")

Wide. Slang for cunning, artful, or for one who is very wideawake.

Wideawake. Certain felt hats were so called by a pun, because they never had a nap. The term is now applied to any felt hat with a very wide brim.

Wide Boy. The predecessor of the Spiv (q.v.), active in the years 1920-40.

Widow. The. Old slang for the gallows. Also Victorian slang for champagne, from the well-known brand Veuve Clicquot.

Widow bench. An obsolete law term for the share of her husband's estate allowed to a widow over and above her jointure.

The widow's cruse. A small supply of anything which, by good management, is made to go a long way and to be apparently inexhaustible. In allusion to the miracle of the cruse of oil in 2 Kings iv.

Widow's man. Old naval slang for a non-existent seaman whose name was borne on the ship's book, his pay, prize-money, etc., going to Greenwich Hospital or to a fund for widows.

Widow's weeds. See WEEDS.

The Widow at Windsor. The name applied to Queen Victoria by Rudyard Kipling in his Barrack Room Ballad of that name.

Wieland (vē' lānt). Another form of Volund (see WAYLAND), the wonder-working smith of Norse mythology.

Wife. A.S. wif, a woman. The ultimate root of the word is obscure; but it is "certainly not allied to weave (A.S. weafn), as the fable runs" (Skeat).

The old meaning, a woman, still appears in such combinations as fish-wife, housewife, etc., and in the phrase an old wife's tale (see 1 Tim. iv, 7) for an incoherent and unconvincing story.

The Wife-hater Bible. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Wig. A shortened form of periwig (earlier, perwig), from Fr. peruke. In the middle of the 18th century we meet with thirty or forty different names for wigs: as the artichoke, bag, barrister's, bishop's, brush, bush (buzz), buckle, busby, chain, chancellor's, corded, wolf's paw, Count Saxe's mode, the crutch, the cut bob, the detached buckle, the Dalma-hoy (a bob wig worn by tradesmen), the drop, the Dutch, the full, the half natural, the Jan-senist bob, the judge's, the ladder, the long bob, the Louis, the pigeon's wing, the rhinoceros, the rose, the scratch, the she-dragon, the small back, the spinach seed, the staircase, the Welsh, the wild boar's back.

A bigwig. A magnate; in allusion to the large wigs that in the 17th and 18th centuries encumbered the head and shoulders of the aristocracy of England and France. They are still worn by the Lord Chancellor, judges, and barristers; bishops used to wear them in the House of Lords till 1880.

Dash my wig! A mild imprecation, formerly very common.

Fleas are not lobsters, dash my wig.
BUTLER: Hudibras.

Scratch wig. A small one just large enough to cover the bald patch, as opposed to the full-bottomed wig.

Wigs on the green. A serious disagreement likely to lead to a scrimmage; a rumpus.

Wigging. A scolding, a reprimand. This word may be connected with wig, but it is not certain.

Wiggen tree. See ROWAN.

Wight (wit). An Old English word meaning a person, a human being. It chiefly survives in the phrase "a luckless wight," a man for whom everything goes wrong.

Wigwam (wig' wōm). An American Indian term for a house or tent.

Wild. Wildcat. An American phrase for any unauthorized activity, as Wildcat Strike, an unofficial strike; wildcat cartridges, shot-gun cartridges made privately by gunsmiths or amateurs, not the standard product of a commercial firm.

A wild-cat scheme. A rash and hazardous financial venture; a speculation in which one would have about as much chance of making a profit as of catching a wild-cat in the woods.

Wild fire. A very old English description of a composition of inflammable materials that catch fire quickly. It is now used figuratively in the phrase To catch like wildfire, to take on with the public instantaneously.

The wild huntsman. A spectral hunter of mediæval legend who, with a pack of spectral dogs, frequents certain forests and occasionally appears to mortals. One account has it that he was a Jew who would not suffer Jesus to drink out of a horse-trough, but pointed to some water in a hoof-print as good enough for "such an enemy of Moses."

The Germans locate him in the Black Forest; the French in the Forest of Fontainebleau—and confuse him with St. Hubert; and in England he became Herne the Hunter (q.v.), once a keeper in Windsor Forest, who "walks" in winter time, about midnight, and blasts trees and cattle. He wears horns, and rattles a chain in a "most hideous manner" (Merry Wives of Windsor, iv, 4).

To lead one a wild-goose chase. To beguile one with false hopes, or put one on an impracticable pursuit, or after something that is not worth the chase. A wildgoose is very hard to catch, and very little use when caught.

To sow one's wild oats. See OAT.

Wild men. A term often applied, in politics, to intransigents, the extremists of either party who will not accommodate their views and actions to changing conditions or public opinion.

Women who took an active part in the movement for obtaining votes and political recognition were sometimes called wild women.

Wild West. The western frontier of the U.S.A. before a stable government was in being. The phrase really refers to the days of the mid-19th century before the whole continent was known and developed, and the ever-shifting frontiers of civilization in the west were the resort of desperadoes, cattle-thieves, etc. The term is often applied to stories of adventure dealing with that period and those localities.

Wilderness. To go into the wilderness. A figurative description of being deprived of political office through a change of government.

Wilfrid. St. A noble of Northumbria, who became Abbot of Ripon in 661, and in 705 Bishop of Hexham. It was he who at the Synod of Whitby (664) succeeded in substituting the Roman uses and their observance of Easter in England for the Celtic. For many centuries his banner was carried to the wars.

St. Wilfrid's Needle. A narrow passage in the crypt of Ripon cathedral, built by Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury, and said to have been used to test a woman's chastity, as none but a virgin was able to squeeze through.

Wilgelfortis. St. See UNCUMBER.

Wilhelmstrasse (vil' helm stra se). A street in Berlin where the principal government offices, including the Foreign Office, were situated. The term is usually applied to the German Foreign Office and its policy. In the Allied bombing of Berlin in World War II most of the street was levelled with the ground.

Will-o'-the-wisp. See FRIAR'S LANTHORN; IGNIS FATUUS.

William. One of the most popular of Christian names; Fr. Guillaume, Ger. Wilhelm, it means a protector; literally, a resolute helmet—Ger. wille helm.

The william pear. Properly the William's pear, or Bon Chrétien is so called from the name of its introducer into England. For a like reason it is known in the U.S.A. as the Bartlett Pear. Sweet william is an old English name for an old English flower, Dianthus barbatus, a member of the pink family.

William of Cloudeslie. A noted outlaw and famous archer of the "north countrie." See CLYM OF THE CLOUGH.

William of Wykeham. See WYKEHAMIST.

William the Silent. See SILENT.

Of the many saints of this name the following are perhaps the most noteworthy:—

St. William of Aquitaine. A soldier of Charlemagne's, who helped to chase the Saracens from Languedoc. In 808 he renounced the world, and died 812. He is usually represented as a mailed soldier.

St. William of Maleval. A French nobleman who went as pilgrim to Jerusalem, and on his return retired to the desert of Maleval, where he died in 1157. The Guillemites a branch of the Benedictine order, was founded by Albert, one of his disciples, and named in his honour. He is depicted in a Benedictine's habit, with armour lying beside him.

St. William of Montpelier is represented with a lily growing from his mouth, with the words Ave Maria in gold letters on the flower.

St. William of Norwich was the child said to have been crucified by the Jews in 1137. He is represented crowned with thorns, or crucified, or holding a hammer and nails in his hands, or wounded in his side with a knife (see Drayton's Polyolbion, song xxiv).

In Percy's Reliques (Bk. 1, 3) there is a tale of a lad named Hew, son of Lady Helen, of Merryland town (Milan), who was allured by a Jew's daughter with an apple. She stuck him with a penknife, rolled him in lead, and cast him into a well. Lady Helen went in search of her boy, and the child's ghost cried out from the bottom of the well—

The lead is wondrous heavy, mither,

The well is wondrous deip;

A keen penknife sticks in my heirt, mither;

A word I dauna speik.

St. William of York (d. 1154) was a nephew of King Stephen, and became Archbishop of York in 1140. He was canonized by Honorius III about 1220 on account of the many miracles reported to have been performed at his tomb.

Willie-Wastle. This child's game is said to be named from William Wastle, governor of Hume Castle, Haddington. When Cromwell, so the story goes, sent a summons to him to surrender, he replied—

Here I, Willie Wastle,
Stand firm in my castle,
And all the dogs in the town
Shan't pull Willie Wastle down.

Willie's Rooms. See ALMACK'S.

Willow. To handle the willow. To be a cricket-player. Cricket-bats are made of willow; hence the game is sometimes called King Willow (see the Harrow school song of this name).

To wear the willow. To go into mourning, especially for a sweetheart or bride.

The willow, especially the weeping willow, has from time immemorial been associated with sorrow and taken as an emblem of desolation or desertion. Fuller says, "The willow is a sad tree, whereof such as have lost their love make their mourning garlands," and the psalmist tells us that the Jews in captivity hung their harps upon the willows in sign of mourning (cxxxvii).

Desdemona says in Othello (iv, 3):—

My mother had a maid call'd Barbara;
She was in love, and he she lov'd prov'd mad
And did forsake her; she had a song of "willow";
An old thing 'twas, but it expressed her fortune,
And she died singing it.

And then comes the song—

The poor soul sat sighing by a sycamore tree,

Sing all a green willow;

Her hand on her bosom, her head on her knee,

Sing willow, willow, willow;

The fresh streams ran by her, and murmur'd her moans;

Sing willow, willow, willow:

Her salt tears fell from her, and soften'd the stones;

Sing willow, willow, willow.

The Willow Pattern. A favourite design for blue china plates, imitating (but not copying) the Chinese style of porcelain decoration. It was introduced into England by Thomas Turner of Caughley about 1780, when the craze for things Chinese was at its height.

To the right is a mandarin's country seat, two stories high to show the rank and wealth of the possessor; in the foreground a pavilion, in the background an orange-tree, and to the right of the pavilion a peach-tree in full bearing. The estate is enclosed by a wooden fence, and a river crossed by a bridge, at one end of which is the famous willow-tree and at the other the gardener's humble cottage. At the top of the pattern (left-hand side) is an island. The three figures on the bridge are the mandarin and the lovers, the latter also being shown in a boat on the river.

The willow pattern does not illustrate any Chinese story or legend, and is not Chinese in origin.

Will's and Button's Coffee-houses. These once famous resorts of the London wits were both situated in Russell Street, Covent Garden. Will's, at the corner of Bow Street, took its name from Will Urwin, who was already the proprietor in 1660, for Pepys says (October 2nd, 1660) "At Will's I met Mr. Spicer and with him to the abbey." "It was Dryden," says Pope, "who made Will's Coffee House the great resort of wits of his time." According to Dr. Johnson, Dryden had a particular chair to himself which was set by the fire in winter and was carried out for him to the balcony in the summer.

When a mere child Pope was taken to Will's to see the great man, and in after years was himself the centre of a circle of wits there.

On the opposite side of Russell Street was Button's Coffee-house, established in 1712 by Daniel Button, a former servant of Joseph Addison. There Addison held his literary court, attended by Steele, Budgell, Ambrose Philips, Carey, and Davenant.

Further along Russell Street was Tom's, a coffee-house established in 1700 by Thomas West, and in the early years of George III patronized by Garrick, Foote, Dr. Johnson, Goldsmith, and others.

Willy-nilly. Nolens volens; willing or not. Will-he, nill-he, nill being n' (negative), will, just as Lat. nolens is n'-volens.

Willy-willy. The Australian aboriginal term for the sudden whirlwinds which are common on the north-west coast. They can be seen approaching in a high circular column of leaves and dust from a great distance.

Wimbledon. A suburb of London, and home of the All England Croquet Club. In the middle of the 1870s the Club, being in low water, added "Lawn Tennis" to its title, this being then a new game increasing in popularity. On the Club's courts the first lawn tennis Championship in the world was held in 1877. The annual tournament run by the All England Club at Wimbledon still ranks as the premier championship.

Win, To. A slang term of World War II, meaning to acquire by deceit or theft; an aggravated "scrounge."

Winchester. Identified by Malory and other old writers with the Camelot (q.v.) of Arthurian romance.

Wind. According to classical mythology, the north, south, east, and west winds (Boreas, Notus, Eurus, and Zephyrus) were under the rule of Æolus, who kept them confined in a cave on Mount Hæmus, Thrace. Other strong winds of a more destructive nature were the brood of Typhæus.

The story says that Æolus gave Ulysses a bag, tied with a silver string, in which were all the hurtful and unfavourable winds, so that he might arrive home without being delayed by tempests. His crew, however, opened the bag in the belief that it contained treasure, the winds escaped, and a terrible storm at once arose, driving the vessel out of its course and back to the island it had left.

Latin names for other winds are: north-east, Argestes; north-west, Corus; south-east, Volturnus; south-west, Afer ventus, Africanus, or Libs. The Thrascias is a north wind, but not due north. Aquilo is another name for the north wind, as Auster is of the south and Favonius of the west.

Boreas and Cæcias, and Argestes loud,
And Thrascias rend the woods, and seas upturn;
Notus and Afer, black with thunderous clouds,
From Serrallona. Thwart of these, as fierce,
Forth rush . . . Eurus and Zephyr . . .
Sirocco and Libeccio [Libycus].

MILTON: Paradise Lost, x, 699-706.

For some specially named winds see ETESIAN, HARMATTAN, KAMSIIN, MISTRAL, MONSOON, PAMPERO, SIROCCO, SOLANO, TRADE WINDS, etc.

A wind egg. An egg without a shell, or an unfertilized one; from the old superstition that the hen that lays it was impregnated, like the "Thracian mares," by the wind.

In the wind's eye. See EYE.

Second wind. Soon after the start in running, unless the runner is very fit he gets out of breath; but, as the body becomes heated, breathing becomes more easy, and endures till fatigue produces exhaustion; this is called the second wind.

There's something in the wind. There are signs that something is going to happen, some hitherto unanticipated development is about to take place.

Three sheets in the wind. See SHEET.

'Tis an ill wind that blows nobody any good. Someone profits by every loss; someone is benefited by every misfortune.

Except wind stands as never it stood,

It is an ill-wind turns none to good.

TUSSER: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, xiii.

To get the wind up. To become thoroughly alarmed and, in consequence nervous, over-anxious, funky. A suggested origin of this phrase dates it from the early days of flying when pilots had to stretch their legs out in mid-air to reach the rudder bar. In any sudden fall of the plane in an air pocket the wind would rush up and give the learner a fright.

To know which way the wind blows. To be aware of the true state of affairs.

To raise the wind. To obtain ready money by hook or by crook.

To sail before the wind. To prosper, to go on swimmingly, to meet with great success, to go as smoothly and rapidly as a ship before the wind.

To sail close to the wind. In nautical use, to keep the vessel's head as near the quarter from which the wind is blowing as possible while keeping the sails filled; figuratively, to go to the very verge of what decency or propriety allow; to act so as just to escape the letter of the law.

To take or have the wind. To get or keep the upper hand. Bacon uses the phrase. To have the wind of a ship is to be to the windward of it.

To take the wind out of one's sails. To forestall him, "steal his thunder" (see THUNDER), frustrate him by utilizing his own material or methods. Literally, it is to sail to the windward of a ship and so rob its sails of the wind.

Windbag. A long-winded, bombastic speaker, who uses inflated phrases and promises far more than he can perform.

Windfall. An unexpected piece of good luck, especially an unexpected legacy; something worth having that comes to one without any personal exertion—like fruit which has fallen from the tree and so does not have to be picked.

Windjammer. A sailing ship, or one of its crew. The term is a modern one, born since steam superseded sail.

Windy City. Chicago.

Windmill. To fight with windmills. To face imaginary adversaries, combat chimeras. The allusion is to the adventure of Don Quixote who, when riding through the plains of Montiel, approached thirty or forty windmills, which he declared to Sancho Panza "were giants, two leagues in length or more." Striking his spurs into Rosinante, with his lance in rest, he drove at one of the "monsters dreadful as Typhæus" the lance lodged in the sail, and the latter lifted both man and beast into the air. When the valiant knight and his steed fell they were both much injured, and Don Quixote declared that the enchanter Freston, "who carried off his library with all the books therein," had changed the giants into windmills "out of malice" (Bk. i, ch. viii).

To have windmills in your head. To be full of fancies; to have "bees in your bonnet" (q.v.). Sancho Panza says—

Did I not tell your worship they were windmills? and who could have thought otherwise, except such as had windmills in their head?—CERVANTES: Don Quixote. Bk. i, ch. viii.

Window. Window dressing. Properly, the display of goods in a shop window for the purpose of attracting customers. Figuratively, the phrase is applied to the specious display of whatever is attractive in a project, plan, or the like.

All his goods in the window, is of much the same origin and meaning, implying that a man is displaying all his advantages with nothing substantial behind them, so to speak, in stock.

Windsor. The House of Windsor. The official title of the reigning dynasty of Great Britain and the British Dominions beyond the Seas since July 17th, 1917, when King George V signed a proclamation adopting this style for the Royal Family and declared that—all the descendants in the male line of Queen Victoria who are subjects of these realms, other than female descendants who may marry or may have married, shall bear the name of Windsor.

From the time of George I to the death of Queen Victoria the dynasty was known as the House of Hanover; from the accession of Edward VII to the date of this proclamation it was the House of Saxe-Coburg, so named from Edward VII's father, Albert, Duke of Saxony, Prince of Coburg and Gotha.

After his abdication, December 11th, 1936, King Edward VIII was created Duke of Windsor.

The Knights of Windsor. See under KNIGHT.

Windsor Herald. One of the six Heralds attached to the College of Arms (see HERALD).

Widow of Windsor. See WIDOW.

Wine. At the universities a wine is a convivial gathering at which wine, as a rule, is drunk.

Wine of ape (Chaucer). "I trow that ye have drunken win of ape"—i.e. wine to make you drunk; in French, vin de singe. There is a Talmud parable which says that Satan came one day to drink with Noah, and slew a lamb, a lion, a pig, and an ape, to teach Noah that man before wine is in him is a lamb, when he drinks moderately he is a lion, when like a sot he is a swine, but after that any further excess makes him an ape that senselessly chatters and jabbars.

See also VIN.

Wing. This word, naturally applied to the ailerons of an aeroplane, is used as a collective term in the R.A.F. for a group of three squadrons, under a Wing-Commander, ranking with a Commander in the Navy and a Lieut.-Colonel in the Army.

Don't try to fly without wings. Attempt nothing you are not fit for. A Latin saying, Plautus has (Pænulus IV, ii, 47) Sine pennis volare haud facile est. It is by no means easy to fly without wings.

On the wing. About to leave. Young (Night Thoughts, vii) speaks of "restless Hope, for ever on the wing."

The wings of Azrael. See AZRAEL.

To clip one's wings. To take down one's conceit; to hamper one's freedom of action.

To lend wings. To spur one's speed.

To take one under your wing. To patronize and protect. The allusion is to a hen gathering her chicks under her wing.

To take wing. To fly away; to depart without warning.

Oh, God! it is a fearful thing
To see the human soul take wing.

BYRON: Prisoner of Chillon.

Winifred, St. Patron saint of virgins, because she was beheaded by Prince Caradoc for refusing to marry him. She was Welsh by birth, and the legend says that where her head fell on the ground sprang up the famous healing well of St. Winifred in Flintshire. She is usually drawn like St. Denis, carrying her head in her hand. Holywell is St. Winifred's Well, celebrated for its "miraculous" virtues.

Wink. A nod is as good as a wink to a blind horse. See NOD.

Forty winks. A short nap, a doze.

Like winking. Old slang for very quickly; as in "to give an answer like winking."

To tip one the wink. To give him a hint privately; to "put him wise."

To wink at. To connive at, or to affect not to notice.

He knows not how to wink at human frailty
Or pardon weakness that he never felt.

ADDISON: Cato, v, 4.

Winkle, Rip van. The creation of Washington Irving, hero of one of the stories in the Sketch Book (1819) which tells how he, a Dutch colonist of New York in pre-Revolutionary days, met with a strange man in a ravine of the Catskill Mountains. Rip helps him to carry a keg, and when they reach the destination sees a number of odd creatures playing nine-pins, but no one utters a word. Master Winkle seizes the first opportunity to take a sip at the keg, falls into a stupor, and sleeps for twenty years. On waking, he finds that he is a tottering old man, his wife is dead and buried, his daughter is married, his native village has been remodelled, and America has become independent.

Winter, Winter's King and Queen. Ferdinand V, Elector Palatine, and his wife Elizabeth, who reigned in Bohemia from August, 1619 to November, 1620. Elizabeth was a daughter of Charles I of England, and her beauty inspired one of the finest lyrics of the century—Sir Henry Wotton's "You meaner beauties of the night."

Winter's Tale, The. One of the last of Shakespeare's plays, acted in 1611 but not printed till 1623 (first Folio). It is founded on Greene's Pandosto, The Triumph of Time (1588), which was written round an actual incident that occurred in the Bohemian and Polish courts in the late 14th century.

In the play Polixenes, King of Bohemia, is invited to Sicily by King Leontes, and unwittingly excites the jealousy of his friend because he prolongs his stay at the entreaty of Queen Hermione. Leontes orders Camillo to poison the royal guest, but, instead of doing so, Camillo flees with him to Bohemia. In time Florizel, the son and heir of Polixenes, falls in love with Perdita, the lost daughter of Leontes. Polixenes forbids the match, and the young lovers, under the charge of Camillo, flee to Sicily. Polixenes follows the fugitives, the mystery of Perdita is cleared up, the lovers are married, and the two kings resume their friendship.

In Greene's romance Polixenes is Pandosto, Hermione Bellaria, Leontes Egistus, and Florizel and Perdita Dorastus and Fawnia.

Wipe. Old slang for a pocket-handkerchief.

To wipe one's nose. To affront him; to give him a blow on the nose. Similarly, to wipe a person's eye, to steal a march on him, to fetch one a wipe over the knuckles, to give him a good rap.

Wiped out. Destroyed, annihilated; quite obliterated.

Wire. Used as a verb, meaning to telegraph to. "Wire me without delay," telegraph to me at once.

Wireless. Applied to telegraphic and telephonic communications sent through space instead of along a wire. A more colloquial term is "radio."

To pull the wires. To control events, politics, etc., clandestinely from behind the scenes, as the unseen operator manipulates the marionettes in a puppet-show.

Wisdom. Wisdom of Solomon. A book of the Old Testament Apocrypha, written by an Alexandrian Jew, probably between A.D. 1 and A.D. 40, to counteract the scepticism and Epicureanism presented in the Apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus.

Wisdom tooth. The popular name for the third molar in each jaw. Wisdom teeth appear between the ages of 17 and 25.

Cut your wisdom teeth. When persons say or do silly things, the remark is made to them that "they have not yet cut their wisdom teeth," or reached years of discretion.

The wisdom of many and the wit of one. Lord John Russell's definition of a proverb.

Wise. To put one wise. An Americanism, meaning to acquaint him with the facts, with the true position of affairs; to give him the necessary information.

Wisecrack. (Slang). A facetious or witty remark.

Wisest Fool in Christendom. James I of England (1566-1625).

The following have been surnamed The Wise:—

ALBERT II, Duke of Austria, called The Lame and Wise. (1289, 1330-58.)

ALFONSO X (or IX) of Leon, and IV of Castile, called The Wise and The Astronomer. (1203, 1252-85.)

CHARLES V of France, called Le Sage. (1337, regent 1358-60, king 1364-80.)

FREDERICK II, Elector of Saxony. (1482, 1544-56.)

JOHN V of Brittany, called The Good and Wise. (1389, 1399-1442.)

Wise Men, of Greece, The; also known as The Seven Sages.

Solon of Athens (about 638-559 B.C.), whose motto was, "Know thyself."

Chilo of Sparta (d. 597 B.C.)—"Consider the end." See DE MORTUIS.

Thales of Miletus (d. 548 B.C.)—"Who hateth suretyship is sure."

Bias of Priene (fl. 6th cent. B.C.)—"Most men are bad."

Cleobulus of Lindos (d. 564 B.C.)—"The golden mean," or "Avoid extremes."

Pittacus of Mitylene (d. 570 B.C.)—"Seize Time by the forelock."

Periander of Corinth (d. 585 B.C.)—"Nothing is impossible to industry."

The Wise Men of the East. See MAGI.

Wisest Man of Greece, The. So the Delphic oracle pronounced Socrates to be, and Socrates modestly made answer, "'Tis because I alone of all the Greeks know that I know nothing."

Wiseacre. (Ger. weissager, a soothsayer or prophet). This word, like the Greek "sophism," has quite lost its original meaning, and is applied to dunces, wise only in their own conceit.

There is a story told that Ben Jonson, at the Devil, in Fleet Street, said to a country gentleman who boasted of his estates, "What care we for your dirt and clods? Where you have an acre of land, I have ten acres of wit." The landed gentleman retorted by calling Ben "Good Mr. Wiseacre." The story may pass for what it is worth.

Wish. The wish is father to the thought. We are always ready to believe what we most want to believe. When the Prince says to his dying father "I never thought to hear you speak again," Henry IV replies—

Thy wish was father, Harry, to that thought:
I stay too long for thee, I weary thee.

2 Henry IV, iv, 4.

To wish one farther. To prefer his room to his company; to wish him gone.

Wishing bone. See MERRYTHOUGHT.

Wishing cap. Fortunatus (q.v.) had an inexhaustible purse and a wishing cap, but these gifts proved the ruin of himself and his sons. The object of the tale is to show the vanity of human prosperity.

Wishful thinking. A popular psycho-analytical term that has gained general acceptance as describing the unconscious expression of one's desire in accordance with one's opinion; the thinking a thing to be true because one wants it to be so.

Wit. Understanding, intelligence (A.S. witt, knowledge); hence, the power of perceiving analogies and other relations between apparently incongruous ideas or of forming unexpected, striking, or ludicrous combinations of them; and so, a person distinguished for this power, a witty person.

At one's wits' end. Quite at a loss as to what to say or what to do next; "flummoxed."

Great wits jump. Great minds think alike, tally. Shakespeare says, "It jumps with my humour" (1 Henry IV, iv, 2).

The five wits. See FIVE.

To have one's wits about one. To be wide awake; observant of all that is going on and prepared to take advantage of any opportunity that offers.

To wit. Namely; that is to say.

Witch. (A.S. wiccian, to practise sorcery.)

Innocent VIII issued the celebrated bull Summis Desiderantes in 1484, directing inquisitors and others to put to death all practisers of witchcraft and other diabolical arts, and it has been computed that as many as nine millions of persons have suffered death for witchcraft since that date.

By drawing the blood of a witch you deprive her of her power of sorcery. Glanvil says that when Jane Brooks, the demon of Tedworth, bewitched a boy, his father scratched her face and drew blood, whereupon the boy instantly exclaimed that he was well.

Blood will I draw on thee; thou art a witch.

1 Henry VI, i, 5.

John Fian, a schoolmaster at Salt pans, near Edinburgh, was tortured and then burnt at the stake on the Castle Hill of Edinburgh in 1591, because he refused to acknowledge that he had raised a storm at sea, to wreck James VI on his voyage to Denmark to visit his future queen.

Matthew Hopkins, the notorious "witchfinder," who, in the middle of the 17th century, travelled through the Eastern Counties to hunt out witches, is said to have hanged sixty in one year in Essex alone. At last he himself was tested by his own rule; when cast into a river he floated, and so was declared to be a wizard, and was put to death.

It is said that in England between three and four thousand persons suffered death for witchcraft between 1643 and 1661, and as late as 1705 two women were executed at Northampton.

Witch hazel. A North American shrub (Hamamelis virginiana) having several large branches. It is so called because its twigs are used as divining rods.

Witches Sabbath. The muster at night-time of witches (called a "coven") and demons to concoct mischief. The witch first anointed her feet and shoulders with the fat of a murdered babe, then mounting a broomstick, distaff, or rake, made her exit by the chimney, and rode through the air to the place of rendezvous. The assembled witches feasted together, and concluded with a dance, in which they all turned their backs to each other.

Witchen. See ROWAN.

Witenagemot (wit'e ne gē mōt). The Anglo-Saxon parliament. Witan is A.S. for wise men (connected with witt, knowledge); gemote is ge-, together, moot, meet; hence "an assembly of wise men."

The famous assembly of our forefathers was called by various names [as] Mycel Gemot (or great meeting); the Witenagemot (or meeting of the wise); and sometimes the Mycel Getheah (or great thought).—FREEMAN: The Norman Conquest, i, 3.

Withers. A horse's withers are the muscles uniting the neck and shoulders, or the ridge between the shoulder-blades; so called from A.S. wither, against, because this part is against the collar or load. Hamlet says (iii, 2):—

Let the galled jade wince, our withers are unwrung.
That is, let those wince who are galled; as for myself, my withers are not wrung. The skin of this part is often galled by the pommel of an ill-fitting saddle, and then the irritation of the saddle makes the horse wince. In 1 Henry IV, ii, 1, one of the carriers gives direction to the ostler to ease the saddle of his horse, Cut. "I prythee, Tom, beat Cut's saddle . . . the poor jade is wrung on the withers," that is, the muscles are wrung, and the skin galled by the saddle.

Withershins. An Anglo-Saxon word, still in use in Scotland and in north-country dialects, denoting a movement in a contrary direction to that of the sun—as of a clock whose hands are going backwards (Icel. víthr. against, sinni, movement). Hence, contrariwise, topsy-turvy.

The opposite of withershins is deiseal, a Gaelic word meaning "right-handwise."

Wittelsbach, House of. The former reigning dynasty in Bavaria.

Wivern (wí' vern). A fabulous creature of heraldry consisting of a winged dragon ending in a barbed, serpent's tail.

Wizard of Oz. The central figure in a very popular children's book The Wonderful Wizard of Oz, (1900) by Lyman Frank Baum (1856-1919), a well-known American journalist. The musical comedy of the same name (1901) was a great success, which was carried on to the film of some years later.

We're off to see the Wizard

The Wonderful Wizard of Oz

We hear he's a whiz of a Wizard,

If ever a Wiz there was.

Woden (wō' den). The Anglo-Saxon form of Odin (q.v.), the name of the supreme god of the later Scandinavian pantheon, he having supplanted Thor. Woden was the god of agriculture, and on this account Wednesday (Woden's Day) was considered to be specially favourable for sowing.

Woe. Wo, or Woe worth the day! Cursed be the day! Evil betide it!

Thus saith the Lord God: Howl ye, woe worth the day!—Ezek. xxx, 2.

Worth here is A.S. weothan, to become.

Woebegone. Overwhelmed by woe, especially applied to the appearance—A woebegone countenance. At first sight it would seem that the words imply the reverse of this, but begone is the p.p. of the old English verb began, to surround. It thus means "surrounded with woe" rather than "woe go away, be gone."

The Knight of the Woeful Countenance. The title given by Sancho Panza to Don Quixote (Bk. iii, ch. v).

Wolf. The tradition that wolves were extirpated from Great Britain in the reign of Edgar (959-975) is based upon the words of William of Malmesbury, who says (Bk. ii, ch. viii) that the tribute paid by the King of Wales, consisting of 300 wolves, ceased after the third year, because he could find no more; but in 1076 we find that Robert de Umfraville, knight, held his lordship of Riddlesdale in Northumberland by service of defending that part of the kingdom from "wolves." In 1369 Thomas Engarne held lands in Pitchley, Northamptonshire, by service of finding dogs at his own cost for the destruction of "wolves" and foxes; and even as late as 1433 Sir Robert Plumpton held one bovat of land in the county of Notts by service of "frighting the wolves" in Sherwood Forest.

Wolf has been applied as an epithet to many persons of savage and inhuman disposition, especially to Isabella, the She-wolf of France, the queen of Edward II. According to tradition, she murdered her royal husband by thrusting a hot iron into his bowels.

She-wolf of France, with unrelenting fangs,
That tear't the bowels of thy mangled mate.

GRAY: The Bard.

Dryden gave the name to the Presbytery in his Hind and Panther.

Unkennelled range in thy Polonian plains,
A fiercer foe the insatiate Wolf remains.

In music a discordant sound (occasioned by a faulty interval) in certain chords of the organ and stringed instruments such as the piano, violin, harp, etc., is called a wolf.

Nature hath implanted so inveterate a hatred atweene the wolfe and the sheepe, that, being dead, yet in the operation of Nature appeareth there a sufficient trial of their discording nature; so that the enmity betwene them seemeth not to dye with their bodies; for if there be put upon a harpe . . . strings made of the intralles of a sheepe, and amongst them . . . one made of the intralles of a wolfe . . . the musician . . . cannot reconcile them to a unity and concord of sounds, so discording is that string of the wolfe.—FERNE: Blazon of Gentrie (1586).

The squeak made in reed instruments by unskilled players is termed a "goose."

Wolf call (U.S.A.). An admiring exclamation, usually whistled, at sight of a girl.

Wolf Cub. A Boy Scout of the most junior rank, aged from eight to eleven years.

A wolf pack, in World War II was a group of German submarines working as a unit in an attack on a merchant or other ship.

Between dog and wolf. Neither daylight nor dark, the blind man's holiday. Generally applied to the evening dusk. In Latin, Inter canem et lupum; in French, Entre chien et loup.

Dark as a wolf's mouth. Pitch dark.

He has seen a wolf. Something or other has frightened him; formerly said of a person who had lost his voice. Our forefathers believed that if a man saw a wolf before the wolf saw him, he became dumb, at least for a time.

To see a wolf is also a good sign, inasmuch as the wolf was dedicated to Odin, the giver of victory.

A wolf in sheep's clothing. An enemy posing as a friend. The phrase is taken from the well-known fable of Æsop.

He put his head into the wolf's mouth. He exposed himself to needless danger. The allusion is to Æsop's fable of the crane that put its head into a wolf's (or fox's) mouth in order to extract a bone.

Holding a wolf by the ears. An old Greek saying; Augustus used it of his situation in Rome, meaning it was equally dangerous to keep hold or to let go.

He that goes to law (as the proverb is) holds a wolf by the ears—BURTON: Anatomy of Melancholy (Democritus to the Reader).

To cry "Wolf!" To give a false alarm. The allusion is to the well-known fable of the shepherd lad who so often cried "Wolf!" merely to make fun of the neighbours, that when at last the wolf came no one would believe him.

To keep the wolf from the door. To ward off starvation. We say of a ravenous person "He has a wolf in his stomach," and one who eats voraciously is said to wolf his food. French manger comme un loup is to eat voraciously.

Wake not a sleeping wolf! (2 Henry IV, i, 2). A variant of "Let sleeping dogs lie!"—let well alone.

Wolf's-bane. A species of aconite, Aconitum lycoctonum. The name is said to have arisen through a curious double etymological confusion. Bane is a common term for poisonous plants, and by some early botanist it was translated into Gr. kuamos, which means bean. The plant has a pale yellow flower, and was so called the white-bane to distinguish it from the blue aconite. The Greek for white is leukos, hence leukos-kuamos; but lukos is the Greek for wolf, and by a blunder leukos-kuamos (white-bean) got muddled into lukos-kuamos (wolf-bean). Botanists, seeing the absurdity of calling aconite a bean, restored the original word bane but retained the corrupt word lukos (a wolf), and hence we get the name wolf's-bane for white aconite.

Another, more plausible, explanation would probably be that the plant is so called because meat saturated with its juice was supposed to be a wolf-poison.

Wolfe's Own. The 1st Battalion, the Loyal Regiment, so called for their distinguished service under Wolfe, at Louisburg (1758) and Quebec (1759).

Woman's Suffrage. See SUFFRAGE.

Womble Cropped. An American word in use about 1800, denoting a feeling of uneasiness about anything.

Wonder. A nine days' wonder. Something that causes a sensational astonishment for a few days, and is then placed in the limbo of "things forgot." Three days' amazement, three days' discussion of details, and three days of subsidence.

For when men han wel cried, than let hem rounel!
For wonder last but nine night never in tounel!

CHAUCER: Troilus and Criseyde, iv, 587.

The Seven Wonders of the World.

The Pyramids of Egypt.
The Hanging Gardens of Babylon.
The Tomb of Mausolus.
The Temple of Diana at Ephesus.
The Colossus of Rhodes.
The Statue of Jupiter, by Phidias.
The Pharos of Alexandria.

A later list gives:—

The Coliseum of Rome.
The Catacombs of Alexandria.
The Great Wall of China.
Stonehenge.
The Leaning Tower of Pisa.
The Porcelain Tower of Nankin.
The Mosque of St. Sophia at Constantinople.

The Wonder of the World. The title given to Otto III, Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, 983-1002, on account of his brilliant intellectual endowments. The Emperor Frederick II (1215-50) was also so called.

The Wonderful, or Wondermaking, Parliament. The same as "The Unmerciful Parliament"; convened in the reign of Richard II (February 3rd, 1388). By playing into the hands of the Duke of Gloucester it checkmated the king.

Wonder-worker. St. Gregory, Bishop of Neo-Cæsarea, in Pontus, and one of the Fathers of the Eastern Church (d. 270). So called because he "recalled devils, stayed a river, changed a lake into solid earth, and did many other wonderful things." See THAUMATURGUS.

Wonkey (wong' ki). A modern slang word meaning unsound or unsteady. It comes from the Old English wancol, of precisely the same meaning.

Wood, Wooden. Drawn from the wood. Taken direct from the cask to the tankard or glass. Said of beer, wines, and spirits.

Don't cry (or halloo) till you are out of the wood. Do not rejoice for having escaped danger till the danger has passed away. "Call no man happy till he is dead"; "there's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip."

One can't see the wood for the trees. There is such a mass of detail that it is almost impossible to arrive at a true estimate of the thing as a whole.

Woodbine. A name given in different localities to many plants that bind or wind themselves around trees; especially the honeysuckle and the convolvulus. In the first quotation below probably the former is intended; in the second the latter.

Where the bee
Strays diligent, and with extracted balm
Of fragrant woodbine loads his little thigh.

PHILLIPS.

Shakespeare says—
So doth the woodbine, the sweet honeysuckle
Gently entwist. Midsummer Night's Dream, iv, 1.

Woodchuck. A marmot (Arctomys monax) of North America, also called the ground-hog. Its name is a corruption of its North American Indian name, wesak, and has given rise to the punning conundrum—

How much wood would a woodchuck chuck, if a woodchuck could chuck wood?

Woodcock. Old slang for a simpleton; from the supposition that woodcocks are without brains. Polonius tells his daughter that protestations of love are "springes to catch woodcocks" (Hamlet, i, 3).

Wooden. Used of one who is awkward and ungainly, or of a spiritless, emotionless person.

The wooden horse. An enchanted horse of the old romance that could be directed by a peg turned by the rider and could fly through the air. Cambuscan (q.v.) had such a horse, but his was of brass.

This very day may be seen in the king's armoury the identical peg with which Peter of Provence turned his Wooden Horse, which carried him through the air. It is rather bigger than the pole of a coach, and stands near Babieca's saddle.—Don Quixote, pt. i, bk. iv, 19.

The wooden horse of Troy. Virgil tells us that Ulysses had a monster wooden horse made after the death of Hector, and gave out that it was an offering to the gods to secure a prosperous voyage back to Greece. The Trojans dragged the horse within their city, but it was full of Grecian soldiers, who at night stole out of their place of concealment, slew the Trojan guards, opened the city gates, and set fire to Troy. Menelaus was one of the Greeks shut up in it. It was made by Epeios.

The wooden mare. "The mare foaled of an acorn." An instrument of torture to enforce military discipline, used in the reign of Charles II and long after. The horse was made of oak, the back was a sharp ridge, supported on four tall legs. The victim was seated on the ridge, with a firelock fastened to each foot and kept in this painful position for the term of the sentence.

Wooden nutmegs. Connecticut was in the early 19th century referred to derisively as the land of wooden nutmegs because certain dishonest merchants from the State were said to have exported nutmegs made of wood and other worthless goods.

The wooden wedge. Last in the classical tripos. When, in 1824, the classical tripos was instituted at Cambridge, it was debated by what name to call the last on the list. It so happened that the last on the list was Wedgewood, and the name was adopted to this slightly modified form.

Wooden walls. Ships of war. Before the advent of ironclads England's defence literally was "wooden walls."

When the Greeks sent to Delphi to ask how they were to defend themselves against Xerxes, who had invaded their country, the evasive answer given was to this effect.

Pallas hath urged, and Zeus, the sire of all,
Hath safety promised in a wooden wall;
Seed-time and harvest, weeping sires shall tell
How thousands fought at Salamis and fell.

Wood's Halfpence. The copper coinage for which William Wood, a copper-founder of Wolverhampton, obtained from the Government the valuable privilege of supplying to Ireland, in 1722. The outcry against this was so great (see DRAPIER'S LETTERS) that the patent was revoked in 1725.

Woof. See WARP.

Wokey Hole. A noted cavern near Wells in Somerset which has given birth to as many weird stories as the Sibyls' Cave in Italy. Wicked as the Witch of Wokey is an old local simile; and we read in Percy's Reliques that the witch was metamorphosed into stone by a "lerner wight" from Gaston, but left her curse behind, so that the fair damsels of Wookey rarely find "a gallant."

Wool. Great cry and little wool. See CRY.

Dyed in the wool. Cloth which is wool-dyed (not piece-dyed) is true throughout and will wash. Hence the phrase is used to describe anything or person absolutely genuine.

No wool is so white that a dyer cannot blacken it. No one is so free from faults that slander can find nothing to say against him; no book is so perfect as to be free from adverse criticism.

Your wits are gone wool-gathering. You are absent-minded; you're not thinking of the matter in hand. As children sent to gather wool from hedges wander hither and thither apparently aimlessly, so absent-minded persons can hold their minds to nothing, but wander in their thoughts from point to point.

Woollen. In 1666 an Act of Parliament was passed for "burying in woollen only," which was intended for "the encouragement of the woollen manufactures of the kingdom, and prevention of the exportation of money for the buying and importing of linen." The Act was repealed in 1814, but long before then it had fallen into abeyance.

"Odious! in woollen! 'twould a saint provoke!"
(Were the last words that poor Narcissa spoke).
"No! let a charming chintz and Brussels lace
Wrap my cold limbs, and shade my lifeless face.
One would not, sure, be frightful when one's dead;
And—Betty—give the cheeks a little red."

POPE: Moral Essays, Ep. i.

Woolsack, The. The official seat of the Lord Chancellor when presiding over the House of Lords. It is a large, square bag of wool—some-what resembling an ottoman—covered with red material and having neither sides nor back. There were originally four such woolsacks in the Lords' chamber, on which sat the Judges, the Barons of the Exchequer, the Serjeants-at-Law, and the Masters in Chancery. None of these officials had any voice in the proceedings of the House, and their woolsacks were not, technically, within its precincts. This still applies to the Lord Chancellor's woolsack, as by standing orders when he wishes to address the House he is "to go to his own place as a peer." The term Woolsack is often applied to the office of Lord Chancellor.

Word. A man of his word. One whose word may be depended on; trustworthy; he is "as good as his word," and "his word is as good as his bond."

A word to the wise! Said when giving advice as a hint that it would be well for the recipient to follow it. The Latin Verbum satis sapienti, a word is enough to the wise.

By word of mouth. Orally. As "he took it down by word of mouth" (as it was spoken by the speaker).

I take you at your word. I will act in reliance upon what you tell me.

Many words will not fill a bushel. Mere promises will not help the needy. If we say to a beggar, "Be thou filled," is he filled?

Pray, make no words about it. Don't mention it; make no fuss about it.

Put in a good word for me, please! Do your best to get me some privilege or favour; put my claims, my deeds, etc., in the best light possible.

Soft words butter no parsnips. See BUTTER.

The Word. The Scriptures; Christ as the Logos (see John i, 1).

The object of words is to conceal thoughts. See SPEECH.

To give, or pass one's word. To give a definite undertaking, make a binding promise.

To have words with one. To quarrel; to have an angry discussion. To have a word with one, is to have a brief conversation with him.

Upon my word. Assuredly; by my troth.

Upon my word and honour! A strong affirmation of the speaker as to the truth of what he has asserted.

World. A man or woman of the world. One who is acquainted with the ways of public and social life; not quite the same as a worldly man or woman, which expression would denote one that cares only for the things of this world.

In Shakespeare's time a woman of the world was merely a married woman:—

Touchstone: To-morrow will we be married.

Audrey: I do desire it with all my heart; and I hope it is no dishonour to desire to be a woman of the world.—As You Like It, v, 3.

Everyone goes to the world but I, and I may sit in a corner and cry heigho! for a husband.—Much Ado About Nothing, ii, 1.

All the world and his wife. Everyone without exception.

The world, the flesh, and the devil. "The world," i.e. the things of this world, in contradistinction to religious matters; "the flesh," i.e. love of pleasure and sensual enjoyments; "the devil," i.e. all temptations to evil of every kind, as theft, murder, lying, blasphemy, and so on.

From all the deceits of the world, the flesh, and the devil, Good Lord, deliver us.—The Litany (Book of Common Prayer).

World Court. The Permanent Court of International Justice, set up at The Hague under the Covenant of the League of Nations in September, 1921, and confirmed by the Charter of the United Nations in November, 1946. It has 15 judges elected by the Powers and it considers and passes judgment (from which appeal may be made to the Security Council) on all international disputes which may involve recourse to arms.

The World Turned Upside Down. An inn-sign alluding to Captain Cook's discovery of Australia, where the inhabitants were thought of as hanging down into space.

World Wars. The name given generally—and throughout this book—to the two great wars of 1914-18 and 1939-45 in which most civilized nations of the world were participants.

World War II abbreviations. World War II was made a nightmare for those taking part by the habit of contracting all official names into initials which formed words easily remembered but seldom understood. Among the most frequently used were:—

AAF: American Air Force.

ABCA: Army Bureau of Current Affairs (British).

AIF: Australian Imperial Forces.

AMGOT: Allied Military Government of Occupied Territory.

ARP: Air Raid Precautions (British).

ATC: Air Transport Command, earlier Ferry Command. Main function was flying planes from U.S.A. to Britain.

ATS: Auxiliary Territorial Service, women in military service (British).

BAR: Browning automatic rifle (U.S.A.).

BAOR: British Army of the Rhine.

CARE: Cooperative for American Remittances to Europe. A non-profit making organization for sending food parcels to Europe, continued after the war.

COSSAC: Chief of Staff to the Supreme Allied Commander; the word Cossac became the code word for the Allied headquarters in London.

DP: Displaced Person. Term applied to foreign forced labour and other refugees liberated by the Allied armies in Europe. Sarcastically referred to as "Displaced Persons" by the harassed troops who had to cope with the innumerable problems these thousands of broken lives presented.

DZ: Dropping Zone. The target area in which paratroops intended to land.

ETA: Estimated Time of Arrival.

ETO: European Theatre of Operations.

ETOUA: European Theatre of Operations United States Army.

FFL: French Forces of the Interior.

GI: Government issue. From equipment its use extended to American enlisted men.

LDV: Local Defence Volunteers (British). Later Home Guard.

LCI: Landing Craft, Infantry.

LST: Landing Ship, Tank.

LZ: Landing Zone. The target area in which gliders intend to land.

MTOUA: Mediterranean Theatre of Operations United States Army.

NATOUA: North African Theatre of Operations United States Army.

OCS: Officer Candidate School (U.S.A.).

OCTU: Officer Cadet Training Unit (British).

OSS: Office of Strategic Services (U.S.A.).

Organization for the gathering of strategic information and the execution of special missions in enemy territory.

OWI: Office of War Information (U.S.A.).

PIAT: Projectile Infantry Anti-Tank (British). A tank-destroying weapon operated on the same principle as the American bazooka and German Panzerfaust.

SAAFA: Soldiers', Army and Air Force Families Association (British). An organization to help deal with domestic problems of men absent in the forces.

SHAEF: Supreme Headquarters Allied Expeditionary Forces.

VIP: Very Important Person, requiring special accommodation or transport.

WAAC: Women's Army Auxiliary Corps (U.S.A.). Similar to British ATS.

WAAF: Women's Auxiliary Air Force.

WRNS: Women's Royal Naval Service, Wrens.

WVS: Women's Voluntary Services (British), started 1938.

Worm. The word was formerly used of dragons and great serpents, especially those of Teutonic and old Norse legend; it is now figuratively applied to miserable, grovelling creatures; also to the ligament under a dog's tongue.

Idle worms. It was once supposed that little worms were bred in the fingers of idle servants. To this Shakespeare alludes—

A round little worm
Pricked from the lazy finger of a maid.
Romeo and Juliet, i, 4.

To be food for worms. To be dead.

Your worm is your only emperor for diet; we fat all creatures else, to fat us; and we fat ourselves for maggots.—Hamlet, iv, 3.

To have a worm in one's tongue. To be cantankerous; to snarl and bite like a mad dog.

There is one easy artifice
That seldom has been known to miss—
To snarl at all things right or wrong,
Like a mad dog that has a worm in's tongue.
BUTLER: Upon Modern Critics.

To satisfy the worm. To appease one's hunger.

To worm out information. To elicit information indirectly and piecemeal.

To worm oneself into another's favour. To insinuate oneself into the good graces of another person.

Wormwood. The common name for the aromatic herbs of the genus Artemisia, especially A. absinthium, from which absinthe and vermouth are concocted. The name, which is of very great antiquity, almost certainly comes from the ancient legend that this plant sprang up in the track of the serpent as it writhed along the ground when driven out of Paradise.

Worship. Literally "worth-ship," honour, dignity, reverence; in its highest and now usual sense the respect and reverence man pays to God. In R.C. theology there are three kinds of worship—latría, the worship due to God alone; hyperdulia, the lesser worship paid to the B.V.M.; and dulia, the respect paid to the saints.

At one time the word carried a sense of personal respect. "Thou shalt have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee" (Luke xiv, 10) means "Thou shalt have worth-ship—value or appreciation." In the marriage service the man says to the woman, "With my body I thee worship, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow"—that is, I confer on you my rank and dignities, and endow you with my wealth; the worship attached to my person I share with you, and the wealth which is mine is thine also.

Magistrate and mayors are addressed as Your Worship, and in writing a mayor is The Worshipful Mayor, Mr. A.

Worst. If the worst comes to the worst. Even if the very worst occurs.

To get the worst of it. To come off second best; to be defeated, worsted.

Worsted (wēr'sted). Yarn or thread made of wool; so called from Worsted, a village near Norwich, once the centre of an extensive woollen-weaving industry. The name occurs as early as the 13th century.

Worthies, the Nine. Nine heroes—three from the Bible, three from the classics, and three from romance—who were frequently bracketed together, as in the burlesque Pageant of the Nine Worthies in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost. They are—Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabæus; Hector, Alexander, and Julius Cæsar; Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Bouillon.

Nine worthies were they called, of different rites—
Three Jews, three pagans, and three Christian knights.
DRYDEN: The Flower and the Leaf.

The Nine Worthies of London. A kind of chronicle-history in mixed verse and prose of nine prominent citizens of London, published in 1592 by Richard Johnson, author also of The Seven Champions of Christendom. His "Worthies" are—

Sir William Walworth, who stabbed Wat Tyler, the rebel, and was twice Lord Mayor (1374, 1380).

Sir Henry Pritchard, who (in 1356) feasted Edward III. (with 5,000 followers), Edward the Black Prince, John, King of Austria, the King of Cyprus, and David, King of Scotland.

Sir William Sevenoke, who fought with the Dauphin of France, built twenty almshouses and a free school (1418).

Sir Thomas White, merchant tailor, who, in 1553, kept the citizens loyal to Queen Mary during Wyatt's rebellion.

Sir John Bonham, entrusted with a valuable cargo for the Danish market, and made commander of the army raised to stop the progress of the great Solymán.

Christopher Coker. Famous at the siege of Bordeaux, and companion of the Black Prince when he helped Don Pedro to the throne of Castile.

Sir John Hawkwood. One of the Black Prince's knights, and immortalized in Italian history as Giovanni Acuti Cavaliere.

Sir Hugh Caverley. Famous for ridding Poland of a monstrous bear.

Sir Henry Maleverer, generally called Henry of Cornhill, who lived in the reign of Henry IV. He was a crusader, and became the guardian of "Jacob's well."

Wouldn't it! (Austr.). This was a very generally used phrase, being short for "Wouldn't it suit you!" It could be used as a sarcastic reply to any statement.

Wound. Bind the wound, and grease the weapon. A Rosicrucian maxim. See WEAPON-SALVE.

Wove. Applied to papers made on an ordinary dandy roll or mould in which the wires are woven. Used in contradistinction to laid (q.v.).

Wowser (wou' zer). An Australian term dating from about 1900, meaning a narrow-minded bigot who criticizes and seeks to interfere with civil liberties and the amusements of the people—a splendid Australian word which has not taken root elsewhere.

Wraf. A member of the Women's Royal Air Force, formerly called a Waaf (Women's Auxiliary Air Force).

Wraith (rāth). The phantom or spectral appearance of a still living person, usually taken as a warning that that person is very shortly going to die. It appears to persons at a distance, and forewarns them of the event.

Wrangler. The Cambridge term for one who has obtained a place in the highest class of the mathematical tripos. The first man used to be termed the Senior Wrangler, and the rest were arranged according to respective merit, but since 1909 this arrangement has been dropped and no one now can claim the title of Senior Wrangler.

In the Middle Ages college exercises were called disputations, and those who performed them disputants, because the main part consisted in pitting two men against one another, one to argue pro and the other con. In the law and theological "schools" this is still done for the bachelor's and doctor's degrees.

In the Western U.S.A. a wrangler is a herdsman.

Wren. A member of the Women's Royal Naval Service.

Wrenning Day. St. Stephen's Day (Dec. 26th) used to be so called, because it was a custom among villagers to stone a wren to death on that day in commemoration of the saint's martyrdom.

Wright of Norwich. Do you know Dr. Wright of Norwich. A reproof given to a person who stops the decanter at dinner. Dr. Wright, of Norwich, was a great diner-out and excellent talker. When a person stops the bottle and is asked this question, it is as much as to say, Dr. Wright had the privilege of doing so because he entertained the table with his conversation, but you are no Dr. Wright, except in stopping the circulation of the wine.

A similar reproof is given in the combination room of our universities in this way: The bottle-stopper is asked if he knows A or B (any name), and after several queries as to who A or B is, the questioner says, "He was hanged," and being asked what for, replies, "For stopping the bottle."

Wrinkle. Familiar slang for a useful bit of information, a "tip" or a dodge. For instance, if a man were going abroad for the first time he might go to a friend who was a frequent visitor to get a wrinkle or two, i.e. learn about the things to see, the way of living there, how to get through the Customs, etc.

Write. A.S. writan, connected with Icel. rita, to tear, cut, scratch out, etc.

To write down, besides meaning to commit to writing, means to criticize unfavourably, to depreciate. Contrariwise, to write up is to puff, to bring into public notice or estimation by favourable criticisms or accounts.

To write off a debt. To cancel it.

To write oneself out. To exhaust one's powers of literary production.

Writer. The Scottish term for a solicitor or attorney; in full a Writer to the Signet, the Signet being the smaller seal of the Sovereign.

In the navy a writer is a paymaster's non-commissioned assistant; a clerk to a paymaster, either afloat or ashore.

Wrong. The king can do no wrong. A legal maxim enshrining two truths; firstly, that as the monarch is—in theory—the creator of all law he cannot be subject to it; and, secondly, that the Sovereign, as Sovereign, does nothing except on the advice and with the consent of his ministers.

Wrong 'un. A swindler, a cheat, a palpably dishonest person; applied also to false coin and many things that are not what they purport to be; also to a horse which has run at any flat-race meeting not recognized by the Jockey Club, and so is boycotted by the Club.

In cricket, the word wrong is applied to a ball which breaks the opposite way from what the batsman has every reason to expect from his observation of the bowler's grip of the ball and manner of delivery; it is also called a "Chinaman."

Wroth Money or Wroth Silver. Money paid to the lord in lieu of castle guard for military service; a tribute paid for killing accidentally some person of note; a tribute paid in acknowledgement of the tenancy of unclosed land. Dugdale, in his History of Warwickshire, says:—

There is a certain rent due unto the lord of this Hundred (i.e. of Knightlow, the property of the Duke of Buccleuch) called wroth money, or warth-money, or swarf-penny.

The rent must be paid on Martinmas Day (Nov. 11th), in the morning at Knightlow Cross, before sunrise. The party paying it must go thrice about the cross and say, "The wrath-money," and then lay it (varying from 1d. to 2s. 3d.) in a hole in the said cross before good witnesses, or forfeit a white bull with red nose and ears. The amount thus collected reached in 1892 to about 9s., and all who complied with the custom were entertained at a substantial breakfast at the Duke's expense, and were toasted in a glass of rum and milk.

Wulstan. St. A Saxon Bishop of Worcester, who received his see from Edward the Confessor, and died in 1075. He fought against William the Conqueror, and when ordered to resign his see, planted his crozier in the shrine of the Confessor, declaring if any of his accusers could draw it out he would resign; as no one could do so but St. Wulstan himself, his innocence was admitted.

Wuyck's Bible. See BIBLE.

Wych Hazel. See WITCH HAZEL.

Wycliff's Bible. See BIBLE, THE ENGLISH.

Wycliffite (wik' lif it). A Lollard (q.v.), a follower of John Wyclif (c. 1320-84), the religious reformer, called "The Morning Star of the Reformation." He denied transubstantiation, condemned monasticism, and taught that all ecclesiastical and secular authority is derived from God and is forfeited by one who is living in mortal sin.

Wykehamist (wik' am ist). A member of Winchester College, past or present, which was founded in 1378 by William of Wykeham (1324-1404), Bishop of Winchester and Lord High Chancellor. Wykeham is a small place in Hampshire.

X

X. The twenty-fourth letter of the alphabet, representing the fourteenth letter of the Greek alphabet (ksi), and denoting in Roman numeration 10, or, on its side ( $\times$ ) 1,000, and with a dash over it ( $\bar{X}$ ) 10,000.

In algebra and mathematics generally x denotes an unknown quantity. The reason of this is that algebra came into use in Europe from Arabia, and that Arabic shei, a thing, a something (cp. cosa under Coss, RULE OF) was used in the Middle Ages to designate the mathematically "unknown," and that this was transcribed as xei.

X on beer casks formerly indicated beer which had paid the old 10s. duty, and hence it came to mean beer of a given quality. Two or three crosses are mere trade-marks, intended to convey the impression that the beer so marked was twice or thrice as strong as that which paid this duty.

Xanthian Marbles, The (zăn' thi än). A collection of ancient sculptures and friezes discovered by Sir Charles Fellows in 1838 at Xanthus, a Greek city of Lycia, Asia Minor, and now in the British Museum.

Xanthippe or Xantippe (zăn tip' i). Wife of the philosopher Socrates. Her bad temper shown towards her husband has rendered her name proverbial for a conjugal scold.

Be she as foul as was Florentius' love,
As old as Sibil, and as curst and shrewd
As Socrates' Xanthippe, or a worse,
She moves me not.

Taming of the Shrew, i, 2.

Xanthus (zăn' thüs) (Gr., reddish yellow). Achilles' wonderful horse, brother of Balios, Achilles' other horse, and offspring of Zephyrus and the harpy, Podarge. Being chid by his master for leaving Patroclus on the field of battle, Xanthus turned his head reproachfully, and told Achilles that he also would soon be numbered with the dead, not from any fault of his horse, but by the decree of inexorable destiny (Iliad, xix). (Cp. Numb. xxii, 28-30.)

Xanthus is also the ancient name of the Scamander and of a city on its banks. Elian and Pliny say that Homer called the Scamander "Xanthos" or the "Gold-red river," because it coloured with such a tinge the fleeces of sheep washed in its waters. Others maintain that it was so called because a Greek hero of this name defeated a body of Trojans on its banks, and pushed half of them into the stream.

Xaverian Brothers, The (zäv ër' i än). A Roman Catholic congregation founded in Holland in 1846, and so named from St. Francis Xavier (1506-52), one of the earliest of the Jesuits and the great missionary to India and the Far East. It is concerned chiefly with the education of youth, and has branches in England and the United States.

Xenocratic (zen ð krät' ik). Pertaining to the doctrine of Xenocrates (396-314 B.C.), a disciple of Plato, noted for his continence and contempt of wealth. He combined Pythagoreanism with Platonism.

Warmed by such youthful beauty, the severe
Xenocrates would not have more been chaste.

Orlando Furioso, xi, 8.

Xerxes (zerks' ëz). A Greek way of writing the Persian Ksathra or Kshatra. Xerxes I, the great Xerxes, is identical with the Ahasuerus of the Bible.

When Xerxes invaded Greece he constructed a pontoon bridge across the Dardanelles, which was swept away by the force of the waves; this so enraged the Persian despot that he "inflicted three hundred lashes on the rebellious sea, and cast chains of iron across it." This story is a Greek myth, founded on the peculiar construction of Xerxes' second bridge, which consisted of three hundred boats, lashed by iron chains to two ships serving as supporters.

Another story told of him is that when he reviewed his enormous army before starting for Greece, he wept at the thought of slaughter about to take place. "Of all this multitude, who shall say how many will return?" Similarly, it is said that Charlemagne viewed the fleet of the Norsemen in the Mediterranean with tears in his eyes, and remarked, "There was reason for these Xerxes' tears."

Ximena (zim ë' nâ). The Cid's bride.

Xiphias (zif' i às) (Gr. xiphios, a sword). The name used in mediæval times for a sword-shaped comet; also for the southern constellation now called Dorado; and a poetical name given to the swordfish (genus Xiphias).

Strong is the horse upon his speed;

Strong in pursuit the rapid glede,

Which makes at once his game:

Strong the tall ostrich on the ground;

Strong through the turbulent profound

Shoots Xiphias to his aim.

CHRIS. SMART: Song to David.

X.Y.Z. Correspondence. In 1797 the President of the U.S.A., John Adams, sent his agents Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry to France to negotiate a treaty for the regulation of certain maritime matters. From Paris they reported that three French agents had intercepted them and demanded a large sum of money before the Directory would receive any American diplomats, alternatively a loan would have to be granted by U.S.A. to France. The Americans refused to negotiate on these terms, and the whole correspondence with the three French agents, whom they designated as X. Y. and Z., was published in Washington.

Y

Y. The twenty-fifth letter of the alphabet, is a differentiation of the Greek y (see SAMIAN LETTER) added by the Greeks to the Phœnician alphabet.

In Algebra it denotes the second unknown quantity (cp. X), and in the Middle Ages it was used in Roman numeration for 150. See also Ye.

Yahoo (ya' hoo). Swift's name, in Gulliver's Travels, for brutes with human forms and vicious propensities. They are subject to the Houyhnhnms, the horses with human reason. Hence applied to coarse, brutish, or degraded persons.

Yahweh. See JEHOVAH.

Yama (ya' ma). The god of the dead in Hindu mythology, the Hindu Pluto. The story is that he was the first mortal to die and so was made a god.

Yank. To yank, to pull with a jerk. A word of uncertain origin.

Yankee (yāng' ki). Properly a New Englander or one of New England stock; but extended to mean, first, an inhabitant of the Northern as apart from the Southern United States, and later to comprise all United States citizens.

It is generally taken to be a North American Indian corruption of English (or of Fr. Anglais). The story is that in 1713 one Jonathan Hastings, a farmer of Cambridge, Massachusetts, used the word as a puffing epithet, meaning genuine, what cannot be surpassed, etc.; as, a "Yankee horse," "Yankee cider," and so on. The students at Harvard, catching up the term, called Hastings, "Yankee Jonathan." It soon spread, and became the jocular pet name of the New Englander.

Yankee Doodle. The quasi national air of the United States, the doggerel words of which are said to have been written by Dr. Shuckburgh, a surgeon in Lord Amherst's army during the French and Indian war of 1755.

The origin of the tune is disputed: some say that it comes from a mediæval church service, others that it was composed in England in Cromwell's time, others that it was played by the Hessian troops during the American Revolution and adopted by the revolutionaries in mockery. A Dutch origin has also been suggested.

Yarborough. A hand at bridge in which there is no card higher than a nine. So called because the second Lord Yarborough (early 19th cent.) used to lay 1,000 to 1 against such an occurrence in any named hand. The actual mathematical odds are 1,827 to 1 against.

Yashmak (yāsh' māk). The veil worn by Moslem women. It consists of a white or a black veil, either covering the whole face or hanging from immediately below the eyes.

Yclept (i klept'). An old English word meaning called, named, styled. It is now only used in a sort of arch facetiousness that Fowler calls "Worn-out Humour."

Ye. An archaic way of writing the, the y representing A.S. 3 (ge) which in Middle English became confused with p, the character representing our th as in then. It never was pronounced other than the.

Year (connected with Gr. horos, a season, and Lat. hora, an hour). The period of time occupied by the revolution of the earth round the sun.

The Astronomical, Equinoctial, Natural, Solar, or Tropical year, is the time taken by the sun in returning to the same equinox, in mean length, 365 days 5 hours 48 min. and 46 sec.

The Astral or Sidereal year is the time in which the sun apparently returns to the same place in relation to the fixed stars: 365 days 6 hours 9 min. and 9 sec.

The Plutonic, Great, or Perfect year (Annus magnus), was estimated by early Greek and Hindu astronomers at about 26,000 years, at the end of which all the heavenly bodies were imagined to return to the same places as they occupied at the Creation.

The Chaldean astronomers observed that the fixed stars shift their places at about the rate of a degree in seventy-two years, according to which calculation they will perform one revolution in 25,920 years, at the end of which time they will return to their "as you were." The Egyptians made it 30,000 years, and the Arabians 49,000.

For a year and a day. In law many acts are determined by this period of time—e.g. if a person wounded does not die within a year and a day, the offender is not guilty of murder; if an owner does not claim an estray within the same length of time, it belongs to the lord of the manor; a year and a day is given to prosecute appeals, etc.

Year of Grace. A year of the Christian era.

Year in year out. All the year round, without cessation.

Yellow (A.S. geolo, connected with Gr. chloros, green, and with gall, the yellowish fluid secreted by the bile). Indicating in symbolism jealousy, inconstancy, and adultery. In France the doors of traitors used to be daubed with yellow. In some countries the law ordained that Jews must be clothed in yellow, because they betrayed our Lord, hence Judas, in mediæval pictures, is arrayed in yellow. In Spain at an auto-de-fé the victims were robed in yellow, to denote heresy and treason.

In heraldry and in ecclesiastical symbolism yellow is frequently used in place of gold.

As a slang or colloquial term yellow is applied to a coward.

Yellow-back. A cheap novel, particularly one of the sensational kind. So called because of the yellow board bindings so well known on railway bookstalls up to about the early 'nineties of last century.

Yellow-bellies. Slang for inhabitants of the fenlands of East Anglia and Lincolnshire; the allusion being to frogs. The Mexicans are also so called.

Yellow Books. Official documents, Government reports, etc., in France; corresponding to British "Blue Books" (q.v.); so called from the colour of their covers.

Yellow boy. Slang for a golden sovereign, once fairly common in Great Britain.

John did not starve the cause: there wanted not yellow-boys to fee counsel.—ARBUTHNOT: John Bull (1712).

Yellow-hammer. A bunting with yellowish head, neck, and breast (A.S. amore, Ger. ammer, a bunting). The tradition is that the bird fluttered about the Cross, and got stained with the Blood in its plumage, and by way of punishment its eggs were doomed ever after to bear marks of blood. Because the bird was "cursed," boys were taught that it was right and proper to destroy its eggs.

Yellow Jack. The yellow fever; also the flag displayed from lazarettos, naval hospitals, and vessels in quarantine.

Yellow Peril, The. A scare, originally raised in Germany in the late 'nineties of last century, that the yellow races of China and Japan would in a very few years have increased in population to such an extent that incursions upon the territories occupied by the white races—followed by massacres and every conceivable horror—were inevitable.

Yellow Press, The. Sensational and jingoist newspapers or journalism. The name arose in the United States about 1898 in consequence of scaring articles on the "Yellow Peril."

Yemen (ye' men). The south-west corner of the Arabian peninsula, called by the ancients Arabia Felix. Felix is a mistranslation by Ptolemy of Yemen, which means to the "right"—i.e. of Mecca.

Yeoman. Anciently, a forty-shilling freeholder, and as such qualified to vote and serve on juries, but not qualified to rank as one of the gentry. In more modern times it meant a farmer who cultivated his own freehold. Later still, an upper farmer, tenant, or otherwise, is often called a yeoman.

Yeoman's service. Hard work; effectual service; excellent service whether in a good or bad cause. The reference is to the yeomen of the Free Companies.

Hamlet says—

I once did hold it, as our statists do,
A baseness to write fair, and labour'd much
How to forget that learning; but, sir, now
It did me yeoman's service.

Hamlet, v. 2.

Yeomen of the Guard. The beefeaters (q.v.).

Yes-man. An expressive colloquialism for one who expresses agreement with his superior in everything, whatever his private opinion may be.

Yeth-hounds. Dogs without heads, of west country folklore; said to be the spirits of unbaptized children, which ramble among the woods at night, making wailing noises.

Yew. The yew is a British tree, and is commonly planted in churchyards because, as it is an evergreen, it is a symbol of immortality. It was planted by the Druids near their temples.

Some famous yews—

Of Braburn, in Kent, according to De Candolle, is 3,000 years old.

The Scotch yew at Fortingal, in Perthshire, is between 2,500 and 3,000 years.

Of Darley churchyard, Derbyshire, about 2,050 years.

Of Crowhurst, Surrey, about 1,400.

The three at Fountains Abbey, in Yorkshire, at least 1,200 years. Beneath these trees the founders of the abbey held their council in 1132.

The yew grove of Norbury Park, Surrey, was standing in the time of the Druids.

The yew trees at Kingsley Bottom, near Chichester, were standing when the sea-kings landed on the Sussex coast.

The yew tree of Harlington churchyard, Middlesex, is above 850 years old.

That at Ankerwyke House, near Staines, was noted when Magna Charta was signed in 1215, and it was the trysting tree for Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn.

Yggdrasil (ig' drá sil). The world tree of Scandinavian mythology that, with its roots and branches, binds together heaven, earth, and hell. It is an ash, and at the root is a fountain of wonderful virtues. In the tree, which drops honey, sit an eagle, a squirrel, and four stags.

The tree is a late addition to Scandinavian myth, and the name was probably originally that of one of the winds (Yggr, a name of Odin, and dressill, a horse).

Yiddish. A Middle German dialect developed under Hebrew and Slavic influence, written in Hebrew characters, and used as a language by German and other Jews (Ger. jüdisch, Jewish).

Ymir (im' ir). The primeval being of Scandinavian mythology, the giant from whose body the world was created. He was nourished by the four milky streams which flowed from the cow Audhumla.

Yodel (yō' dél). To sing with frequent alternations between the ordinary voice and falsetto. It is really peculiar to Switzerland and is a development of the Ranz des Vaches, or cow-herd's call when driving the cattle to the mountain pastures with the coming of spring. Like the cowhorn, the yodel has a restricted scale of natural harmonics.

Yoga (yō' gā). A practice of Hindu philosophy seeking to unite the human soul with the Universal Spirit by concentrating the mind on some eternal truth and withdrawing the physical senses from external objects. Adepts in yoga are able to hold their breath for protracted periods and do other things in apparent contravention of natural requirements.

Yoke. To pass under the yoke. To make a humiliating submission; to suffer the disgrace of a vanquished army. The Romans made a yoke of three spears—two upright and one resting on them. When an army was vanquished, the soldiers had to lay down their arms and pass under this archway of spears.

Yom Kippur (yom ki pēr'). The Jewish Day of Atonement, on the 10th day of the first month, Tishri. It is observed by a strict fast and ceremonies of supplication mostly dating from the 3rd century B.C.

Yorick (yor' ik). The King of Denmark's deceased jester, "a fellow of infinite jest and most excellent fancy," whose skull is apostrophized by Hamlet (Act v, 1). In Tristram Shandy Sterne introduces a clergyman of that name, meant for himself.

York. The Anglo-Saxon Eure-wic (pron. Yorric), the town on the Eure, now called the Ouse. The Romans Latinized the word Eure or Evre into "Eborā" or "Eborā," and wic into "vicum"; whence Eborā-vicum, contracted into Eboracum.

Yorkshire. I'se Yorkshire, too. I am as deep as you are, and am not to be bamboozled. The north countrymen are proverbially "long-headed and cannie."

The Yorkshireman's toast. "Here's tiv us, all on us; may we never want nowt, noan on us; nor me nawther."

Yorker. A cricketing term for a ball bowled so as to pitch three or four feet from the wicket, immediately in front of the bat. Probably so called because first effectively used by a Yorkshire bowler.

Yorkist. A partisan of the White Rose in the Wars of the Roses. See ROSE.

Young. Used as an epithet in the names of political parties who strive to sweep away abuses and introduce reforms.

Young Buffs. The East Surrey Regiment, the 31st Foot, raised as Marines in 1702. Their name was coined at the Battle of Dettingen, 1743. George II, observing that their 1st Battalion was fighting well, cried, "Well done, the Buffs!"—thinking them to be the West Surreys. His mistake was pointed out to him and he was told they were a younger regiment than the Buffs, whereupon he cried, "Well done, the Young Buffs!"

Young Germany. A school headed by Heine in the mid-19th century, whose aim was to liberate politics, religion, and manners from the old conventional trammels.

Young Ireland. The Irish politicians and agitators (at first led by O'Connell) who effected the rising of 1848.

Young Italy (Giovine Italia). A league of Italian refugees, who associated themselves with the French republican party, called the Charbonnerie Démocratique. It was organized at Marseilles by Mazzini about 1834, and its chief object was to diffuse republican principles.

Yours truly. This conventional ending to letters is sometimes used vulgarly to indicate the speaker—"There were X., Y., and Yours truly."

Ysolde (Yseult, Isolde, etc.). The name of two heroines of Arthurian romance, the more important Ysolde the Fair, King Mark's wife, being the lover of Tristram (q.v.), the other, Ysolde of the White Hands, or Ysolde of Brittany, being his wife, with whom he made a "Maiden Marriage" after he had been discovered by King Mark and had been obliged to flee.

It was through the treachery of Ysolde of the White Hands that Sir Tristram died, and that Ysolde the Fair died in consequence. The story has it that King Mark buried the two in one grave, and planted over it a rose-bush and vine, which so intermingled their branches as they grew up that no man could separate them.

Yuga. One of the four ages of the world into which, according to Hindu cosmogony, mundane time is divided.

Yule, Yuletide. Christmas time. A.S. geola, from Icel. jól (with which possibly our jolly is connected), the name of a heathen festival at the winter solstice.

Yule log. A great log of wood laid in ancient times across the hearth-fire on Christmas Eve. This was done with certain ceremonies and much merrymaking.

Yves or Yvo, St. (ēv, ē' vō). Patron saint of lawyers, being himself a lawyer. He was an ecclesiastical judge at Rennes, was ordained priest in 1285, died in 1303, and was canonized in 1347. As he used his knowledge of the law in defending the oppressed, he is still called in Brittany (where his festival is kept on May 19th) "the poor man's advocate."

Advocatus, sed non latro,
Res miranda populo.—Hymn to St. Yves.

Yvetot (ēv' tō). The King of Yvetot. A man of mighty pretensions but little merit. Yvetot is a town in Normandy and the "king" was the lord of the town.

The tradition is that Clotaire, son of Clovis, having slain Gauthier, lord of Yvetot, before the high altar of Soissons, made atonement by conferring the title of king on the heirs of the murdered man.

Z

Z. The last letter of the alphabet, called zed in England, but in America zee. Its older English name was izzard.

In mathematics it denotes the third unknown quantity (see X); and in mediæval times it was used as a Roman numeral for 2,000.

Zadig. Possibly the best of Voltaire's short novels, published in 1748. Zadig was a Babylonian philosopher whose determination to lead a life of virtue and wisdom was rewarded by a series of ever-worsening calamities.

Zadikim. See CHASIDIM.

Zadkiel (zād' kēl). In Rabbinical angelology, the angel of the planet Jupiter. The name was adopted as a pseudonym by the astrologer Richard James Morrison (1795-1874), a naval lieutenant, author of the Prophetic Almanac, commonly called Zadkiel's Almanac.

Zadoc (zād' ok), in Dryden's satire of Abraham and Achitophel, is designed for Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury.

Zadoc the priest, whom (shunning power and place)
His lowly mind advanced to David's [Charles II] grace,
Pt. 1, lines 801-2.

Zamorin (zām' or in). The title of the native ruler of Calicut and the surrounding country.

Zany (zā' nī). The buffoon who mimicked the clown in the Commedia dell'Arte; hence a simpleton, one who "acts the goat." The name is the Italian zanni, a buffoon, fem. of Giovanni (i.e. John), our Jane.

For indeed,

He's like the zani to a tumbler
That tries tricks after him to make men laugh.

B. JONSON: Every Man out of his Humour, iv, 2.

Zeitgeist (zit' gīst) (Ger. zeit, time, geist, spirit). The spirit of the time; the moral or intellectual tendency characteristic of the period.

Zemindar (zem' in dar). An Indian landowner holding direct from the Government and paying a fixed rent based on the revenue from his land.

Zemire. See AZOR'S MIRROR; BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

Zemstvo (zemst' vō). The elected local district and provincial administrative assembly in Russia under the old Empire. Theoretically it had large powers and was democratic; but it was always under the thumb of the great landowners, and all its decrees were subject to the approval of the Governor.

Zem Zem. The sacred well near the Kaaba at Mecca. According to Arab tradition, this is the very well that was shown to Hagar when Ishmael was perishing of thirst.

Zenana (ze na' nā). The Hindu harem or apartment where the women of the family are kept secluded.

Zend-Avesta. The sacred writings of Zoroaster (or Zarathustra) that formed the basis of the religion that prevailed in Persia from the 6th century B.C. to the 7th century A.D. Avesta means the text, and Zend its interpretation into a more modern and intelligible language; hence the latter name has been given to the ancient Iranian language in which the Zend-Avesta is written.

Zenith, Nadir (zen' ith, nād' ir) (Arabic). Zenith is the point of the heavens immediately over the head of the spectator. Nadir is the opposite point, immediately beneath the spectator's feet. Hence, to go from the zenith of prosperity to the nadir is to fall from the height of fortune to the depths of poverty.

Zephyr (zef' ir). The west wind in classical mythology; son of Æolus and Aurora, and lover of Flora; hence, any soft, gentle wind.

Fair laughs the Morn and soft the Zephyr blows.
While proudly riding o'er the azure realm
In gallant trim the gilded vessel goes;
Youth on the prow, and Pleasure at the helm.

GRAY: The Bard.

Zero (zē' rō) (Arabic, a cipher). The figure 0; nothing; especially the point on a scale (such as that of a thermometer) from which positive and negative quantities are measured; on the Centigrade and Réaumur thermometers fixed at the freezing-point of water, on the Fahrenheit 32° below this.

Absolute zero is the point at which it would be impossible for a body to get any colder; i.e. that at which it is totally devoid of heat (estimated at about -273° C.).

Zero hour. A military term (first used in World War I) for the exact time at which an attack etc., is to be begun. From this are timed the consequent operations, e.g. zero + 3 means 3 minutes after zero hour. Succeeded in World War II by H-hour.

Zero point. In Time, 12 o'clock, midday; the time at which 24-hour clocks begin the day.

Zeugma (zūg' má). A grammatical and logic term for a phrase in which one word modifies or governs two or more not connected in meaning. A well-known example is, "Miss Bolo went straight home in a flood of tears and a sedan chair."—Pickwick Papers, xxxv.

Zeus (zūs). The Grecian Jupiter (q.v.). The word means the "living one" (Sanskrit, Djaus, heaven).

Zimri (zim' ri). The name given by Dryden in Absalom and Achitophel (q.v.) to George Villiers, 2nd Duke of Buckingham (1628-87), in allusion to the King of Israel who "slew his master" and was himself overthrown (1 Kings xvi).

Some of the chiefs were princes in the land;
In the first rank of these did Zimri stand;
A man so various that he seemed to be
Not one, but all mankind's epitome.
Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong,
Was everything by starts, and nothing long.

Pt. I, 543-548.

Zincali or Zingari (zing' ka li). Gypsies; so called in Spain from Sinte or Sind (India) and calo (black), on the supposition that they came from India which no doubt is true. The Persian Zangi means an Ethiopian or Egyptian.

I Zingari (I.Z.). An exclusive nomadic cricket club, founded in 1845 by William Bolland. The club has no ground of its own.

Zion (Heb. Tsiyon, a hill). Daughter of Zion. Jerusalem or its people. The city of David stood on Mount Zion.

In Pilgrim's Progress Bunyan calls the Celestial City (i.e. Heaven) Mount Zion.

Zodiac (Gr. zodiakos, pertaining to animals; from zōon, an animal). The imaginary belt or zone in the heavens, extending about eight degrees each side of the ecliptic, which the sun traverses every year.

Signs of the Zodiac. The zodiac was divided by the ancients into twelve equal parts, proceeding from west to east; each part of thirty degrees, and distinguished by a sign; these originally corresponded to the zodiacal constellations bearing the same names, but now, through the precession of the equinoxes, they coincide with the constellations bearing the names next in order.

Beginning with Aries, we have first six on the north side and six on the south side of the equator; beginning with Capricornus, we have six ascending and then six descending signs—i.e. six which ascend higher and higher towards the north, and six which descend lower and lower towards the south. The six northern signs are: Aries (the ram), Taurus (the bull), Gemini (the twins), spring signs; Cancer (the crab), Leo (the lion), Virgo (the virgin), summer signs. The six southern are: Libra (the balance), Scorpio (the scorpion), Sagittarius (the archer), autumn signs; Capricornus (the goat), Aquarius (the water-bearer), and Pisces (the fishes), winter signs.

Our vernal signs the RAM begins,
Then comes the BULL in May the TWINS;
The CRAB in June, next LEO shines,
And VIRGO ends the northern signs.

The BALANCE brings autumnal fruits,
The SCORPION stings, the ARCHER shoots;
December's GOAT brings wintry blast,
AQUARIUS rain, the FISH come last.—E.C.B.

Zoilus. A Greek rhetorician of the 4th century B.C., a literary Thersites, shrewd, witty, and spiteful, nicknamed Homeromastix (Homer's scourge), because he mercilessly assailed the epics of Homer, and called the companions of Ulysses in the island of Circe "weeping porkers" ("choiridia klaionta"). He also flew at Plato, Isocrates, and other high game.

Zollverein. The customs union that existed from about 1820 between the States of the former German Empire for the purpose of establishing a uniform tariff of duties and maintaining Free Trade among themselves.

Zombie (zom' bi). The python god of certain West African tribes. Its worship was carried to the West Indies with the slave trade, and still somewhat covertly flourishes in Voodoo ceremonies in Haiti and some of the Southern States of the U.S.A. The word zombie is commonly applied to an alleged dead body brought by Voodoo magic to life in a more or less cataleptic or automaton state.

Zoom. To fly an aeroplane sharply upward for a short distance at a great speed in order to regain altitude or clear an obstacle, etc.

Zoot-suit (U.S.A.). An exaggerated style of clothing adopted in the late 1930s by hepcats (q.v.) and followers of fashionable swing music. It usually consisted of baggy trousers caught in at the bottom, a long coat resembling a frock coat, a broad-brimmed hat, and a flowing tie, all in vivid colours. An essential article of equipment was a vast key-chain.

Zounds! A minced oath; euphemistic for God's wounds.

Zuchetto (zu ket' ò). The small skull-cap worn by Roman Catholic clergy; white for the pope, red for a cardinal, purple for a bishop, and black for others.

Zuleika. The name traditionally ascribed to the wife of Joseph, and a very common name in Persian poetry.

Zurich Bible, The. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Zwischau Prophets, The. See ABECEDARIAN.
